7918. Would you agree to give a two-thirds majority of the elected Councillors the power to reject any Government Bill, unless it was a Bill dealing with public order, under the definition that you have already given?—It is a very large power to give, but in view of the importance of making the experiment, and in view of the check which is provided, not only by the statute which you have quoted, but also the fact that the action of the Legislature will be a test for further advance, it is a risk which I personally am prepared to accept. I admit there is considerable risk in it.

7919. But the effect of that would be to bring home at least a real responsibility to the Legislative Council?—Yes.

7920. If the Bill was passed by their majority, then the whole Province would know that theirs was the responsibility. Therefore, is not an arrangement like that really providing more direct and real responsibility than the proposals in the Bill?—The proposals in the Bill as to the Governor's power of veto?

7921. The dual system?—Yes.

7922. The effect of that would be to confer direct responsibility in regard to almost the whole field of Provincial legislation?—Yes.

7923. Therefore, that would be a very liberal proposal, would it not?—Yes. I think our Majority Report goes much further than the Government of India proposal.

7924. You think that it is the dual system which is really alarming the public services?—Yes, I am convinced of it.

7925. That if you sweep away that there is not likely to be any large number of resignations?—I think not. I think the Services will have confidence in any Government provided it is a unified Government, with the Governor at its head, and irrespective of the fact that the Indian element would be very strong in the Government. That question does not arise as long as they are working in association.

7926. If the result of this dual system be to cause the early retirement of large numbers of very experienced civilians and British public officers in the other Services, and to check the recruitment of good men to replace them, would not the effect be very serious to the interests of the masses in India?—Very serious.

7928. Has there been any marked improvement in the relations between Hindus and Mahommedans since the arrangement that was arrived at at Lucknow?—Of course, an agreement is come to at a particular time, and great fuss is made about it, and it is very impressive; and then something happens which raises a good deal of sectarian feeling and upsets that agreement and leads to difficulty. There have been in the last two years the most serious sectarian upheavals which we have witnessed in India in my time; those are the Bihar riots and the Kartarpur riots of a year ago. In the latter 30 Mohammedans were murdered.

7929. In cases of great outbreaks like that, is not the fanaticism generally stirred up by upper-class people?—That has certainly been found to be the case by the Courts in the Baha disturbance, and also in the Catapore case.

7930. How far do you think the Congress and the Home Rule Leagues are entitled to speak for Hindus and Mohammedans generally?—The word "Congress," of course, has so many acceptations now. I believe there are now not less than four; there are three or four, certainly.

7931. There are only three at the present time?—It is very hard to know. There are at least three divisions of the Moslem League, and it is very hard to know which is representative and which is not. It is very hard to mark down responsibility to any particular one, but in my opinion none of them is entitled to speak for the masses.

7932. Do you think the deputations which have come before us really represent Punjab opinion?—I do not know; I am not in a position to say, but I know of no deputation which has appeared from the Punjab.

Sir J. D. Rees.

7933. The Punjab did not give evidence?—I think I may safely say that Punjab opinion has not been represented before this Committee except through one witness.

Lord Sydenham.

7934. You have been attacked rather violently for bringing undue pressure to bear upon recruiting. May I take it from you that it was your particular wish that only willing recruits should ever be secured?—Yes; instructions to that effect were issued; in fact, to prevent any risk of compulsion arising, most distinct orders were issued by the Punjab Government in my time that the agency of the police was never to be used in recruiting. The police were rather dissatisfied with that, because all other Services were asked to help in this great rally, and they were specially excluded.

7935. Everything that was possible was done to prevent anything like undue pressure?—In order to secure that there should be no undue pressure used, our recruiting organisation at headquarters was very largely non-official, and in each district the Recruiting Committee was composed mainly of non-officials under the presidency of a Deputy Commissioer, and nearly all the arrangements were left to the local non-official agency, supervised, of course, by official control.

7936. Do you think it is possible that some undue pressure may have been exercised by subordinate officials?—I think where you have such a big propaganda as we had, which succeeded in raising 400,000 men in four years in a single Province, there were cases in which over-zealous or unscrupulous agents did exceed their instructions and acted contrary to the orders of Government; in fact, I know that such cases did occur, because we succeeded in prosecuting many such cases in which people had endeavoured to extort money under pretence of pushing the recruiting, and prosecuting them to conviction.

7937. Has it not been the policy of the Home Rule League in recent years to attribute the ills which afflict India to the British Government, and to assert that they would all be cured by Home Rule?—I think that Home Rule has been generally put forward as a panacea for every evil.

7938. But has not the unfortunate effect of that been to stir up racial antagonism in many places where it did not exist before?—I am afraid so.

7939-40. When rioting broke out in the Punjab was there evidence of organised preparation?—Yes, unmistakable evidence.

7941. Was the attitude of the mobs distinctly anti-Government and anti-British?—Yes, unfortunately, it was.

7942-44. Is not that rather a new feature?—Yes, in the Punjab, quite new.

7946. On that particular occasion it was necessary that the most prompt decisions should be taken to avert a great disaster?—Yes, I found myself in that position. I had to decide as speedily as possible, knowing that I had to accept full responsibility for the decision; but if I had to share that responsibility with somebody else, even though one had the emergent powers, the inevitable tendency would be to delay delay and consult, and I believe in this particular case to which you refer that delay would have meant disaster.

7947. I gather from the whole of your evidence that you are most anxious, as we all are, for liberal changes in the administration of India?—Yes.

7948. But that you consider that the proposals of the five Governors, coupled with these other very great changes which you have specified, do make a very marked advance in the direction of self-government?—Yes.

7949. Do you consider that in the interests of the masses of India it is safe at the present time to weaken the supreme Government when you are making great new experiments in the Provinces?—No; I think it is undesirable to go further than the Government of India has proposed to go, at least pending the report of the first Statutory Commission.

Chairman.] Thank you for your evidence.

Mr. J. H. OLDHAM is called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

7950. You have submitted to us a very full Memorandum, which I understand you will revise, on behalf of a Committee of the Conference of Missionary Societies in Great Britain and Ireland?—Yes. (The following statement was submitted by the Witness):—

1. Body by whom the statement is submitted.—This statement is submitted by a Committee appointed by the Conference of Missionary Societies in Great Britain and Ireland to consider the constitutional reforms of India, and in particular their bearing upon the future of Indian education and the educational work of Christian Missions. All the larger British Missionary Societies carrying on work in India other than the Roman Catholics are officially represented in the Conference. There has not been time to submit the statement to the Missionary Societies for their approval. The Committee has, therefore, no formal authority to speak for the Missionary Societies, but it includes officers and members of the Committees of all the larger Missionary Societies. It has had before it memoranda by the Missionary Education Council of South India, submitted by request to the Madras Government and to Lord Southborough's Committee, and a further memorandum prepared after the publication of the Report of Lord Southborough's Committee. The Missionary Education Council of South India is a body representing 30 different Missions in the Madras Presidency. The Committee has also received communications from representative missionary bodies and individual missionaries in other Provinces, and has had personal conference with a number of educational missionaries at present in this country. The Committee is in close touch with the Foreign Missions Conference of North America, in which all the principal Missionary Societies of the United States and Canada are represented, and believes that American missionary opinion is likely in the main to be in accord with British missionary opinion.

2. Reasons for submitting statement.—We wish to state clearly at the outset that our purpose in giving evidence before the Joint Select Committee is not to seek any special protection or exceptional treatment for Christian Missions. These missions have had in the past abundant evidence that their efforts to serve India have been appreciated and welcomed by Indians, and they believe that so long as they sincerely seek to promote the true interests of India they may rely with confidence in the future on the good will and friendliness of its people. The reason which prompts the Missionary Societies to give evidence in connection with the Bill at present before Parliament is that they have had in the past, and still have, a substantial share in the education of India, and they consider it to be their duty at this critical time in the history of India to place such experience as they have gained at the disposal of those on whom rests the responsibility of momentous and far-reaching decisions. What we wish to say has to do primarily with the ideals which should control and inspire Indian education and with political method and administrative machinery only in so far as they affect the realisation of these ideals.

3. Share of Christian Missions in Indian Education.—The share of Christian Missions in Indian education may be shown in the following figures. The last Quinquennial Review of Education in India shows that 42 arts colleges with 11,579 pupils, or about one-quarter of the whole, are under missionary management. Christian Missions are carrying on 843 secondary schools with 160,952 pupils, and over 9,000 primary schools with more than 350,000 pupils. The official statistics do not show the exact proportion of this work which is being maintained by the Missionary Societies represented in the Missionary Conferences in Great Britain and North America. The total number of pupils being educated by Roman Catholic Missions in schools of all grades, however, is stated to be approximately 108,000, and it may be assumed that the remainder of those in Christian institutions are being educated by Anglican and Protestant Missions.

4. Sympathy with Pronouncement of August 20th, 1917.—We desire to place on record our cordial approval of and sympathy with the principles contained in the pronouncement of August 20th, 1917. In this we believe we have the practically unanimous support of missionary opinion. We are impelled by the fundamental teachings of Christianity to seek for all men the fullest life possible for them. Believing the exercise of political responsibility to be one of the chief means of developing manhood and of strengthening character, we heartily welcome a policy which aims at giving to the people of India increased responsibility for the management of their own affairs.

5. Importance of Education in relation to proposed Reforms.—We wish to express as strongly as possible our conviction that in the attempt to carry out the policy announced on August 20th, 1917, the question of education is central and vital. The importance of education in relation to the constitutional reforms is recognised in the report of the Secretary of State and the Viceroy. It appears to us, however, that in the inevitable concentration of attention on the political aspects of the reforms and the administrative questions involved there is a danger of losing sight of the central importance of the subject of education. It is acknowledged on all hands that the success of the reforms depends on the creation of an intelligent and public-spirited electorate. This indispensable foundation of all real progress can, however, only be laid if the establishment of a sound system of national education is recognised to be a primary necessity. The most urgent problem in India seems to us to be a wider diffusion of the advantages of education, and the imbuing of the mind of the rising generation, and in particular of the future leaders of the people, with just and worthy conceptions of life and conduct and true ideals of public life and citizenship. We desire to make clear that the education we have in view is not one shaped in accordance with Western traditions and ideas, but one based on the assured results of modern knowledge and expressing what is best in Indian tradition and culture as well as in the educational ideals of the West. We recognise that there is a high Indian tradition in regard to education, and that there is much in common between the best in Western ideals of education and the traits which Mr. Ramendra Sunder Trivedi, in the memorandum submitted by him to the Calcutta University Commission, selects as characteristic of education in ancient India. (Report, Chapter XXX., paras. 34-8.) The vital importance of sound education to the progress of India has been emphasised by many leaders of Indian thought thought and affairs. We desire to give our whole-hearted support to what they have said on the subject, and to urge that no matter connected with the constitutional reforms is of greater importance than to lay sure foundations for a well-considered and properly co-ordinated system of national education.

As the Calcutta University Commission has shown, educational advance is possible only through a largely increased expenditure of funds. We wish to express our strong conviction that if the proposed reforms are to achieve their purpose it is essential that much larger funds should be available for education, and that there should be such reform and reorganisation of education as will ensure that the funds are expended to the best advantage.

6. The Unity of Education.—We hold that national education in all its grades is a unity. Believing one of the chief needs of India at the present time to be a properly co-ordinated system of national education, we feel that from the educational standpoint there would be grave disadvantages in the separation of the administration of elementary education from that of the higher grades. This matter was dealt with so fully by Sir Michael Sadler in his evidence that we need only say that, as a Committee, we attach great weight to the considerations which he put forward—the necessity of making proper provision for the transfer of pupils from the primary to the secondary school; the desirability of unifying the education of girls; the need of increased attention to the vernacular in the higher stages; the great importance of educating the village community as a whole, adults as well as children; and the advantage of a single administration for efficient inspection and the best allocation of funds. To these considerations we would add, in view of the acknowledged necessity of giving to Indian education a more practical turn, the desirability of linking as closely as possible practical and especially agricultural training in village schools with the teaching of these subjects in higher institutions.

The Missionary Education Council of South India, however, in the memoranda already referred to, take the view that, important as the unity of education is in principle, it is necessary in present circumstances to take account of political as well as educational considerations. Holding that the policy announced by His Majesty's Government necessitates a beginning being made in the transfer of education as of other functions of government, they believe that if education is to be gradually transferred, the part which can with most advantage be transferred at once is elementary education. They are of opinion that this course is in existing circumstances more for the advantage of Indian education than either the reservation of education as a whole or the immediate transfer of the whole. Moreover, they see certain positive advantages in the adoption of such a course. Indian education is at present top-heavy, and will remain so until elementary education comes to its own. One reason, if not the main reason, why elementary education has failed to obtain its proper place is that the courses have too much affinity with secondary courses: they do not attract the ordinary village pupil, and to the parent they seem of very little value. It seems to the Council, therefore, that an Indian Minister in close touch with the various sections of the people is peculiarly fitted to deal sympathetically and successfully with this situation, and that it would be of advantage if for a period of years he could devote his undivided attention to elementary education.

There are thus in regard to this matter two tendencies in missionary opinion—one attaching such importance to the unity of education as to be unwilling to subordinate it to any other consideration, and the other holding that in the political circumstances the least disadvantageous course is to make a beginning with the immediate transfer of elementary education.

7. Missionary Attitude towards the Transfer of Education.—It seems to us axiomatic that the people of India should be free to shape Indian education in accordance with their own ideas and should not have imposed on them an education framed according to Western conceptions. We believe missionary opinion to be in favour of the transfer of education as soon as the conditions are created which will provide real and instructed educational opinion in India with an adequate opportunity of shaping educational development. But, while favourable to transfer in principle, almost all our correspondents have expressed grave the urgent need for the complete reform of education under existing conditions will prove the course most likely to result in real educational progress.

8. Need for Reform.—It is admitted on all sides that Indian education at the present time is suffering from grave defects. This is so entirely common ground that it is unnecessary for us to enlarge upon it. The most important event in the history of Indian education since the Education Commission of 1882 is the Report of the Calcutta University Commission. The report affirms in the strongest terms the urgent need for the complete reform of education in Bengal. The Commission state that education in Bengal "has reached a stage at which further satisfactory progress is impossible without a complete reorganisation of the existing administrative conditions—there can be no substantial improvement without reconstruction. The existing system cannot be patched up. What is needed is far-reaching reorganisation." (Chapter XXXI., para. 14.)

Educational conditions are doubtless better, and in some instances much better, in other provinces than in Bengal, and there may not be elsewhere the same need for radical reconstruction. But it cannot be doubted that throughout India there is need for fresh advance and new constructive effort, and for some measure of reorganisation, more especially in view of so great a change as transfer to the new popular government.

9. Board of Secondary and Intermediate Education.—One of the most important recommendations of the Calcutta University Commission is the establishment of a Board of Secondary and Intermediate Education. In the light of the evidence received by the Commission it is held that a thorough-going reform of secondary and higher education in Bengal is the most urgent and pressing need. (Chapter XXX., para. 18.) A radical reform of existing conditions of secondary education is stated to be necesary not only for university reform but also for national progress in Bengal. (Chapter LII., para. 3.)

In stating the reasons for recommending the appointment of a Board of Secondary and Intermediate Education the Commission point out that in England the most influential of the secondary schools are wealthy foundations which are virtually independent and could resist successfully any action of the Board of Education which threatened their freedom of initiative. In Bengal, on the other hand, there are no Indian educational institutions corresponding to these great endowed schools and therefore able to maintain their independence against mistaken interference on the part of a body of officials. The safeguard of public opinion, therefore, which in English administration is in part secured by the virtual autonomy of the great secondary schools, must be provided for in some other way in the administration of secondary education in Bengal. Again, while in England local educational authorities are very strong and neutralise any tendency towards excessive centralisation of educational control. In Bengal the local educational authorities are weak and have little influence in higher secondary education. It is necessary, therefore, that in the educational administration of Bengal there should be some influence which will serve as a make-weight against the otherwise preponderating influence of a central body of officials. (Chapter XXXI., para. 37). For these reasons the Commission recommend for the control of secondary and intermediate education the creation of a board which, by its constitution, will combine expert judgment with an intimate knowledge of the needs and sentiments of the community which it serves.

There has not been time to obtain from educational missionaries in India any expression of opinion in regard to the recommendations of the Calcutta University Commission, and without much closer examination we are not in a position to support them in detail.

We

We desire merely to point out that in the event of the transfer of education the establishment in all provinces of such a board as has been proposed for Bengal would be of great advantage in helping to ensure that the direction and shaping of Indian education should, as far as possible, be in the hands of those best qualified by knowledge and experience to develop it on sound educational principles and to adapt it to the real needs of the community.

10. Education of Women.—In consideration of the transfer of education the requirements of the education of women deserve special attention. As was pointed out in a Government Order of 1916, the disparity of education between the two sexes constitutes a great danger to the social well-being of Indian communities and must impose a serious obstacle to the well-balanced development of their intellectual and political progress. The recent impulse to women's education has been almost entirely Western and largely missionary in origin. In the Madras Presidency two of the three women's arts colleges are managed by missionaries and one by Government, and of the 39 girls high schools 33 are missionary and six Government. Owing to the backwardness of women's education Indian women qualified for responsible posts in teaching and administration are as yet few in number, but if the present development can be maintained without disturbance there is every hope that in time there will be produced a body of experienced Indian women able both to devise the principles of a truly national system of feminine education and to carry out these principles in the practical details of teaching and administration. Until that time arrives the needs of women's education will require special attention and the advice and assistance of women will be indispensable. We therefore attach great importance to the recommendation of the Calcutta University Commission that in connection with the proposed Board of Secondary and Intermediate Education there should be a special body, consisting very largely of women, acting under and reporting to the Board, to advise in regard to the content, methods and organisation of the education of girls (Chapter XXXVI., para. 5); and to the further suggestion that a special board should be constituted in the University to organise the provision of more advanced education for women and to make proposals regarding the adaptation of the university degree courses to the needs of women. (Chapter XXXVI., para. 17; XXXVII., para. 84.)

11. Education of Backward Classes.—Christian missions have given, and are at present giving, special attention to the education of the backward classes. Experience has shown how important it is in present conditions in India to secure that the needs of these classes receive adequate consideration. We are therefore strongly in favour of the recommendation of the Calcutta University Commission, that the proposed Board of Secondary and Intermediate Education should appoint an advisory committee which it could consult on questions affecting the educational welfare of the now backward classes. We also are in agreement with Lord Southborough's Committee on the Division of Functions that if education is transferred it is desirable that a clause should be included in the Governor's instructions that due provision is made for the educational advancement of depressed and backward classes. Lord Southborough's Committee recommend that this should apply to Madras only, but we are of opinion that it should be extended to other provinces also.

12. Opportunity for Private Effort.—Throughout the growth of English education in India Christian missions have consistently given their support to the policy laid down in the Dispatch of 1854, and endorsed by the Education Commission of 1882-3, that in the extension to the people of India of the advantages of education the main reliance should be on private effort under State inspection and aided by Government grants. They have done so because they have believed variety of experiment and individual initiative to be essential to sound educational progress. The Calcutta University Commission recognise that it is necessary to take precautions to guard secondary education against State interference with freedom in schools, and to seek for some new synthesis between State supervision and private effort. (Chapter IV., para. 41). In their view the crucial problem in Indian, as in English education, is to discover a way of giving public subsidy to education without hampering the freedom of those teachers who are qualified for their work (Chap. XXX., para. 43), and this seems to us also one of the most important of all questions in the reorganisation of Indian education.

We observe that Lord Southborough's Committee on the Division of Functions recommend that in the event of education being made a transferred subject a clause should be included in the Governor's instructions requiring him to take care that no change of educational policy affecting adversely Government assistance afforded to existing institutions maintained or controlled by religious bodies is adopted without due consideration. We have already stated that we do not wish to ask for any special or exceptional treatment of missionary interests. But in the event of transfer some such instruction as is proposed might be desirable for the purpose of securing the continued contribution to Indian education, not of mission schools in particular, but of all institutions which have moral and religious aims according to any one of the faiths now prevalent in India. We believe that, apart from a comparatively small number of educated leaders who have come under Western influences, the one thing which India does not want is secular education, and we attach the greatest importance to the conservation of the policy which has inspired Indian education in the past, and has left room within the national system for institutions giving education definitely based on religion. As a means of ensuring the continuance of this policy, however, we attach less importance to a clause in the Governor's instructions than to the recommendations of the Calcutta University Commission for the establishment of a Board of Secondary and Intermediate Education. Provided that the direction of education is in the hands of a genuinely educational body, we do not believe that institutions giving a sound education will be allowed to suffer.

13.—Transfer Advisable only on Certain Conditions.—We have already stated that we are favourable in principle to the transfer of education, but that it is, we believe, the almost unanimous opinion of missionary educators that transfer under existing conditions would not be in the best interests of progress in education, and that if education is to be transferred far-reaching reform and re-organisation is necessary. We do not think that there is a wide gulf between this opinion and the view expressed by Sir Michael Sadler. Sir Michael Sadler, in giving evidence before the Joint Select Committee, stated that his personal judgment inclined decisively to the view that it would be wise to transfer the whole of education on the conditions, first, that the Universities are reorganised; second, that there is a board for secondary and intermediate education; and thirdly, if it were felt that a Minister would gain by such advice, that a board differently constituted might be set up to help him with regard to primary education. He did not deal with the question of how effect might be given to these conditions. The opinion of missionary educators, so far as we have been able to ascertain it, is that if education were transferred without effect being given to the conditions the real educational interests of India would be prejudiced.

14.—Steps to Create Conditions Necessary for Transfer.—The question therefore arises whether the necessary reform and reorganisation of Indian education can best be carried out under the existing administration or by the new popular government. It seems to us doubtful whether the early and experimental stages of popular government would provide favourable conditions for giving effect to a large and comprehensive scheme of educational reform. We think that the reform of education in the directions pointed out by the Report of the Calcutta University Commission is more likely to be carried out if the responsibility for giving effect to it rests with that part of the Government which has had the larger administrative experience.

15.—Responsibility of Central Government for Education in the Event of Transfer.—In considering the proposal to transfer the whole of education we think that careful consideration needs to be given to the effect of such a change upon the relation of the Central Government to educational development. In accordance with the scheme of the present Bill, education, if transferred, will become entirely a provincial matter and pass altogether out of the hands of the Central Government. Education is already, and ought to be, largely a provincial matter, and the Provinces should be free to develop on their own lines. But it does not seem to us in the interests of Indian education that the Central Government should be relieved of all responsibility for the educational progress of India. We urge this not because the Central Government is for the present less subject to popular control, but solely on the ground that it is central and therefore better able to take account of the needs of the country as a whole.

The Calcutta University Commission expressed the opinion that it is impossible for the supreme Government of India to dissociate itself from the work of the Universities, and that, however far the process of devolution to provincial governments may be carried, in the educational sphere there must necessarily remain many functions of the highest importance which the Government of India, and only the Government of India, can perform. These functions include the power of passing Acts or charters constituting universities, or of modifying or revising the Acts or charters of existing universities and the functions of visitation, co-ordination, stimulating and promoting research and assistance in recruitment (Chap. I., paras. 43-5). Apart from the needs of universities it seems doubtful whether, under present conditions, the largest developments in Indian education can be looked for without the assistance of the wider outlook, co-ordinating power and stimulating influence of the central Government. In particular it may be questioned whether the Provinces without the help of the central Government could carry through independently large schemes of educational reform and reorganisation on the scale and in the manner best calculated to further national development. But if the whole of education is made a transferred subject it would seem, according to the fundamental principles of the Bill, that the reform and reorganisation of education will be a matter entirely for the new provincial legislations.

16. Policy suggested by the Foregoing Considerations.—The conclusion to which we are led by the considerations we have put forward is that it is right that education should be transferred as speedily as possible to popular control, but that this should be conditional on such reorganisation as will provide the most favourable opportunity for progress under the new conditions. We hope that it is clear from the grounds on which we advocate such a course that we have no desire to restrict the area of responsibility which it is proposed to transfer to Indian lands. We believe that if the policy of the pronouncement of August 20th, 1917, is adopted it is necessary for the success of the reforms that they should be made in a generous and ungrudging spirit, and it is far removed from our purpose to lend support to any attempt to whittle down the proposals of the present Bill. The real meaning of the view we put forward is that the sharp alternative of reservation or transfer is from the educational standpoint a false alternative. It tends to obscure what is in reality the supreme need of Indian education, namely, a constructive effort for advance and reform, in the carrying out of which the best in Indian tradition and ideals can be combined with what Western experience is able to contribute. We think that education should be reserved only if it is intended to take immediate steps to create the conditions which will make early transference possible. What in our view would most further the cause of education would be a movement in which the Government, Indian opinion and such private agencies as missionary institutions might unite to lay the foundations of a sound and co-ordinated system of national education.

If it should be decided to reserve education temporarily with a view to early transfer we suggest that conferences might at once be set up in the different Provinces to consider and prepare schemes of educational reform with a view to legislation, and that to co-ordinate the efforts of the different Provinces a similar conference should be appointed by the Government of India. On these conferences the Universities, the Educational Department, and private agencies ought to be adequately represented.

17. Conditions in the Event of Transfer.—If it should be decided that it is best to transfer the whole of education immediately, we are of opinion that the recommendation of Lord Southborough's Committee with reference to Bengal, namely, that education should be transferred subject to Indian legislation in regard to the reorganisation of the University and the control and organisation of secondary education, should be applied to other Provinces also.

18. Elementary Education.—What we have said in the preceding paragraphs has reference more particularly to University and secondary education. We have already expressed our conviction that the great need of India is a genuinely national system of education, and that education in all its grades needs to be viewed as a whole. We believe that the best chance of securing a wider diffusion of elementary education and of its wise adaptation to the needs of the community, more particularly in rural areas, is that it should be taken in hand as part of a national effort to deal with the whole of education. But, as we have already indicated, a considerable body of missionary opinion holds that elementary education can with advantage be transferred immediately as the first step towards the transfer of the whole of education.

Whatever course may be adopted, we wish to emphasize the immense importance for the progress of India and the success of the constitutional reforms of discovering and applying the right kind of elementary education adapted to the needs of Indian life. This subject is at the present time engaging the close attention of the missionary bodies. They recognise that the kind of education adapted to the actual conditions of village life and best suited to promote the economic, social and moral advancement of the village community has still to be found. With a view to obtaining fresh light on this important problem the missionary societies of Great Britain and America have sent to India a special commission of inquiry, under the chairmanship of the Rev. A. G. Fraser, Principal of Trinity College, Kandy. His colleagues include the Bishop of Domakal; Mr. K. T. Paul, General Secretary of the Indian National Council of Young Men's Christian Associations; Miss Allan, Principal of Homerton College, Cambridge; Professor D. J. Fleming, formerly of the Forman Christian College, Lahore, and now of Union Theological Seminary, New York; and the Rev. J. H. Maclean, of the United Free Church of Scotland Mission in Madras. Three of the members of the commission have proceeded to India via the United States, Japan and the Philippines with a view to studying elementary education, and particularly rural education, in these countries. We hope that the report of this commission, when published, may be of some service to those responsible for the development of primary education in India. In view of the immense importance of elementary education in relation to the new political experiments in India and the progress of the country generally we trust that in the event of its being put under the control of an Indian Minister consideration may be given to the advisability of providing him with the assistance of a board similar to that proposed by the Calcutta Unversity Commission for the direction of secondary education in Bengal. We are of opinion that his hands might be greatly strengthened by the advice of such a board on which both expert knowledge and a knowledge of the needs of the community to be served would be represented.

19. Religious Toleration.—We desire to call attention to the bearing of the proposed reforms on the principles of religious toleration and religious impartiality, as set forth in the Royal Proclamation of 1857, on which British rule in India has been based. We are not sure that the terms of the Bill sufficiently provide that legislation affecting freedom of conscience or religion or discriminating against any class of His Majesty's subjects on the ground of their religious beliefs may not be passed without the previous sanction of the Governor-General We desire also to direct attention to the importance of including among the laws "declared by rules under the principal Act to be a law which cannot be repeated or altered by by the local Legislature without previous sanction" all laws securing the rights and liberties of Indian Christians, and in particular the Caste Disabilities Removal Act of 1850.

7951. In regard to this question, we will not ask you to repeat here anything which is in your Memorandum. The position is that whatever part of your statement you wish will be finally included in our notes. Therefore, what we would ask you, for the moment, is only to add anything that you may think is necessary, in addition to the statement. What I gather from the statement is that you desire to express or feel sympathy with the reforms, and that you wish specially to impress the importance of education in relation to them. Might I ask whether you would explain in a few words this portion of your statement. You hold that national education in all its grades is a unity; you do not desire the separation of elementary education and that of the higher grades, but on the whole I gather that you are in favour of a transfer of primary education in the first instance. Is that so?—There are, I think, two currents of missionary opinion on the subject. There is one body of opinion which holds with Sir Michael Sadler. Our Committee was very much impressed with the evidence which he gave here as regards the unity of education, and holds that that unity is a matter of very great importance. The Missionary Education Council, which is a strong missionary body in the Madras Presidency, and a number of other missionaries, hold that is is desirable that the transfer of education should be proceeded with by stages, and they take the view that, while holding to the ideal of unity of education, it is desirable to make a beginning by the transfer of elementary education, and that there are certain positive educational advantages in making that transfer. They feel that elementary education has tended to be sacrificed to the requirements of secondary education, and that a temporary concentration of attention by an Indian Minister on elementary education would have certain positive advantages. But there is another body of missionary opinion, which attaches such great importance at the present juncture to conceiving the whole of education in India as a unity and to an attempt to lay the foundations for a genuinely national system properly co-ordinated in all its grades, that they are not in favour of any separation of that kind.

7952. Your general opinion is, is it not, that the subject is a very vast one, and that in any case, on the lines we have had in Great Britain, where there has always been a Board of Education, it is desirable not to put it into the hands of any individual exclusively without the assistance of a Board?—Our general view is that, while we regard it as axiomatic that education in India ought to be directed by Indians in accordance with their own ideas, and therefore, while we are entirely in favour of transfer in principle, we see serious difficulties in transfer under existing conditions. The Calcutta University Commission Report has expressed in the strongest terms that in Bengal there is need for very thorough reconstruction and reorganisation unless the system is to break down altogether. We feel the conditions are not the same in other Provinces, but that everywhere there is need of strong advance, and, if there is to be transfer, of the re-examination of the foundations of the educational system. Our view is not very different from that expressed by Sir Michael Sadler, who said that he was in favour of transfer, subject to three conditions: First, re-organisation of the Universities; secondly, the establishment of a Board of Secondary and Intermediate Education; and, thirdly, a Board for primary education. Our unanimous view is that those conditions ought to be given effect to in the interests of Indian education, and that transfer, without effect being given to those conditions, would not make for real educational progress. There are three points to which we attach exceptional importance in any reform, and which we think need to be safeguarded in the event of transfer. The first is the establishment of this Board of Secondary and Intermediate Education, which the Calcutta University Commission recommended for Bengal. I had an opportunity of consulting Dr. William Miller, who is one of the great names in education in Madras, and I asked him whether, in view of conditions in the Madras Presidency, he felt that a similar Board would apply to the conditions in Madras, or whether he knew of any other device which would safeguard the interests that we think ought to be safeguarded. His reply to the first question was yes and to the second no. In the event of transfer he thought there should be such a Board. The reason why the Calcutta University Commission recommended it is that they point out that it is essential that you should have a makeweight against excessive control by a body of officials; and throughout the history of Indian education Christian missions have stood for that. We feel that perhaps one of the most important services which the Missionary Institutions have rendered to Indian education is that they have been probably the most powerful force against an excessive centralisation under the Department. We feel it is essential, if there is to be transfer, that some means should be found by which you could have a body on which there should be represented both expert knowledge and a knowledge of the needs of the community; and we think that the proposal of the Calcutta University Commission creates such a body. Then we feel that the educational interests of certain classes need to be safeguarded, in particular the education of women. Their education has been very largely the work of the missionaries. In the Madras Presidency out of thirty-nine girls' high schools thirty-three are managed by missionaries and six Government. I have not figures for the other provinces but the conditions are, I believe, somewhat similar. Therefore we attach very great importance to the suggestion of the Calcutta University Commission that there should be an advisory body composed mainly of women, both in connection with the proposed Board of Secondary and Intermediate Education and in the Universities. We feel that the question of education of women in India is probably the largest question making for national progress there, and our experience in this country has been that the education of women has been the work of women, and we think it is essential that there should be the co-operation of women in promoting the education of women in India. The other classes whose interests we feel should be safeguarded are the backward classes, to which the missionaries have devoted very special attention. The third point which we regard as essential and as needing to be safeguarded in any scheme of reform in education is that there should be preserved an adequate opportunity for private effort. The educational policy since the dispatch of 1854 has been definitely based on placing main reliance on private effort. We quite recognise that the time has come when there must be some change from that system, and that you can only get an adequate national system if you bring all the resources of the State to bear to secure it. At the same time, in making that change we feel, and the Calcutta University Commission are with us in this, that it is necessary to safeguard schools against excessive interference with freedom, and that there needs to be some new synthesis between State supervision and private effort. We think that is a matter which needs very careful attention.

7953. We quite understand that your main concern is as to the method of progress, but you are entirely in favour of it. You appreciate that the rural districts may suffer, I suppose, if things were too much in the hands of those who represent the towns?—Yes, I think that is one matter that would need to be carefully considered.

7955. I notice you put great stress on the necessity of having women teachers. Women's education must be delayed until women teachers have been educated?—Yes.

7956. Will you not have some difficulty also in regard to male teachers if there is a much more general spread of primary education?—Yes, that is one of the great problems. Our difficulty is that the whole question of village education in particular needs thorough, fresh examination; and we have sent out a very strong joint American, British, and Indian Commission to study that problem—not merely the question of the curriculum of village schools, but the question of educating the whole community, raising its economic, social, and moral life.

7957. Apart from the feelings of educated Indians on this subject, of which we have had ample evidence, do you think there is a widespread desire to take advantage of education if the opportunity is offered, or do you think there will be, as there was in this country after the 1870 Act, a difficulty about getting people to send their children to school?—You are speaking of primary education?

7958. Primary education?—That difficulty is very real. We think one of the causes is that the present education is not really adapted to the needs of village life. The parents are probably justified in not wanting their children to be educated, because it is not sufficiently closely related to the real needs of village life. That is a problem which our Commission is endeavouring to investigate. But we think a great extension of education is vital for the success of reforms. Without creating an intelligent and educated electorate reforms have no chance of success.

7959. Do you think your Association would be able to give some valuable help in applying the right kind of elementary education to Indian life?—We have sent out what we think is a very strong educational Commission to investigate that whole problem. They are visiting the United States, Japan, and the Philippines, and are studying the problems of rural education there. They are a body possessing strong qualifications for this work.

7960. I think we thoroughly understand your attitude to the education question. There is one other point which is raised in your Memorandum, and that is with regard to religious toleration. You are a little apprehensive as to the bearing of the proposed reforms on religious toleration and impartiality, on the principles set forth in the Royal Proclamation of 1857. How do you think that is affected by the Bill?—We merely wish to direct attention to the question of whether religious freedom and toleration are sufficiently safeguarded under the provisions of the Bill. We observe that in the list of subjects, which cannot be dealt with without previous sanction from the Indian Government—I think it is in Clause 8 of the Bill—clause (e), which refers to any law affecting religion and religious usages and rites of any particular class of His Majesty's subjects, has been omitted. We do not wish to question that omission; there are probably good reasons for it; but we wish to raise the question as to whether it may not be desirable to insert some provision that would secure that any law affecting freedom of conscience or discriminating in any way between any classes of His Majesty's subjects on the ground of their religious beliefs should require previous sanction.

Lord Sydenham.

7960A. I am sure all the missionary bodies are at one in feeling that we must have a great advance in elementary education in India?—Yes.

7962. Do you think that you can at this stage entrust education to a Indian Minister, and be certain that he will handle it with absolute impartiality from the religious point of view?—I think that one advantage of entrusting it to an Indian Minister, if he were a man of strong character and had a real belief in education, is that you might get a larger measure of popular support, and that possibly he would be better able to secure the funds that are required; because it is largely a matter of finance. As regards the question of impartiality in religious matters, our main contention, which is that of the Calcutta University Commission, is that in the transfer of education, the control should be, as far as possible, in the hands of a body of educationalists. That, we believe, and the Calcutta University Commission is with us, would be secured by this Board of secondary and intermediate education. That is why we attach such great importance to it. We think it is equally important in the sphere of primary education.

7963. Then I rather understand that you would not transfer anything until certain considerable reforms had been carried out in education?—That is our view with reference to the reforms to which we refer in our statement, but it is conditional on steps being taken at once to give effect to the reforms and to create the conditions which would make early transfer possible. We are not in favour of reservation in the sense of leaving things as they are at present. It seems to us that the principle of diarchy, which we are not disposed to question, presents us with what, from of the standpoint of education in India, is a false alternative; it seems to create an antithesis between British and Indian control of education; whereas it seems to us that in the educational interests of India the really important thing is that the existing Government with its administrative experience, and in particular the Government of India, should co-operate with progressive Indian opinion in laying the foundations of a genuinely national system.

7964. Of course you realise that it may be many years before Bengal gets the proposals of the Sadler Committee carried?—Yes, we do.

7965. It would make Bengal singular in matters of higher education from all the Provinces of India; therefore to bring Indian education an a proper basis those reforms would have to be carried out in every Province, with the expense which is enormous. So that the probability is that it will be very many years before this great change could take place; and you would not until then transfer education?—We are anxious that the transfer should take place as speedily as possible. We think that certain conditions ought first to be fulfilled in the interests of educational progress in India. Our view would be that what is desirable is that immediate steps should be taken to prepare the way for carrying out those reforms. We have ventured on the suggestion that conferences might be set up at once in the different Provinces to prepare proposals leading to reform. But one point to which we desire rather strongly to call attention is this. It is raised by the question which you asked about Bengal. If we understand the principles of the Bill rightly, the transfer of education will necessarily mean provincialisation. As we understand the principles of the Bill, the Central Government will want to keep its hands off transferred subjects. It seems to us, looking at the matter not at all from the point of view that there is a smaller popular element on the Central Government, but solely from the fact that the Central Government is central, that it is rather an important matter for the Indian Government not to abrogate entirely responsibility for the education of the people of India. Trying to view the matter from the standpoint of an Indian Nationalist, I should feel doubtful whether it is desirable to embark on a course the tendency of which is provincialisation of education. I understand in the United States the tendency has been for the Federal Government increasingly to take part in the promotion of education, and it is difficult to see how the Indian Government can, without serious loss to Indian education, divest itself of some measure of responsibility.

7966. That, I think, is the only point on which I incline to differ from you. I cannot see, especially in elementary and secondary education, that the Government of India can really do any good whatever. They are more likely to destroy the responsibility of Provincial Governments and to damp their efforts. All my experience, when the Government of India took a very large part in education, was in that direction. Do you not think that forty millions of people are quite enough for an educational body to handle, without going to the 244 millions?—We recognise that education at the present moment is a mainly Provincial matter. We entirely agree that administratively it ought to be a Provincial matter, but we doubt whether, without some co-ordinating influence and without a certain amount of assistance from the Central Government, there will be educational development in all the Provinces on harmonious lines and on the most effective lines, even in the sphere of primary education. I think we have an analogy in the United States. A body like the Government of India might be better in a position to make some big experiment on a large scale in regard to primary education, or at any rate to stimulate it, than could be done if the

the matter was left entirely to provincial Governments. Still more in the sphere of secondary education is there room for co-ordination; and in the University sphere it is absolutely essential.

7967. In the Universities, I agree. You know that there have been proposals to establish a conscience clause in education?—Yes.

7968. Indian proposals?—Yes.

7969. Which might very seriously affect mission work?—Yes.

7970. I suppose that would be provided against by instructions given to the Governors—against the passing of any conscience clause which might interfere with your work?—We are not anxious to have any special protection for missionary institutions as such. What we regard as the chief safeguard is that provision should be made that education should be in the hands of a genuinely educational body. We think that is the chief protection; but we do feel, with regard to the proposal of Lord Southborough's Committee, as regards instructions to a Governor, that there is an important point which needs to be safeguarded, for the preservation within the national system of particular institutions which have a moral and religious aim, whatever the faith may be which is taught. As far as our knowledge of India goes, we believe there is no desire for secular education. That is a western idea. We think it is important that institutions having moral and religious aims should have their place preserved within the national system of education.

7971. You do not forget the destruction of the mission building at Amritsar the other day. That was a very ominous sign?—I am not familiar with the facts.

Sir J. D. Rees.

7971A. Your memorandum does not speak for the Catholic missionaries at all?—No.

7972. Is a similar conference to be held, and will they submit a similar representation?—So far as I am aware, I do not think that is probable; and of course the Roman Catholic missionaries in India are largely foreign, in nationality not British.

7973. Are not the Catholic missionaries larger in number in India than the Protestant?—In South India.

7974. But are they, taking the whole of India?—I think numerically they are; educationally their work is about one-fifth.

7975. You differ from Sir Michael Sadler, and think that education should be made a transfered subject?—

Sir Michael Sadler was in favour of the transfer of education, subject to certain conditions. Our view is that there should be transfer when effect is given to those conditions.

7976. You think it may be done, but not now?—We think effect ought to be given to the conditions.

7977. They are rather large conditions?—Yes.

7978. They will take some time?—Yes.

7979. The effect of your representation is that education should not now be made a transferred subject. Am I right?—On the condition that there is no reservation without definite steps towards giving effect to those conditions.

7980. The rest of your paper to a great extent consists of pressing the adoption of the recommendations of the Calcutta University Commission's report?—Yes.

7981. The chief recommendations?—Yes, those referred to in our statement.

7982. You realise that they will cost a very large sum of money; indeed, you refer to that?—Yes, we do.

7983. I take it that the bodies you represent work amongst the poor people; because the Christians are always the poor. Are you prepared to impose upon them considerably increased taxation to bring about these benefits?—We realise that taxation might be facilitated if the matter were transferred to an Indian Minister—that that would help towards taxation; but the particular points of the Calcutta University Commission on which we lay stress are not those relating to finance. We do hold very strongly the view that there ought to be increased financial expenditure in the interests of the success of the present constitutional experiment and the extension of educatio But the particular points on which in our paper we lay stress, relate to the organisation of education and not necessarily to its financing.

7984. Are you prepared to impose taxation upon the Christians in India for the purpose of carrying out the Calcutta University Commission reform scheme which you approve of, and press upon this Committee, or, if not, have you considered where the money is to come from, and who is to be taxed to get it?—That is not a question on which we feel we are competent to express a judgment.

7985. But you want the money?—We regard it as a desirable end, unquestionably.

7986. But you have not gone into that?—No.

Chairman.] Thank you for your evidence.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF SELBORNE IN THE CHAIR.

SIR JOHN PRESCOTT HEWETT, G.C.S.I., C.I.E., is called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

7987. May I ask when you left India?—In September, 1912.

7988. What was the last post you held there?—The last post that I held was the office of Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces, and before that I had been in the Council of the Governor-General as member in charge of Commerce and Industry.

7989. And that was at the end of how many years' service in India?—Between thirty-four and thirty-five.

7990. And since you came back you have been a member of the Council of India?—No.

7991. Not at all?—No.

Chairman—continued.

7992. We have had the advantage of having before us your pamphlet and your answers to the questions which we put to you?—Yes.

The questions and answers are as follows:—

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India? and, if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"? And do you generally accept the proposition contained in the Preamble?—The Government is responsible for devising a scheme to carry out out the pledge of August 20th, 1917. That scheme must provide (1) for the increasing association of Indians in every branch of the administration and (2) the gradual development of self governing institutions with a view to the progressive realisation of responsible government in India as an integral part of the British Empire. The answer to the first question, then, is that I accept the proposition that it is desirable because it is necessary in order to carry out our promises to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India. Responsible government can only mean a system of government under which those who govern are responsible to those whom they govern, i.e., government by responsible ministers responsible to a representative assembly. The announcement of August 20th, 1917, promised substantial steps in the direction of the gradual development of self-governing institutions, with a view to the progressive realisation of responsible government in India. Progress in this policy was to be achieved by successive stages, and the British Government and the Government of India were to be the judges of the time and measure of each advance. I accept the Preamble as in accordance with the promise made in the pronouncement.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the Provinces involves the establishment in Provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority (Clause 6)?—Undoubtedly there cannot be responsible government in the Provinces without a substantial elected majority in Provincial Legislatures if there is only one Chamber. Therefore when the time comes for the realisation of responsible government a substantial elected majority will be a sine qua non. I see no objection to a substantial elected majority at the inception of the scheme for gradually developing responsible government, but the proportions of elected members to the aggregate members of the Legislative Council seem to me to be more accurately described as overwhelming than substantial. The change made by Clause 6 and the First Schedule to the Bill seems to me to be far more sweeping than is demanded either by the circumstances of to-day, or by the condition that you are inaugurating a change to lead gradually and by successive stages to responsible government.

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the Executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—I do not think that the non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures should have complete power to control the action and policy of the Executive. That power, except that the Legislature can express its dissatisfaction with the Executive by an adverse vote, is not inherent in representative assemblies generally. There is a special reason why it should not be given to the non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures in India at the present time, viz., they have not acquired the sense of responsibility which could justify their being given this power. I support this statement with the following incident. A substantial number of the elected members of the Council in the United Provinces wished in the middle of the war to appoint a Committee with the avowed object of effecting a reduction in the Provincial police force. Had the Council been composed as contemplated in Schedule A, it would have been able to carry a reduction into effect. The result could only have been disastrous. The non-official members of the Legislative Councils have obviously not got any statutory power to control the actions and policy of the Executive or to compel it to follow a particular policy. They have a majority by which, if they combine, they can out-vote the Government, but they cannot exercise the vote in respect of the Budget, and when they pass a resolution against the Government, it, like resolutions of the House of Commons, does not bind the Government to take action. But of recent years the Local Governments have very frequently accepted such resolutions, and agreed to take action on them. And in the matter of legislation, the non-official members of a Provincial Legislative Council have it in their power, if they are unanimous in their opinion, to ensure that the Government only carries legislation of which they approve. To give an instance. There is an act in force in the Madras Presidency giving Districts Boards the power to levy a cess to guarantee the interest due on capital raised for the construction of light railways within the district. This has been worked with great success in the Tanjore district, and perhaps elsewhere. A combination of the non-official members of the Legislative Council in the Punjab not long ago threw out a Bill to give to District Boards there the power just mentioned as existing in Madras. The Bill was introduced as a Government measure, and was generally regarded as beneficial.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of government in the Provinces in which at present the Provincial Executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes?—There are, in my opinion, a number of functions of government in the Provinces for which the Provincial Executive must, at present, remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament.

5. If you accept the propositions stated under questions 1 to 4 do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view?—I do not regard the dual form of government embodied in the Bill as the best way of carrying out the pledge embodied in the declaration of August 20th, 1917. It is difficult to believe that the authors of the declaration had, when it was issued, the idea of a dual government. At all events, the language of the declaration never suggested this idea to many of us who read it often and attentively. I did not myself realise that dual government was regarded as practical until I read the Joint Address to the Governor-General and the Secretary of State, dated 17th December, 1917, and signed by a number of European and Indian gentlemen resident in Bengal. In the address the principle of the scheme was explained in respect of the United Provinces, with the conditions of which none of the signatories were, I believe, familiar. The scheme, as developed in the report of the Governor-General and the Secretary of State, seems to me very complex, and incapable of being worked without constant friction. The demands to add to the transferred subjects may be expected to be so continuous as to render government very difficult. The border line of administration between reserved and transferred subjects will be so close that it must not infrequently be crossed. The Governor will find the position of adviser—with power to control only when the consequences of his acquiescence in proposals of which he may not approve would clearly be serious—very difficult. The position of his English official colleague—who will have no share in a decision on a transferred subject, while he will have to appear before the public as approving it—will be intolerable. If the scheme of provincial finance embodied in the report is adopted, there can hardly fail to be an undignified dispute over each Budget. The report contemplated that the list of transferred subjects would vary in each Province. Apparently this will not be the case at present, the only variation proposed being that forests shall be transferred in Bombay only, and public works, fisheries and excise reserved in Assam only. The relation of Parliament to a subject reserved in one Province and transferred in another would be anomalous. The scheme of the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces, the Punjab, and Burma, and of the Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces and Assam, dated 15th January, 1919, is, in my judgment, better adapted than the dual form of government to carry out the objects of the declaration of August 20th, 1917. It appears to me to have two special advantages: (1) the members of the Executive will from the first learn the principles of collective government. Having learn the lesson of individual responsibility for their own work under the scheme of dual government, it would be very difficult for them to unlearn it, and to learn that of collective collective responsibility; (2) it will avoid the unfairness of making men ignorant of practical administration entirely responsible for branches of Government work.

6. If you have any other method to suggest, does it (i) provide possibilities of advance by stages and facilitate the "progressive realisation of responsible government," and, if it does, in what way (Clauses 2, 3, etc.)? and (ii) does it afford means of judgment (a) to the electors and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress of the success or failure in results of the control exercised by the Legislature and those who represent it in the Executive?—The scheme does, in my opinion, provide possibilities of advance by stages and facilitate the progressive realisation of responsible government. It seems to me to afford means of judgment, both to the electors and the Statutory Committee, to judge of success or failure in results of the control of Legislature and its representatives in the Executive.

7. If you consider a dual form of government acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail the modification of which you regard as necessary? If so, what are those points, and what modifications would you suggest?—I am not in favour of a dual form of Government.

8. In particular, do you think (i) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure"—i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their Department by the Governor or if they fail to retain the confidence of the Legislature (Clause 3 (1))? (ii) that the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities (Clause 3 (3))? (iii) that the Executive Council should in all Provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian (Clause 4)? (iv) that the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council (Clause 7 (4)?—(1) It seems to me that to require that Ministers should hold office at the pleasure of the Governor is to strike at the root of the responsibility of Ministers to electors which the dual government scheme purports to aim at. (2) Clause 3 (3) seems rightly to give the Governor the power to refuse to act on the advice of his Minister. The words, "having regard to His Majesty's instructions," have no doubt been included in accordance with para. 219 of the Report, but I do not like them because it seems impossible and undesirable, were it possible, to prepare instructions to regulate the Governor's discretion in every case that may arise. (3) An Executive Council of one official European and one non-official Indian is probably numerically sufficient for any Province with a dual Government, but it is likely to leave the Governor very weak in the case of discussions about the preparation of the Budget and generally when there is associated deliberation. (4) Yes.

9, 10. Referring back to questions 2, 3 and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed generally by clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and legislative powers as (i) suitable, or as (ii) unnecessarily severe, or as (iii) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament (Clause 9). 10. In particular, (i) do you think that the legislature should have power with whatever limitations to vote supplies (Clause 9 (2))? (ii) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—My answers to questions 2, 3 and 4 are not an unqualified affirmative. The subject of supply seems to be suitably dealt with in paragraph 7 of the Memorandum of heads of Provinces.

The plan of Grand Committees contributed in the manner proposed in the joint Report does not seem to ensure the passage of essential legislation. It is difficult to see how the passage of such legislation can be ensured without giving the Governor power to pass vital legislation in the event of obstinate and contumacious hostility on the part of the Legislative Councils. Such an attitude on their part will, it is hoped, be rare, but it would be rash to regard it as impossible. It seems to me that it will be necessary to have a Second Chamber eventually, and that if it is not established now, it never will be established.

11, 12, 13, 14. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to provincial Legislative Councils over provincial governments. 12. Do you agree that it is advisable none the less to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature (Clause 16)? 13. Do you accept the plan of a bicameral legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential (Clauses 14, 15 and 16)? 14. Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature (Clause 20 (3) and (4)? Or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities?—I am not in favour of Clauses 14-17 of the Bill, as it seems to me to be vitally necessary that the supreme authority of the Government of India should be retained. The device of a double Chamber is designed to retain the ultimate control of the Government of India, and there does not seem to be any justification for elaborating a scheme for transferring control to the legislative assembly and introducing a second Chamber to ensure that the transfer of control shall not be effective. It would be wiser that, while the changes in provincial government, and the increase in control of the Legislative Councils are under experiment, the Government of India, which will have to watch over and encourage the reforms, should not itself be the subject of a constitutional experiment.

15. Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council? If not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest?—I have no objection to state to Clause 21, which is, I assume, designed solely to carry out its avowed object, viz., to give greater elasticity in respect of the size of the Government and the distribution of work.

16. Do you think that the development of provincial autonomy on the one hand, and of self-government in the provinces on the other, involves any modification of the provisions of sections 2, 33, and 45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23)?—I do not understand the precise effect of Clause 23, and consequently do not feel able to offer an opinion in reply to this question.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress, by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examination?—It will, no doubt, be a good thing to provide for periodical examination, and Clause 28 seems to secure it efficiently, except in respect of the time when it is to be made. The prospect of an inquiry into the working of the system of government, the growth of education, and the development of representative institutions after an interval of only ten years seems to me likely to create an atmosphere of unrest, and to hinder rather than encourage the growth of good administration. The bulk of the people will hardly have digested or understood the present changes before the end of the period comes in sight. Personally, I should like to see fifteen read for ten. A certain proportion of British officials who have served served more than ten years in India should be an essential element in such commission, and it seems desirable to ensure this by statute.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—If Grand Committees are to be provided for, the Bill should, it seems to me, provide more exactly for what is contemplated than is done by Clause 9 (3). And—especially if the Council of the Secretary of State is to be abolished—Part IV. of the Bill, relating to the Public Services in India, should be extended so as to regulate by statute the conditions regarding the services which the draft is designed to regulate by rules.

19. Have you any observations to offer on the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on Home Administration of Indian Affairs?—The general principle suggested by the Franchise Committee, that the qualifications for the vote should be residence and property, seems admirable. I am in favour of removing sex disqualification. I am not convinced that there ought to be more electors in the United Provinces (a much poorer province) than in Bengal; or that the former province should have nearly three times as many as Madras, or that the Punjab, with four-ninths of the United Provinces population, should have (1) more urban electors and (2) only one rural elector to every eleven in the United Provinces. The proposals to give communal representation to Indian Christians, Europeans, and Eurasians, and to give representation to special interests—such as land-holders, and commerce, and industry—seem good; but the distribution of landlords' representatives between Oudh and Agra in the proportion of five to one seems unjustifiable. I am opposed to special representation of the Universities. The depressed classes are, as the Government of India have urged, inadequately represented. The proposals of the Committee regarding the case of the non-Brahmans of Madras leave the matter in an unsatisfactory position. There seems to be good reason for making the rule that a candidate must be resident in the constituency general instead of applying it in three provinces only. The reduction of the representation of Europeans in the Legislative Assembly from nine to seven (from three to two in Bengal and two to one in Bombay) is objectionable. The proposals of the Functions Committee to transfer administration, the public health, education, agriculture, and the development of industries seem to me to be unsuitable.

7993. Would you like to say anything in supplement?—Perhaps I might say that the more consideration I have given to the questions of dual government as compared with the alternative scheme prepared by the Lieutenant-Governors and Chief Commissioners of certain Provinces, the more has it seemed to me that the alternative scheme provides a better chance of being successful than the scheme for the dual Government.

7994. Do you not wish to elaborate that in any way?—It seems to me that the system of a dual Government is open to the objection that it splits people up instead of inducing them to co-operate, and it is contrary to any device that has been successful previously, so far as I know, in the world for a system of government. I think that the Ministers, if they are not to have the same pay and status as the Executive Councillors, will be regarded by the public as in an inferior position, and I think that from their point of view they will have a considerable advantage if all the subjects of Government came partially under their control at once, and gradually entirely under their control. It seems to me also that from the point of view of the Ministers it is rather hard on them to put them at once into these positions where they will have to govern without having had any preliminary experience in the business of Government, and where they will be, I cannot help thinking, to a certain extent dissociated from the other members of the Government; when they find themselves in difficulties they will not always want to go and ask the others to help them, whereas, if they were members of a combined Government, I think they would realise that they could obtain assistance from their colleagues very easily, and be very ready to ask for it. I also think that it gets rid of difficulties, which have impressed themselves very much on me owing to the correspondence that I have had with certain members of the Civil Service and other public services in India. The difficulties that will arise from having members of the India services partly under the Executive Government and partly under Ministers are obvious, and I have not seen in any of the papers which I have been able to get any solution of those difficulties. I have had from a number of Indian civilians who have served with me at different times in different Provinces a request that I should do what I could to obtain for them the right to retire from the Civil Service with pensions based upon their service, and on the prospects which they had when they entered the Service, and they base this appeal to me on the ground that they had not entered the Service with the expectation that they would be required to give service in this particular way. All those difficultits would disappear if you had a combined Government.

7995. Is there anything further you would like to say?—The Lieutenant-Governors still adhere to the scheme for Grand Committees. I looked into the figures for two Provinces—the United Provinces and Madras—to try and work out how the Grand Committees would work as regards numbers, and I came to the conclusion that it would be very difficult for the Governor to rely on being able to carry his legislation. You have there 118 members in each Province, and, according as you had 40 or 50 per cent. of the members, you would have to get seven out of nine or nine out of ten of the nominated non-officials to vote for the Government. I think from recent experience that might be very difficult. I do not want to bring up the Rowlatt Bill, but there was considerable difficulty there; I see in the papers that in the question of this Indemnity Bill in the Punjab there is practically a substantial opposition of, it seems to me, almost all the non-official Indian members. That is the class of case in which it seems to me that the Government would have great difficulty in securing the passage of a measure before the Grand Committee. My own preference would be for two Houses in each Province, with one representing territorial interests and the other to a certain extent representing special interests, and having nominated non-official and official members in it. But I would prefer even the alternative of a vote of less than a majority being required to pass an essential Government measure to the Grand Committee—a vote of four-tenths, or something of that kind. I feel as regards the Government of India that while the experiment is progressing in the Provinces—and I think it should progress in every way which is reasonable—I would rather not have any experiment in the Government of India as regards the Legislative Assembly; I would rather not have such a strong majority in the Legislative Assembly against the Government. I do think they will be against the Government. My own idea as regards the Provincial Legislatures was that instead of having 93 elected out of 118, as suggested in Madras and the United Provinces—I take those Provinces because those are the ones I have looked into—you might have the same total—the total of 118—but instead of having ninety-three of them elected I should have thought that to begin with the number of seventy, which would give seventy against forty-eight, would really make a substantial majority. I look upon the majorities proposed as rather overwhelming.

7997. Is there any other point you would like to mention?—I think there are certain inequalities in the electorates which have been prepared by the Franchise Committee which are rather obvious. In my note I said that I thought there was no reason why the United Provinces should have more voters than Bengal, or why Madras should only have one-third of the number of voters that there are in the United Provinces; but there are some still further rather transparent differences in respect of the urban representation sentation. These seem to be rather important, because the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces, among others, has definitely said that political life exists only in the towns. Now in the United Provinces there are 3¼ millions of people resident in towns of 10,000 and upwards, and in the Punjab there are 1¾ millions. The number of the urban voters in the Punjab is 77,000, and the number of urban voters in the United Provinces is to be 64,500. Of those 64,500, 55,000 are resident in the seven large cities of the province. There are nine other cities with a population of over 50,000 inhabitants, which aggregate 580,000 altogether, and their representation, with that of other towns, only comes to 9,500 electors. The Punjab has only eight cities of over 50,000 population, and the United Provinces has 17. Then in Madras there are only 32,000 urban electors, but there are two and one-third million urban inhabitants. The Madras rural electors seem to me to be too few, and though I do not know anything about the actual conditions of rural life in the Punjab, it strikes me that it would be difficult to justify giving the vote to only 160,000 rural electors in the Punjab and to 1,400,000 in the next province, the United Provinces.

7998. You are aware that, broadly speaking, these franchises are those recommended by the Local Governments?—Yes.

7999. Is there any further point to which you particularly wish to draw our attention?—I have expressed my opinion already in the note which I wrote regarding certain subjects which it is proposed to transfer. I have not changed my view as regards them. I have read a certain amount of literature about education. I feel very strongly that if any portion of education is to be transferred you must transfer the whole of it, but I am against the transfer for that reason.

8000. You do not think that it is divisible?—I do not. There are primary classes in secondary schools, and at present, certainly in some parts of India, the state of secondary education is, I fear, very lamentable. Might I read an extract from a letter from a director of public instruction when I was in India? It is now ten years old, but it relates to a case in which I asked him to go and examine the state of the Jubilee High School at Gorakhpur, which was then said to be very overcrowded. This was not a Government High School. It was managed by a District Board: "The number of scholars is 512, while the number admissible under the rule regarding accommodation laid down in the Educational Code is 427. Four classes containing 125 scholars are accommodated in a hall capable of holding 85. The noise was deafening. The teachers could only make themselves heard by outyelling each other. In seven other classrooms the number of scholars was in excess of the number for which there was accommodation. A class of 31 boys was being held on a verandah 5½ feet wide and capable of holding only 12 scholars, and on another verandah, also 5½ feet wide, 63 scholars were being taught. The classes are moved about as the sun moves, and if it rains they have to get wet." He says, "The case is typical of the way in which certain high class schools are being managed by District Boards. Meanwhile the Mission School, quite a good school, is half empty." I was so much impressed by this report that I asked the director to go into the question of trying to make some effective rules to limit the number of pupils to be taken in a particular room, or in a particular class, and eventually a rule was passed that in a high school no teacher should attempt to teach more than 33 pupils at the same time. Because this rule passed by the Director was supported by me, the newspapers representing Indian opinion in the United Provinces condemned me, I think, without exception. In the present state of affairs I feel very strongly that the Government of India ought, as the supreme Government, to retain a general control over all the education in India. I have already expressed my opinion about the proposal to transfer the duty of developing industries, including industrial research and technical education. That proposal was made by the Functions Committee, and goes beyond what was recommended in the Report, and I felt myself that what was recommended in the Report was undesirable. It seems to me that the Central Government cannot divest itself of responsibility for the industrial progress of the country. The really great and typical advance in industry in India has been the Tata Iron and Steel Company. I was member for commerce and industry when the scheme for that was started and carried through. It was carried through by Sir Thomas Holland, the late Mr. Harvey, who was Secretary in the Commerce and Industry Department, and myself. Had a Local Government been charged with the duty it could not have carried it out. To begin with, most of the capital came from the Bombay Presidency; secondly, nobody knew when they began to devise the company from what Province they would have their iron. The Central Provinces was the original one. It would have been quite beyond the powers of the Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces to have organised what had to be organised. Eventually the iron that was to be worked was taken from a small tributary state in Bengal. The Bengal Government knew nothing about the case. Moreover, in order to encourage this industry, it was necessary to make concessions which no Local Government had the power to make or, it seems to me, ever could have the power to make. Among other things, we had to give sanction to the construction of a railway for 40 miles from the main line to the place where the iron was to be smelted. Next we had to make a promise that we would take from the company, as soon as they were able to roll rails to the proper standard, 20,000 tons of steel rails every year. There were other conditions, but those two were palpably beyond the authority of any Local Government. It seems to me that cases of that sort, if we are going to develop India as we ought to develop India, will be constantly arising. I should like to take this opportunity of saying that I think both the Government of India to a certain extent, and the Secretary of State to a much greater extent, are really responsible for the failure to develop India as much as it ought to have been developed. In 1908 I had a conference which was attended by Europeans and Indians, officials and non-officials, of every class of opinion, and we passed, after the most amicable meetings, a set of resolutions which were absolutely unanimous from start to finish, with the object of inaugurating in the United Provinces a system which would have the effect of developing its somewhat limited resources. It has not got much mineral wealth in it. Now at the top of this scheme was to have been a technological institute. That was a point upon which all leading Indian opinion, and upon which all European merchants whom I consulted were in favour, and upon which I myself was particularly keen. It is just over eleven years since we made that recommendation. The proposal was reduced at home. Subsequently, I believe, the whole character of it was altered. Up to date, I believe I am correct in saying that no technological institute has been either built or sanctioned.

8001. Is there any other point you would like to mention now?—Perhaps members of the Committee may like to ask me some questions.

Lord Sydenham.

8002. We have been told that there are 300 millions of people in India anxiously awaiting the passing of this Bill. Do you think that is rather of the nature of an exaggeration?—From all the correspondence which I have received recently from India I can only regard it as an exaggeration.

8003. In the native states, among their population which is included in the calculation, do you think there is any anxiety with regard to this Bill?—Not so far as my information goes.

8004. Do you think there are a quarter of a million people in India at the present time who really understand what responsible government means?—I should doubt it.

8005. You have large experience of native states, and we have been told that their Government is not nearly so autocratic as our own. Do you think that is correct?—No.

8006. We have also been told that the popular assembly in native states makes laws to a very large extent. Do you know any native state where any popular assembly makes any laws?—No.

8007. Have you ever found any villagers wishing to be transferred to the rule of a native state?—No.

8008. Are not land assessments and taxation in native states frequently higher than in British India?—I believe they are, but I could not give any facts. What I have always been struck by is the absolute want of any limit as to the matters for which the inhabitants of native states may be required to pay towards the State.

8009. There is an uncertainty in their conditions of taxation?—Yes.

8010. That must, of course, be a very serious matter for many of them. You have spoken at length about industries. Now you would not propose that the smaller class of industry which lies wholly within a Province should be brought under the control of the Government of India?—Most certainly not.

8011. You are referring only to great industries like the Tata Iron and Steel Company, which covers a large area and affects a large number of Provinces?—I was arguing against the Government of India giving up the control of industries altogether.

8012. You would let the Government of India delegate purely Provincial industries to the Provincial Governments?—Most certainly.

8013. We have been told that the Civil Service has had the effect of stunting the development of the people of India. Do you think there is any degree of accuracy in that statement?—It is rather invidious for me to express an opinion at all; but I do not think that we are open to that charge.

8014. Has not progress in the native states generally been attained by following as closely as possible the British models which were set up by the great public services of India?—Yes.

8015. Do you not think it is unsatisfactory and, to some extent, unfortunate that this Committee can examine only English-speaking Indians?—Yes, in view of the fact that they compose so small a proportion of the population.

8016. Are not some of the most capable men, men of business, for example, in India unable to speak English?—Yes.

8017. Do you think anyone can form a just view of Indian opinion from the evidence of a very small class?—No.

8018. Do you think it would be possible to ascertain correctly the aspirations of the French people by examining those who speak English?—No.

8019. And therefore do you not consider that the provision for representation of the lower classes by men of their own class vital if any real democratic advance is to be made in India?—I do.

8020. Failing representations of those classes, who form the vast majority and pay most of the revenue, will not the effect of reform be to set up a very narrow oligarchy?—That is my conviction.

8021. And therefore you would agree that the question of proper representation of the working classes, who provide most of the revenue, is vital to the success of the reforms?—Yes.

8022. Now you have seen the proposals of the Franchise Committee, and you have told us you consider them illogical and inconsistent as regards the provisions made in different provinces. Do you think, therefore, there should be some revision from the point of view of equalising matters in those franchise arrangements?—Yes.

8023. I think you have said that the agricultural and working classes will not, under these arrangements, receive adequate representation?—I think that they will be inadequately represented, because under the scheme there will be only seven representatives of the depressed classes out of nearly eight hundred.

8024. Do you think that in managing these very large electorates it will be very difficult to prevent fraud?—Judging from the experience that I have had, especially in municipal elections, I should say it would.

8025. Do you think, with a view of making representations as direct as possible, that a residential qualification should be insisted upon?—In the case of candidates?

8026. Yes?—Yes.

8027. Now you know, of course, that throughout India at the present time there is really a widespread alarm among the non-Brahmins and lower classes as to the working of these franchises. You must have heard of that?—Yes.

8028. Do you see any means of enabling those classes to exert their due political influence except by communal representation?—No.

8029. And having accepted the principle of communal representation, which the Bill does, may we not extend it still further, so as to give more representation to the non-Brahmins and the lower castes generally?—Yes.

8030. Where communal electorates offer difficulties, do you think that nominations could be made from panels suggested by non-Brahmin and lower caste organisations?—I think it could be done, but I regard it as an inferior arrangement.

8031. I would suggest it merely, of course, as a temporary arrangement for the time, but it would lead to the development of organisations among these lower castes, which might be a good thing?—Yes. You probably know better than I do, but I believe there is a very well-arranged organisation for labour in Bombay now.

8032. A fairly good one. It is only the beginnings of what may be a big thing, but if those organisations had the power of submitting names for a panel would not it lead to their more rapid development?—Yes.

8033. Do you think the Bill as it stands is supported by any class whatever in India?—I do not think it is, because I understand that none of the members of the political body, either Extremists or Moderates, do support it in its present form. I do not think anybody else takes any interest in it.

8034. Is it not just to say that it has disappointed the small political class and caused considerable alarm among the much larger classes?—I should say so, yes.

8035. Do you see any real difference between the utterances of the Extremists and the Moderates?—Well, they ask for different things under the Bill, I understand.

8036. Slightly different?—Yes. I do see a certain distinction between them; but I should think they might all be reasonably classed as Nationalists, and all eventually have the same object, I think.

8037. I think Sir Archdale Earle told us that, under the scheme of the dual government, the Indian Civil Service would be more interesting and attractive than it has been hitherto. I understand that is not your view. His words were "more interesting and attractive"?—I am surprised to hear it.

8039. Suppose that it does come about that the Indian Civil Service will no longer attract the best type of Englishman to India, and the same thing may occur in the other Public Services, will not that be a very serious matter in the interests of the great masses of the people of India?—From the point of view with which I regard the well-being of the masses of India, it will be.

8040. Would you think, under the dual system, if that is to prevail, that it is wise at the present moment to transfer such very important services as Public Works, Medical and Sanitary questions, and Education to elected Indians controlled only by elective majorities and by the Governor's veto?—If you are going to have transferred subjects, I do not feel any very strong objection to transferring Public Works, except from the point of view which you mention, that there is a large body of European members of the Service. I do feel very strongly about the transfer of Medical Services and Education, both because of the Services and also on the merits.

8041. If the unitary government—as proposed by the five Lieutenant-Governors—were to be adopted, there would then be no objection to putting those subjects under duly qualified Indians?—None.

8043. Must not the effect of the dual system—this rift in the little Cabinets of India—create very acute friction, and eventually probably create dualism right through through the whole Administration?—I should think it would cause friction. Dualism through the whole Administration? I am not quite sure that I understand that.

8044. I am thinking that a popular Minister must surely wish to have a secretariat of his own in time, and therefore he would probably have his supporters reaching right down to the bottom rung of the ladder of the Administration. That is a possibility, at all events?—Yes; I think it is possible.

8045. You know that the Government of India proposes that, in case of any difficulty with the popular Minister, the British Indian Civil Service officer may retire on a proportional pension: Do you thnk that that is really a fair proposal?—I understood it was only to be permitted in extreme cases.

8046. In cases of disagreement?—Only in extreme cases—very exceptional.

8047. I do not think there is any word about that in it; but do you think it would be fair that a man should have to break his career—and probably never be able to make another in this country—simply because he had a disagreement, in which he might have been right?—No; I think that would be very wrong.

8048. And if the Indian Civil Service and the other Public Services no longer draw to themselves the best types we have, will there be very considerable moral loss throughout the whole Administration?—I think the effect would be that British rule would not be maintained up to the standard on which it has been maintained hitherto.

8049. Do you think that a dual government would be able to act effectively and promptly at a time of crisis in India?—I think that would depend a great deal on the Governor.

8050. Do you think the position of the Governor under a dual system must be a very difficult one?—I think it would be extraordinarily difficult.

8051. And do you see objection to furnishing him with an instrument of instruction?—I do. I should have disliked it immensely myself.

8052. Is it not equivalent really to telling the Governor that he has got to do his duty, which he ought to know?—Yes, and I think it would also have the effect of tying him down so that he could not exercise his real responsibility properly.

8053. Now, supposing that the Governor has frequently to exercise his veto, will not the effect of that be to bring a storm of organised abuse upon him?—I think that is inevitable.

8054. And the effect of that would surely be to lower the authority of all government in India, and, which is almost worse, to increase the racial antagonism?—Yes; I think that has been going on for some time, and it will be much worse.

8055. You have noticed that there has already been opposition shown to any improvement in the status of the Indian Civil Servants?—Yes.

8056. Do you not think, therefore, that their rights ought to be protected in some way?—Certainly; that has been pressed upon me by a number of my friends.

8057. You know, nobody better, that the tranquillity and contentment of a district in India depends on the District Officer more than upon anybody else. Do you think that District Officers will be able to perform their duties as they do now under a dual system of government?—No.

8058. Do you think that the peasantry and working classes generally in the United Provinces will welcome a large transfer of District Officers into Indian hands?—I do not think so.

8059. In the past, have not the main safeguards of the rural population and the working classes generally depended upon an undivided government pre-eminently British?—Yes.

8060. Do you know anything in the history of the customs and traditions of India which makes it likely that responsible government in this narrow technical sense would suit the genius of the Indian people?—No; I do not think there is anything in the history of India which would suggest that.

8061. If we left India to-morrow, having set up this system, would not that system very quickly disappear?—I should expect so.

8062. Does not that, therefore, come to this, that we are trying to force upon the masses a form of government which is foreign to their most cherished traditions?—Yes.

8063. You are aware, of course, of many defects in our system of government which we should all like to remedy?—Yes.

8064. Many of which are not touched in this Bill; and you are not in the least opposed to any orderly evolution having the effect of giving much greater influence to real Indian opinion and a much larger employment of capable Indians?—No.

8065. Do you consider that it is just to say that there is no alternative to the scheme of the Joint Report? Do you not consider that the scheme of the Lieutenant-Governors, which gets rid of the major difficulties with which we are faced, is in the nature of an alternative?—Yes.

8066. I think you have said you agree with Lord Curzon that nothing ought to be done at the present time to weaken the authority of the Government of India?—Yes.

8067. What is your opinion as to the period at which the first inquiry should take place into the working of the system?—I would rather have it at fifteen than ten years, because I think that too early an inquiry will lead to everything being upside down in the interval.

8068. Do you not think it would take at least three or four years before this revolution would settle down into working order?—I think it will; and I think it will take a long time for the ordinary elector to really understand what is going on, and what his responsibilities and duties are. I doubt whether at the end of ten years any large proportion of them would have learned that. I think it is possible that in fifteen years a considerably larger proportion might have learned it, but even fifteen years might be too short a time.

8069. If it is made as short as ten years do you not think the result would be to stimulate unrest?—I do, because I think the early portion of those ten years will be passed in people learning their responsibilities and duties.

8070. Might not there be a tendency to make the thing work badly in order that the Inquiry Commission might say: "This will not do; you must go the whole hog"?—I suppose there might be.

8071. Do you know of any Bill which leaves to rules the decision as to seventeen different matters, some of which are of vital importance?—I have always been a strong opponent of the legislation of the Government of India which leaves so much to rules. One of my chief objections was that I had to be concerned in drafting those rules. I think it a most obnoxious principle. I do not know of any Bill which has gone as far as this one.

8072. Is it possible really to judge of the nature and effects of a Bill unless you know exactly what some of those more important rules are to be like?—I find that difficulty myself. I have read the Bill several times, but I do not claim to understand it at all.

8073. May I take it generally that your view is that the Bill as it stands is dangerous to the peace and prosperity of India, and that it does not provide adequate safeguards for the interests of the overwhelming majority of agriculturists and working classes, who provide most of the revenue?—That is my feeling.

Sir J. D. Rees.

8074. Arising out of what Lord Sydenham said, am I right in understanding that you hold that it would not be proper to make democratic advances of this description until you can get the evidence of Indians who now cannot communicate it in English?—I understood my answer to mean this, that I thought it was a pity that there was no opportunity for people who cannot speak English to express their opinion upon the scheme, and that until that was given you would not know what the people of India thought about it.

8075. Would you hold the logical conclusion, as I should think it to be, that no such reforms as these, or, indeed, any far-reaching reforms, should be introduced until the people of India, to a very large extent, were English speaking?—Why cannot they be examined?

examined? Why cannot you ascertain from them if they only know their own vernacular? Why cannot inquiry be made from them?

8076. Why cannot you get these Indian-speaking witnesses here, do you mean?—Yes.

8077. Do you think that their absence seriously impairs the value of the evidence?—I do.

8078. In regard to the non-Brahmin agitation, you expressed you concurrence with it just now. You thought it was sufficiently established that there is a strong real objection on the part of non-Brahmins and lower castes to these reforms?—It is the case that English is very much more prevalent in the Madras Presidency than anywhere else. They have expressed their opinion in English.

8079. But their opinion to this effect was got by English-speaking people, was it not?—They speak English themselves, do they not?

8080. Would you reject——?—I never said anything about rejecting any evidence. All I said was that certain evidence did not seem to me to come before anybody who has investigated this case.

8081. What you say does not at all imply that there would have to be a very long interval before the real voice of India could express itself. I gathered that impression?—I do not quite understand your question.

8082. Well, I understood your answers to mean that you did not think that the Committee could get at anything like the real voice of India in respect of these reforms?—That is so.

8083. That is so, you think?—Yes.

8084. How long would you wait for that voice?—I cannot tell you; I say they could be asked these questions.

8085. Whom would you ask and how would you get it?—That is not my business.

8086. Is that a practical attitude in the face of a demand for a reform at a time when all the autocratic thrones of Europe have fallen, when Persia has a Parliament, and China is a Republic?—I do not know.

Chairman.] That is rather wide.

Sir J. D. Rees.

8087. Lord Sydenham also asked you about the system of government pursued in native states. Would it be practicable to consider the introduction into British India of the system pursued in native states? Would the Government of India be likely to recommend it?—No; I did not understand Lord Sydenham to suggest it.

8088. I thought that was the object of his question?—I do not know what the object of his question was.

8089. Your answers seem to follow his questions?—Naturally. If you are asked a leading question you answer it, I suppose.

8090. As regards the franchise in Madras of which you spoke, are you aware that that followed the recommendation of the Government, and that they expressed themselves unable to deal with a larger number of electors?—Yes, I know that is so, but I say if other Governments can deal with a larger number of electors, I cannot see why the Madras Government cannot. I say the proposals are unequal. That is all.

8091. You stated also that you felt that there was a strong case, the non-Brahmin case. Have you, in your long and distinguished service, come across that feeling in India, that corporate feeling on the part of the lower castes and classes against the Brahmins and the upper classes?—I have not come across it directly in Madras, but as Home Secretary it was frequently reported by the Madras Government, and it was a very serious matter in connection with the reorganisation of the Provincial service some years ago, in which, as I think you will remember, they definitely determined that a certain number of positions in the Provincial service must be reserved for non-Brahmins. It is the only Province in India in which it was done.

8092. Lord Sydenham also asked you about the type of Civil Servant who was likely to be obtained in the future. Am I right in gathering from the Memorandum of yours I have here that you are of opinion that the supply of the class of Civil Servants who go out to India had very seriously fallen off in 1910?—Certainly.

8093. By your answer to Lord Curzon?—Yes.

8094. Then the process of deterioration, not only had been begun, but had set in and was well established before these reforms were contemplated?—Certainly.

8095. Do you think that deterioration will be accelerated and increased by the adoption of this scheme?—Violently accelerated, I think.

8096 You realise that the Public Services Commission is provided by the Bill in order to deal with that question, and to do justice to those who at present are in the Service?—Yes.

8097. Do you think they will not be able to cope with the situation?—I should prefer to have the rights of the Services secured by the Bill.

8098. You expressed an opinion, in answer to a question, that there was no support in India for this Bill. May I ask would you not consider that the witnesses who have given evidence here as representatives have evidenced considerable support for the Bill?—I have not read the evidence of the witnesses, but I saw a letter in the paper from Mr. Chintamani the other day, from which I gathered he did not support the Bill

8099. Do you think the Indian Press is no evidence of any support?—I understand that it has been rather criticised by certain branches of the Indian Press, has it not?

8100. You said in answer to Lord Sydenham—at least, if I am wrong please correct me—that you thought the passing of the Bill and the acceptance of these proposals would lead to the establishment of an oligarchy in India. Am I right?—Yes.

8101. I want to ask, on that, whether you do not think that that same oligarchy which you think will be in power if these proposals are passed is not now to a very great extent in power, if it means, as I suppose, the great Indian officials, the heads of the Services, who are the greater part of the instruments by which we govern? Could you throw any light on that?—I thought the oligarchy would be the oligarchy of a political party.

8102. Are not the higher officials now serving us in India practically all members of the political party which presses for reforms? Is not that correct as a general statement?—I do not think it is, as far as my experience is concerned. It may be so in some Provinces.

8103. But you would allow that we must govern India through Indian agents now?—Yes.

8104. The power they exercise now, I believe, is considerable, is it not?—Yes, but in the other case it would be total. The whole power would fall into the hands of the oligarchy. That is my view.

8105. I see you state that British rule can only be interpreted by British agents. Is it not the case that, as a matter of fact, it is interpreted to the extent of 90 per cent. through Indian agents now?—Yes, but there are British authorities over them to correct them if they do not interpret it properly.

8106. That is the meaning of what you said?—Yes.

8107. But it is the case that 90 per cent. of the agents who interpret British rule are Indians, is it not?—Yes, subject to the control of the remaining 10 per cent.

8108. You say British rule cannot be administered through Indianised services. That refers only to the top. They are Indianised now, are they not?—Yes. When I speak of British rule being administered in that way I am referring to those authorities who have the power really to affect the administration. If a subordinate official began to exercise his authority in a way which was contrary to British traditions he would be pulled up, surely, would he not?

8109. Is not British control practically preserved by this reform?—I do not think so 8110. A distinguished Lieutenant-Governor yesterday, I gathered, did. It is in your pamphlet, and I understood you to say, in answer to Lord Sydenham, that these reforms place the Executive Government under the control of the Legislative Councils. Do you maintain that they do?—Certainly I think they do, because, as I explained just now, I doubt if the Grand Committee will give the Government an effective remedy.

8111. Would you say that, in face of the powers of re-entry provided for the Government of the Province or for the Government of India, the power of restoring the Budget and the power of restoring the allotment of reserved subjects, and so on?—But you are not going to have the Governor doing this at every turn, are you?

8112. No, I suppose not. But could you say, in the face of the fact that there are these provisions on the part of the Government of India to come in to safeguard the administration of all Indian subjects, and to decide questions arising between two or more Provinces and on the part of the Provincial Governments, to intervene even in the administration of transferred subjects, in defence of reserved subjects, and in defence of the Governor's special responsibilities—could you really maintain in the face of those provisions that the Executive Government is placed under the control of the Legislative Councils?—Yes.

8113. You think that English interests in India have not received sufficient protection or consideration: is that the opinion held in Cawnpore by the Chamber of Commerce?—I have not had any representation or letter from the Chamber of Commerce in Cawnpore, but I have had many letters from people in Calcutta who hold that view.

8114. Am I right in thinking that the Chamber of Commerce of Cawnpore would be the chief commercial body in your Province?—Yes.

8115. You criticise the reforms on the ground that they are asked for only by a small portion of the population: would that be a conclusive objection to your mind?—I put it forward as a criticism.

8116. You would not hold it to be a conclusive objection?—Not absolutely, no.

8117. With regard to the oligarchy that you spoke of, is not an intermediate period of oligarchy almost inevitable in the transfer of any system of Government from autocracy to democracy? Was it not so in this country?—I do not know that it is absolutely necessary.

8118. What I want to ask you is this: do you think that this oligarchy, being Indian, would be unacceptable to and hostile to Indian interests? That is what I am trying to get at?—My opinion is rather that the oligarchy of the educated people in India might be hostile to certain interests of the lower orders.

8119. Hostile to the Indian people?—Hostile to certain interests of the Indian people of the lower orders.

8120. You comment on the fact that the British Government in India has not sufficiently protected or advanced the interests of agriculture?—I do.

8121. Would not that, primâ facie, be a reason for giving votes to the agricultural classes, the ryots, the revenue-paying class, in order to enable them to represent their interests and more or less to force the Government to attend to those interests?—I have never raised my voice against giving votes to the rural classes.

8122. I thought you opposed these reforms?—I do not oppose an extension of the electorate.

8123. You do not oppose that portion?—No. You will not find a word I have ever said against it.

8124. Do you believe that it is hopeless to give Western education through Indian teachers?—I do.

8125. Will it be practicable to ensure English teachers?—No, it will not.

8126. Then it is a counsel of perfection?—You know, I daresay, that the Government of India strove to put up a high school in each district as an example. They did it with that object, in order to enable the Indians to take advantage of the system of education in English through English people. I think that it is a very difficult thing for an Indian to teach English unless he has studied the manner in which it is taught by an Englishman.

8127. But it would be very difficult, I apprehend, to provide English teachers, for financial and other reasons?—Yes.

8128. You say that whatever the Government may attempt in order to discourage religious animosities it is not in the least likely that India will for a long time be free from serious breaches of the peace between Hindoos and Mohammedans. You say, "It is not unreasonable to ask how the Government, which must largely consist of Hindoos, could take effective measures in the case of an outbreak due to their co-religionists." Would you on that ground permanently, or for any particular length of time, and, if so, for what length, exclude Hindoos from power or from the preponderating position they would naturally have from their numerical majority, in the government of the country?—I do think that it is a very difficult matter in view of such occurrences as took place at Peru and at Kartapur. I have here a letter which I received a few days ago from the head of a High School at Benares, the European headmaster: "One thing cannot be gainsaid, and that is that at the present moment the racial feeling is more bitter than it has been, certainly within the last twenty-five years, and probably since the Mutiny." I point out that it is a difficulty which has to be overcome. I do not say that it necessarily involves the permanent exclusion. I should like to mention what Sir Alfred Lyall, who, I think, was the most distinguished member of our Service, thought of this. He said: "The Hindoos and Mohammedans form two classes divided on almost every question, as well as those connected with religion; collisions at times of religious observances help to make those more marked, but do not necessarily indicate an increase in the spirit of religious animosity." He adds that at certain times special precautions have to be taken in northern India. In the time of Lord MacDonnell there was a great contest in northern India because of a dispute between Hindoos and Mohammedans as to the script in which petitions should be presented in court. Lord MacDonnell rightly introduced the right of presenting them in the Nagri character. The Mohammedans resented that very much. When Mr. Gokhale was trying to effect a reconciliation between the Hindoos and Mohammedans in the United Provinces shortly afterwards Nawab Mehdi Ali, who had previously been employed in the Hyderabad State, and was then Secretary to the Aligar College, got up and said that so long as the Hindoos tried to prevent the Mohammedans from using their own character—Urdu—it would be impossible for any reconciliation to take place between the two races. When the census was taken in 1910 the Census Commissioner in the United Provinces reported that the Mohammedans had endeavoured to raise this very question upon the character in which the different inhabitants recorded their names. He said: "There are distinct signs that people are trying to use the census for political agitation." The Hindoos were trying to make people record their names in Hindi, and the Mohammedans were trying to make them record them in Urdu. In northern India I think that the line of cleavage between them is still very distinct.

8129. You do not think it would justify a permanent exclusion of Hindoos?—I do not say anything about permanent. I cannot tell what the future will produce. But at the present time I do not see that there is any immediate prospect of racial feeling dying down to the extent which would make it right to place the Hindoos in command of the Mohammedans. I should like to mention that the most serious trouble I ever had in the United Provinces, between a Municipal Chairman and a District Officer, was in a case where one was a Hindoo and the other a Mohammedan.

8130. You refer to the injustice in regard to Madras in its contributions: you do not mention how you would correct that. I am speaking of their contributions to the Imperial Government?—I am not a financial expert, and I could not do that. I think that some system of taxation ought to be devised to make the different Provinces equally assessed, so far as their contributions to the Government of India are concerned; but I do not quite know how it could be done.

8131. What I intended to ask was this: Do you hold that, until that admitted inequality or injustice is corrected, any reform such as this would have to be postponed?—I did not say that; but I do think it will be very difficult, after these reforms have been carried out, for Provinces like Madras and the United Provinces to get equal treatment with Bombay and Bengal, which contain the cleverer and more compact political body.

8132. True; but they have not got justice now, under the existing system?—No; but there will be still less chance then.

8133. You say in this pamphlet that Parliament has interfered owing to the desire of the Government to delegate members who possess a certain following, but no special acquaintance, with Indian problems. Are you aware that it is the opinion, as regards this Parliament, that there are fewer members interested in India than in any other part of the Empire?—I did not say anything about the numbers.

8134. You say: "The elected members of the representative Legislative Councils will be, and must be, men belonging to the educated minority of Brahmins and lawyers, who do not represent the masses," and you say they have done their best in the past to block measures for their welfare. You do not make that as a general statement?—No; but certain cases of it have occurred.

8135. You say the ruling chiefs are not supporters of this scheme?—I do not say that.

8136. "If the Maharajah of Patiala interprets the feelings of the ruling Princes, they will not be found to be enthusiastic"?—I expressed a feeble opinion that I thought they would not be found to be enthusiastic—that is all.

Sir Henry Craik.

8137. When you say that you think that the result of these changes may very likely be to establish an Oligarchy, you use the word "Oligarchy" in the universal sense that it is used of establishing an authority which will be subject to no constitutional restraint?—Yes.

8138. You do not think that the word "Oligarchy," in ordinary usage—nor as you use it—would be at all applicable to the fact that a small number of officials responsible to the British Government and the British Parliament may happen to exercise authority?—No.

8139. You referred to these deeply-rooted dissensions between the castes and other elements in Indian society. Although your experience has taught you that these exist, you do not assert that they are to be for all time a reason for denying reform? You only say that they place upon us the duty of protecting India against them?—Yes.

8140. And that in all reforms we have that supreme responsibility to look to, that we must not allow the peace of India to be broken as it was in previous days before our authority was established?—That, I understand, is the chief aim.

8141. The existence of these wide divisions would not stop reform, but would make it our duty and our responsibility to be cautious in the reform; that is all you say?—Yes.

8142. I have read all that you have published and spoken. You do not oppose yourself to a general advance of responsible government—to the spirit of the Declaration of August, 1917?—Certainly not. I consider that pledge was made by Parliament, and that everyone is bound to assist in carrying it out.

8143. I quite understood so. But you think that great caution is necessary, and you also think, as the Montagu-Chelmsford Report established and as the pronouncement of August, 1917, laid down, that the judge of the advance must be the British Parliament of the time?—Yes.

8144. Now you think that this advance might be realised in your opinion more successfully by the proposals of the Majority Report rather than by the scheme of dualism?—That is my opinion.

8145. You think that the effect of the wide line of demarcation drawn between transferred and reserved subjects might rather be to draw a wall between the popular or Indian side of an administration and the official side?—Yes. from my point of view I regard it as likely perhaps to hamper the advance.

8146. That is what I understand to be your position, and you think that a better means of advance would be a general association, so far as it is found expedient or possible, of Indians in the whole Government, and that that might avoid the invidious sense of separation and distinction between the two functions of government?—Yes.

8147. You say on page 7 of your note, agreeing with the general tendency of the Report, that at present you do not see any possibility of extending this general scheme of reform from the Provincial Government to the Central Government of India?—That is so.

8148. In that you agree with the general tendency of the Report, but you think in regard to the Central Government of India it might be quite possible to carry out your plan of increasing, at every possible opportunity, the Indian share in that Central Government, and introducing more of the spirit of sympathy with the Indian people into that Government, if you were free from this dual system?—I should have no objection to increasing the Indian influence.

8149. And you think that might go on?—Certainly.

8150. And that in the course of a few years that might really modify the whole spirit of the Indian administration, perhaps more successfully than a dual system. It would be in that hope, at all events, that you would propose it?—It seems to me to give a more promising prospect of carrying out what is generally regarded as desirable.

8151. I want to ask you on one special subject now on which I wish to gain more information. It is with regard to education. You wrote a striking letter, and I think you supported it with other evidence, on the flagrant defects of some of the schools. These were under the management of the local body?—They were not under an education department—under the District Board.

8152. They were under local bodies?—Yes.

8153. How do you propose to enforce upon these local bodies any rules laid down by the Central Department?—When they receive grants from the Government you can, of course, enforce it, but when they do not you cannot do it.

8154. But cannot that system of grant earning be made universal?—A lot of people would not take grants from the Government, probably. Some of the institutions would not take them.

8155. But are they not then subject to inspection or subject to any authority?—There are a number of colleges in Calcutta that do not receive any grants from Government.

8156. I was speaking more of schools?—The schools in Bengal, I think, are recognised by the University.

8157. Not by the Government?—No.

8158. And inspected by the University?—They are inspected by the Government, but I do not know now the extent to which a school, receiving no grant, would be required in Bengal to be inspected by the Government official.

8159. Of course you understand that at home here we recognise a very large measure of local autonomy in the management of schools, and general control only through the system of grants by the Central Department?—Yes.

8160. The Central Department does not attempt, and does not wish, to interfere with the management of schools, and has nothing to do with that management. All it says is: "Before you can earn the grant you must conform to certain conditions." Now is not that combined local autonomy with a general supervision a better machinery?—It would perhaps furnish a reason for keeping education under the control of the Supreme Government.

8161. With local bodies to manage each school?—Yes.

8162. Perfectly independent in their management, so long as they complied with the rules of the Department?—Yes.

8163. In the case which you put forward of the totally inefficient and insanitary and unwholesome school, you had no means, I presume, of bringing home at once to these local managers their wrong-doing?—Oh, yes. It was in consequence partly of what occurred in the school that the order was passed limiting the number of pupils to be taught in a class in a secondary school to 33.

8164. Did they obey that rule?—Yes, but they objected to it.

8165. Would it not be possible to give a great deal of freedom to local bodies so long as they accepted general and absolutely necessary rules?—Yes.

8166. And would not that develop a great deal of independence in education?—Yes.

Chairman.] Does this really help us much, Sir Henry?

Sir

Sir Henry Craik.] I want to find out how far you might develop this independent educational administration by the development of local authorities subject to general rule.

Chairman.] But our only question is whether education is going to be transferred or reserved.

Sir Henry Craik.

8167. As bearing on that, I think the enormous importance of the question, far more than transferring or reserving the general subject, is to see how you are to develop free independent management in localities. (To the Witness.) You think that there might be a good deal of development if this independent power was fostered on the part of a locality?—I am sorry I cannot speak as to the exact extent to which it is now. I have not been in India for seven years. I think it is a thing which has always been aimed at. My only point was that in view of the attitude which is sometimes taken up as regards education it was desirable that the general control and formation of principles should rest with the Supreme Government.

8168. You would not divide education? You would not have a certain part a transferred subject?—My own feeling is strongly against breaking it up.

8169. But you think that if you had not this system between transferred and reserved subjects, it is quite possible that, with the general advance and increase of Indian administration, you might find that it was possible to entrust education to an Indian agent?—I am strongly in favour of doing everything we can to increase the amount to be so entrusted.

8170. You think that might come up under the scheme of gradual development of Indian administration—that it might be possible to entrust education to it?—Yes. My feeling is at the present moment that education should not be transferred.

8171. But if you abolish the distinction between transferred and reserved and just advance as far as you can?—I think you could give a great deal more to Indian influence in that case than I should like to see given by transferring the whole subject.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

8172. In your Memorandum you advise the dropping practically of sections 14 to 17 of the Bill, but you leave the position of the Government of India exactly as it is?—I should have no objection to adding to the Indian members of the Council, and increasing the size of the Legislative Council, but I think that there should not be too large an elected majority.

8173. The members of the Executive Council are to sit in a Council of State, and they may be nominated, I suppose, to the Legislative Assembly also?—They have to sit in both, I think.

8174. Do you think it is possible that the same men should sit in the two Chambers?—I think there are objections to that, but I do not think it is impossible.

8175. Do you think there would be any objection, either in the case of Delhi or in the provinces, in members of the Executive Council having the power of addressing the Assembly without being members of it? That has been the case in some Continental Assemblies. What I mean is to make the Government case before the Assembly comes to a decision?—I understand that proposal was made as regards the Secretaries to Governments.

8176. You think it is an important thing that the case should be made as authoritatively as possible before the Assembly commits itself?—Yes, certainly.

8177. Would it not be an advantage that Ministers or responsible persons should have an opportunity of making the case without being involved in the whole turmoil of discussions and divisions and all the paraphernalia of Parliamentary action?—I should think that would be a great advantage if it could be arranged.

8178. You have had a long experience of Calcutta, as well as the United Provinces?—Yes.

8179. Having regard to section 23, your answer on that was that you did not understand the precise effect of Clause 23, As I understand the Clause it enables rules to be made, and if necessary withdrawn and fresh rules made, which would very largely affect the power of the Secretary of State or his position in regard to the Government of India. Do you think that provision desirable?—I had not got the principal Act with me when I wrote that. Does it mean that the Secretary of State would have more powers to regulate the despatch of business than he has now? I do not understand the Section. I have not seen the principal Act.

8180. I cannot interpret it probably so well as you can?—I do not understand the object of it.

8181. It seems to me that under Clause 23 the Secretary of State in Council may restrict the exercise of any of the powers vested in the Secretary of State by the principal Act, and I would ask you, with your experience, whether anything which tends to throw doubt on the powers which the Secretary of State may or may not exercise is desirable?—I see. If this Clause is meant to limit the powers that exist under the general Act I should think that there might be some objection to it.

8182. If it was held in India that the interference or the interposition of the Secretary of State might be avoided by a continual agitation for fresh rules restricting it, would it not be very likely that agitation would arise?—I should think so.

8183. Therefore, for the avoidance of friction, would you like the duties of the Secretary of State and his relative position to the Governor to be laid down as clearly as possible before starting?—Yes. To be perfectly frank I do not understand the object of this section.

8184. In your Memorandum you say: "The position of the English official who will have no share in a decision on a transferred subject, while he will have to appear before the public as approving it, will be intolerable." Have you considered the possibility of deliberations in the Executive Council being rather consultative on matters in which the Ministers are concerned? If it became consultative would not it be possible to allow the Ministers full responsibility for what they chose to introduce?—Yes; but I understand that the member of the Executive Council is required to justify the position in public.

8185. Is it possible to secure that on all occasions both sides of the Government, if you have duality, should be in entire concurrence?—I imagine not.

8186. It is better frankly to admit that although after consultation a certain course is taken, those who take it are responsible for it?—Certainly.

8187. With regard to Civil Servants, you are very apprehensive of the effect of the passage of the Bill on the Indian Civil Service. Can you suggest any safeguards, whether by placing the establishment under the Governor or otherwise, which would obviate the dangers you are afraid of?—I think the dangers would be eliminated to a great extent if the Civil Service were under the Executive Government, although they did work for Ministers. They must work for the Ministers as well as for the Executive Government, and I understand the District Officer, for instance, will be working for both sides of the Government.

8188. Is there any precedent which you know of for the Supreme authority? I do not know what the case is in Egypt—are there cases in Egypt in which British officials are subject to the Minister, but their engagement and their services are controlled by a higher authority?—That, I think, is the case in Egypt.

8189. In any case, you think that some security of that kind is necessary unless the Indian Civil Service is to be very much broken up?—Yes. I have heard considerable criticism of the Egyptian Civil Service in regard to recent events in Egypt.

Mr. Montagu.

8190. You define in the Memorandum which I have been reading this morning what you mean by responsible government. You say: "Responsible government can only mean a system of government under which those who govern are responsible to those whom they govern—i.e., government by responsible Ministers responsible to a representative assembly." You use that as a definition of the words "responsible government" in the pronouncement of the 20th August?—Yes.

8191. Do you agree with the pronouncement of the 20th August? I know you accept it, but do you agree with it?—Must I answer that question?

8192. Well

8192. Well, it is rather important?—I wanted to conceal my disagreement.

8193. Then I will not try to expose it. But, if you remember in answering Lord Sydenham, Lord Sydenham put to you this question. I am quoting from memory: "Are we not, in giving India responsible government, giving to her something which is foreign to her nature, and probably not the most convenient form of government for her," and you answered "Yes"?—Do you mean to say that that is inconsistent with what I have written in my notes?

8194. No, not at all. The only point is if there was any purpose in that question and answer it rather tended to tear some of the veil off that concealment, did it not?—I do not know what the purpose of the question was.

8195. Now, in that spirit, you agree with Lord Sydenham in objecting, not only to the contents of the Bill, but to the form of the Bill. You said that you were unaware, in your experience of legislative achievements, of any other Bill which left seventeen matters to rules?—Yes.

8196. And you said that you disliked rules for many reasons. In your Memorandum, in answer to Question 18, you suggest that the Bill should define more exactly what Grand Committees are, and should define more exactly what the conditions of public service in India are to be. Taking Lord Sydenham's estimate—I have not verified it—if there are seventeen matters left to the rules you would be quite satisfied with the form of the enactment if there were only fifteen?—No. I thought these were more important.

8197. There are other matters which you would like taken away from rules and put in the statute?—I should personally prefer that.

8198. Could you tell me any others?—I should like all the constitutional portion to be laid down in the statute.

8199. So that they could not be altered except by a new statute?—Yes.

8200. You think that that rigidity is desirable in an Act of this kind?—The Bill does, in one of its Clauses, admit a certain amount of elasticity—in regard to the number, for instance, of the Legislative Council that are to be elected. Could not the clause dealing with other portions of the constitutional questions be also elastic?

8201. The differences between rules and the statute itself is that whenever you want to alter a statute you have to have a new statute; whenever you want to alter a rule it can be altered by resolutions of both Houses of Parliament?—I see the advantage from that point of view.

8202. One is easier than the other. You would prefer the more rigid form if it can be done?—Not with the object of preventing further advance, but because I like to see it, as a constitutional question, embodied in the law.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).] I do not want to interrupt the Secretary of State, but it is not a question of a resolution being carried by both Houses of Parliament, but these rules continue unless either House of Parliament passes a resolution.

Mr. Montagu.

8203. Yes, subject to resolution. (To the Witness.) That is all I have to ask you on that subject. Now I come to Clause 23?—That is the Clause I do not understand.

8204. That is the Clause you were talking to Lord Midleton about. When a Secretary of State considers how far and in what matters he shall interfere or assert his authority over the Government of India, as it present constituted, each Secretary of State in Council is free to choose those subjects for himself. He can, by a despatch, leave to the Government of India a certain decision, or he can demand that all decisions on certain subjects should be sent home. If that clause passes he will be able to lay rules before Parliament recommending to Parliament what he and his Council desire shall be the practice, until it is altered by another set of rules equally laid before Parliament. It is intended to leave it less to the individual action of a particular Secretary of State in Council, and put the matter in definite rules before Parliament. Which would you think from your experience is the better practice?—Under the explanation which you have given I should prefer that, because I think it would standardise the relations between the Government of India and the Secretary of State.

8205. In answer to Lord Sydenham you expressed the view that the main cause of the unattractiveness of the future to members of your Service was the duality in the Government?—Yes; I meant that they would come under Ministers.

8206. That is to my mind a very important distinction?—I understood that was the meaning of Lord Sydenham's question.

8207. If you ever get that form of responsible government which you say in your answer to Question 1 is contemplated by the announcement of the 20th August, all the Civil Servants would be under Ministers, and therefore it is not the duality, but it is the responsible government that is going to make the Civil Service unattractive. Is that so?—Yes. That is why I am so strong about responsible government being brought in gradually.

8208. But whenever it comes, in your opinion it will make the Civil Service less attractive?—I think that is generally allowed by everybody who writes to me from the Civil Service.

8209. In the pamphlet that you wrote you describe a conversation with me, in which you told me that you would recommend anybody who asked your advice about going to India not to go there, unless he went in the British Army?—Yes.

8210. I remember that quite well, because it impressed me very much at the time. You have given that advice several times, I presume?—No.

8211. You have never been asked?—No, I do not recall a case in which anybody has ever asked me. I decided in the case of my own son.

8212. You felt that the Indian Civil Service no longer, in 1910, offered employment to an Indian Civil Servant that would have made it attractive to you when you were a young man?—That is not exactly it. I foresaw that the future of the Civil Service would be such that I should not like it.

8213. You explained fully in your letter of February 9th the reason. You told Lord Curzon that the Service was in your opinion deteriorating, and you said, "Young Englishmen with the qualities required in India will not go out to an Indian career and exile if they cannot expect to exercise power and authority." That was the test in your mind in 1910?—Yes.

8214. I am very interested in your alternative schemes. Would you mind telling the Committee which of the schemes with which your name has been associated you would really prefer for carrying out this?—Which schemes do you mean?

8215. Well, you told us this morning that you preferred the scheme of the majority of the Local Governments to the scheme of the Bill?—Yes.

8216. There was a scheme published by the Indo-British Association, of which I think you are an officer, some time last year, and this has been revised recently on the lines of the Local Governments' scheme. Which would you prefer of the three?—I do not think I was in England when that was issued. I prefer the Local Governments' scheme.

8217. Coming to the Local Governments' scheme for the moment, which was put forward at Delhi by Sir Michael O'Dwyer, who was here yesterday, Sir Harcourt Butler had forwarded to the Government of India a scheme of his own which had transferred and reserved subjects in it, and which is published in the Blue Book. There is one sentence in that that I want you very much to let me draw your attention to, because I think it is very important. They suggest a unitary form of government such as you have advocated. It is on page 218, paragraph 5: "In the first place, it is contended that at some later date we shall be committed to a precipitate plunge from total irresponsibility to complete responsibility. This argument rests on the assumption that the gradual establishment of responsible government, as announced in the Declaration of the 20th August, postulates the grant in successive steps of responsible government of the Parliamentary type; and certainly, if the assumption be granted, the logical cogency of the argument argument cannot be denied." I am not reading the whole of it, but I do not think I am misstating it. "The alternatives are to apply the process as proposed in the Report gradually and to one part of the Government after another; or to retain an irremovable Executive until conditions are ripe for the grant of full Parliamentary government; and of these alternatives the latter on the assumption above noted, is clearly open to the criticism urged in the Report. But we are unable to see why the announcement of the 20th August should be given the restricted interpretation placed on it in the Report." In other words, this Committee was, I take it, acting on a totally different definition of the pronouncement of the 20th August to that which you have accepted in Question 1; and Sir Harcourt Butler's Committee says, as I read that paragraph, that if the Committee had been acting on your assumption they would have preferred the scheme of the Report?—I am not sure that that is not right.

8218. You see my purpose?—Yes.

8219. I am analysing some of the signatories to this scheme which you prefer. Now I come to Sir Benjamin Robertson, and he expressed his opinion on page 84?—What you have been reading on page 218 is not the Lieutenant-Governor's statement—it is the statement of a Committee which he appointed.

8220. Quite so; but if you will look at his letter he says he accepts the finding of his Committee. Now Sir Benjamin Robertson accepts the scheme which you prefer, but he says this: "I am unable to concur in the line of further development outlined in paragraph 10 (d). I should prefer to await the experience gained during the initial period and to leave it open to adopt the dualistic plan of the Joint Report." Therefore, so far as Sir Benjamin Robertson is concerned, it is fair to say that he sees in the scheme which you prefer merely another step before, quite possibly at some delayed time, you have to take the plunge to this awful system of duality?—I am unable to say what was in Sir Benjamin Robertson's mind, but it reads like that.

8221. Now I come to the point I am particularly anxious to get your opinion upon. Do you believe that if Parliament were to accept the scheme which you say you would prefer, we should have a fair chance, if we are to carry out the pronouncement of the 20th August, to escape altogether the necessity, at any time, of embarking on duality?—I think so.

8222. One question about your scheme. You would like two Houses?—I am theoretically in favour of two Houses, yes.

8223. And you would like one to be communally elected and the other territorially elected?—One territorially elected, and one to represent special interests, and also nominations.

8224. Would you have an elected majority in both Houses?—I do not think you could have an elected majority in the Upper House.

8225. You think you would have a nominated majority in the Upper House?—Yes.

8226. Would you have an official majority in the Upper House?—You want to get a majority to ensure Government legislation, I think.

8227. And that could only be done, in your opinion, with an official majority?—There would only be any certainty of it with an official majority.

8228. You said that if you could not have two Houses in a Province you would prefer the Bombay scheme of allowing the Government to pass its legislation if it got a percentage of votes?—Yes.

8229. Would you have that percentage, a percentage of official votes in the Provincial Legislative Council?—I do not think one could do that.

8230. You would have some of them nominated?—I suppose you must have.

8231. Is there any greater certainty than of passing legislation by that means than by the Grand Committee which has been suggested?—I think there possibly is more likelihood of it, because the Grand Committee cuts the thing so fine.

8232. The Grand Committee, as you said, makes it necessary to be supported by nine out of ten of the non-official members?—I see what you mean.

8233. But you are able to nominate any members that you wish. Would your percentage proposal not cut it as fine as that?—I suppose it would; but I was proceeding on the supposition that the percentage proposal would be based upon a rather differently constituted Legislative Council.

8234. Looking back over your experience in the United Provinces, was there any occasion upon which you think that you ought to have been able to secure legislation of a kind in which you could not get this small amount of non-official support?—No; I was singularly fortunate. I had very little legislation to undertake.

8235. Are not the matters on which you cannot get any non-official support much more largely Government of India questions than Provincial questions?—They might be very largely Provincial questions connected with the Land Revenue Administration, the Rent Laws Revenue.

8236. With regard to the development of industries. I was very much interested in what you said on that very important topic. Are there any cases in your knowledge in which, if a Local Government had been left free, it would have done more for the development of industries than if it had been trammelled by a higher authority?—The Madras Government did a certain amount, as I daresay you know, for the development of industries; it developed the aluminium industry, and also advanced the development of the chrome-leather industry. In the United Provinces I had some experiments made in connection with oil-pressing; but we were all told to abandon them by a late Secretary of State.

8237. Would not all the difficulties that you have suggested be got over if Local Governments in charge of the development of industries took joint action among themselves?—I do not think so. Take the case that I instanced. Local Governments could not arrange to build railways, nor could they arrange to purchase steel rails; nor, if you had a wagon factory established in India, could they arrange to purchase the wagons.

8238. But they might arrange the conditions on which the wagon factory was to be run, and be the instrument by which they got from the Government of India the right to contract to purchase wagons?—The wagons would be required by the Government of India, and therefore it seems to me to be reasonable that the Government of India should be the dominating partner in establishing the industry.

8239. Do you approve of the steps which it is suggested in the Joint Report should be taken for associating Indians with the whole Government—I mean reserved and transferred subjects together—by Under-Secretaries and Standing Committees?—I see no objection to that. I think it might be good.

Lord Sinha.

8240. May I take it that you are in general, if not absolute agreement, with Lord Sydenham's expressed views on the question of Indian reforms?—What views do you mean?

8241. Lord Sydenham's views on the question of the Indian constitutional reforms now proposed. Am I right in suggesting that you are in general, if not absolute agreement, with those views?—I think in general agreement; yes.

8242. When you said that we ought to have had evidence from some of the masses before this Committee, did you refer to the class of ryots?—Yes, I should like representatives of ryots, among others.

8243. That is, the vast uneducated masses of the Indian population?—Yes. They have certain representatives.

8244. Is it not the fact that you yourself hold that these masses have no political opinions, and do not care to have any?—They have lots of opinions about their own welfare, I think.

8245. But political opinions?—I am now speaking of their welfare; I do not know about their political opinions. I think they have none. But they associate themselves for the protection of their own interests.

8246. You quote—I take it with approval—in this pamphlet of yours which has been referred to, both from the Report and from Sir Valentine Chirol: "The great dumb masses whose horizon has been limited through centuries will be limited for generations to come to the fields they till and to the jungles in which they they move and have their being." You quote that with approval, do you not?—That they should continue to do that?

8247. I mean you approve of that statement with regard to their mental attitude?—Yes.

8248. Do you think it is any use hearing these people with regard to the questions now before us, or any of them?—I think there are a large number of people who might have been heard before you come down to that stratum.

8249. I understood you to say in answer to Lord Sydenham that you had no objection to the exercise of a much larger influence than at present possessed by Indians, and a much larger employment than at present exists of Indians in the service of the Government—that is, in the higher services?—I forget whether Lord Sydenham asked me about employment, but I am in favour of their having more employment than they have now.

8250. In the higher services?—Yes.

8251. And also to the increase of the influence of Indians on Government?—Certainly.

8252. I am only repeating what you said to Lord Sydenham in order to found a question upon it. This larger employment must necessarily be of the educated classes?—Yes.

8253. And this larger influence, which you are willing to concede, must necessarily be of the educated classes?—Yes.

8254. And the fact that they have been agitating, as you describe it, against the British Government would not be a bar to that?—Not if they were associated with British administrators.

8255. It is the educated classes, you say, who have agitated against our Government? The extension of influence and the larger employment of the educated classes you would advocate or concede, notwithstanding the fact of their agitation—whatever that may mean—against the Government?—Certainly, because, as I have already said, I am pledged, like everybody else, to the pronouncement of the 20th August.

8256. But if I understand your evidence correctly, you would not be prepared to give them control in any matter of government?—Separate control, do you mean?

8257. Any control. You would give them influence, you would give them employment, but you would not give them control in the matter of government—that is, of administration?—My intention is not that at all. I say if you accept the scheme of the Lieutenant-Governors they will get control, and eventually they will get the whole control.

8258. Is not the scheme of the Lieutenant-Governors based on the fact that there will be increase of influence rather than of immediate control?—I do not think so, and, at all events, it ultimately aims at the Government being practically entirely Indian.

8259. That may be the ultimate aim, but at present will it mean any control of individual Indians or of Legislative Councils under that scheme?—Certainly.

8260. Am I right in saying that from the evidence suggested, in fact stated, the three principal points of weakness in India now are the failure to develop industries, the failure to initiate a proper system of education, and the existence of racial bitterness between Hindoos and Mahommedans? Am I right in suggesting that you characterise those as the three chief weaknesses in India at the present time?—I did not state them as such.

8261. But am I right in saying that that is your opinion? You have mentioned, though perhaps not in the words in which I have put them, all three?—I will say I think they are three of the greatest.

8262. Now, taking the first, the failure to develop industries or want of industrial development, am I right in understanding you to have said that that is due principally to the Government of India and the Secretary of State?—I did not say that in general it was due to the Government of India. I instanced a case in which the Government of India had interfered, or, rather, had failed to support effectively the schemes which I had myself started.

8263. But was not the trend of your evidence to blame the Government of India for not taking proper initiative for the development of Indian industries?—

I was Commerce and Industry Member and I certainly do blame the Government of India because they would not give me enough money.

8264. Take education: practically there is no technical education; as your Technological Institute failed, so have others which others have advocated in other Provinces?—Yes.

8265. There has been therefore no advancement practically in technical education?—I think if you will look at the files of the India Office you will find that the scheme for the advancement of technical education in the United Provinces, which is the only one with which I am familiar, was defeated by the Secretary of State.

8266. I know. I may tell you that I looked into that, and I admire the pluck with which you advocated it, and regret the Secretary of State's decision more than I can tell you. But I am only pointing out to you the fact that there is no system of technical or technological instruction now in any of the Provinces of India, properly speaking?—I do not think that is the fault of the Civil Service.

8267. I am not suggesting that?—But somebody did just now.

8268. There is practically no system of organised scientific education now?—Is that so? I am not quite sure about that. There is some post-graduate teaching.

8269. That is only very recently, and it is apart from Government institutions; it is the Universities which have started that?—With the encouragement of the Government.

8270. Probably with some assistance?—I think there is some post-graduate teaching at Allahabad University.

8271. Yes, but mostly with the assistance of the University itself?—That I do not know.

8272. I have no doubt the Government also makes grants; but that is very recent?—Yes.

8273. The advancement of scientific education dates practically only a few years back. Now take the question of racial antagonism. That has existed, notwithstanding the effort of the Government, for considerably over one hundred years?—Yes.

8274. Having regard to all these defects and deficiencies which have existed notwithstanding the present system of government, do you not think, the people might be given a trial whether they can remedy these things or not?—I start with a difficulty as regards the last point of a Government which consists of one of the parties which are at racial enmity, and I start with the idea that it is rather difficult for them to settle a matter which an independent authority has failed to settle. As regards technical education, the people themselves might fail, just as well as the unfortunate officials who tried to introduce it failed.

8275. I understood you to say that there is no difference between Extremists and Moderates, because they are all Nationalists?—No, I did not say that. I said I would like to call them all Nationalists.

8276. And you would not blame any of them, whether they are called Moderates or Extremists, for that?—I did not attempt to do so.

8277. As regards the letter of Mr. Chintamani, which was referred to, do you consider that because he suggests certain amendments which he considers improvements in the Bill therefore he is an opponent of the Bill?—No. I forget the exact terms of his letter, because I was away and did not keep a copy of it, but my impression after reading the letter was that he was not particularly enthusiastic about the Bill. I may be wrong.

8278. You are unaware that many of the witnesses before this Committee said they would accept the Bill as it is if Parliament does not choose to amend or alter it in the directions which they want?—I was not aware of that.

8279. With regard to the deterioration of the Indian Civil Service, may I take it that that deterioration, which set in before 1910, had nothing to do with the question of constitutional reforms?—No, it certainly had not, but I think it had something to do with the prospects which people saw of their future life in India.

8280. That is to say, that the present bureaucratic system of government could not endure for ever—they forecast forecast that the present bureaucratic or autocratic system of government could not exist for ever?—No, it was not exactly that, but the amenities of life were getting less, and one thing and another becoming less pleasant.

Lord Islington.

8281. You have been asked to answer a good many questions on the form of government which is to take place under the reform scheme, and you have expressed very strong dissent to what is called the dual system. I understand that you dislike the dual system, because you interpret it to mean that there are to be set up in each of the Provinces of India practically two distinct Governments side by side?—Yes.

8282. I suppose you have read the subsequent remarks of the Government of India with regard to the original scheme?—Yes.

8283. It somewhat emphasises that proposal in the direction of a separate purse, and in the direction of practically constituting each Minister of a subject a Chancellor of the Exchequer for himself?—Yes.

8284. I may take it that you have a strong aversion to that portion of the scheme as well?—Yes.

8285. Then you fall back upon the scheme of the Local Governments; do you feel that that scheme will really accurately interpret the pronouncement?—I think so.

8286. Of giving real responsibility?—The pronouncement, as I read it, does not say that you will give responsible government at once, but that you will gradually do so. This scheme, I think, does give power and authority to Indian members of the Government, and will eventually enable the whole Government to become Indian, and therefore become responsible.

8287. Would you say from your knowledge of India that if the whole of educated India regarded the Provincial Governors' scheme as an inadequate interpretation of the pronouncement it would be better to have something more in advance of that scheme if you are to have a smooth run of Government in years to come in India?—You ask me if the whole of the educated community regard it as inadequate?

8288. Yes?—I think otherwise you would have constant agitation, which would make government more difficult.

8289. I will put it in this way. Do you think that there is any hope of a satisfactory system of government in India in the immediate years to come if a scheme is established there which does not meet with the general acceptance of the educated classes in India?—No, I think it will be very difficult; it will make Government very difficult.

8290. It will be a very difficult situation in India?—Yes.

8291. Have you ever thought, beyond this scheme of the local Governments, whether something still might not be devised as between that scheme and the scheme known as the dual scheme?—Something which would go further than the local Governments', but would not be dual?

8292. Something which would go much further in the direction of unity in one direction, but something, on the other hand, which would produce, in the eyes of educated India, a more satisfactory interpretation of the pronouncement of responsible government?—No, I have not thought of that.

8293. You have never thought of that?—No.

8294. Would you admit this, that there are certain subjects or services, if you like, which might be given a much more responsible form of government in India than others?—I am not sure that I understand.

8295. I will put it in this way: Would you say that you might give to some of the subjects that come under administration, such as agriculture or public works, more authority to the Legislative Council in the early days than you would to subjects which relate to the peace and order of the country?—You mean that if you had this unitary Government that it should pay more attention to the views of the Legislative Council on such questions as those than with regard to others?

8296. Yes, but I would go further and have machinery by which the decisions might be given more definite effect to in accordance with the views of the Assembly than those which relate more to questions of law and order?—If you have a unitary Government and a Legislative Council with a substantial majority I should imagine that the unitary Government will, year by year, pay more attention to the Legislative Council's recommendations, and that effect would come about.

8297. What would you suggest should be the composition of your unitary government—how many members?—I suppose it would have very much the same composition as the dual government. You will have the Governor and an official, a European, and I do not see that you want more than two Indians to be taken from the elected members of the Legislative Council. That would make four.

8298. You would approve of a scheme by which you had two Indians appointed by the Governor from the Legislative Council, and one European Councillor and the Governor?—Yes. The Governor of Bombay suggested five.

8299. With regard to the question that came up for discussions in Council as distinguished from the Departmental questions, would those be decided by vote?—Yes, discussions in Council will always be decided by a vote.

8300. Therefore if the Indian element were in favour of a particular question which did not meet the favour of the official member, the European, the decision would have to be made by the Governor in his casting vote?—Yes, as sometimes it has be done in the Government of India.

8301. He would override the Indian Ministers?—Yes.

8302. Assuming that you had in this so-called dual government—I dislike the word just as much as you do; I prefer to call it a government which has gradations of authority, of subjects—assuming that you had laid down definitely that all subjects, whether they be those that come under the reserved category or whether they be those which come under the transferred category, have to go through the full deliberate discussions of a united government before any decision was come to, would you feel that the vices of the dual system would be to some extent mitigated?—I presume that the great majority of the business would be conducted in the way in which it is in the Government of India; the Departmental member, whether he was the Indian from the Legislative Council, or the official European, would dispose of the ordinary cases in his Department.

8303. I am talking of those which must come under collective discussion, Cabinet questions as we should call them in this country. Would you see an improvement in the scheme as embodied in the Bill if it were laid down definitely that all these questions, whether they come under one category or the other, must undergo full discussion by the combined Government?—I think so; I think that is an advantage.

8304. Would there be a very great deal of difference between what you are advocating and the dual system? Because I understand that under your scheme, the scheme which you advocate, it will ultimately be left to the decision of the Governor as to whether a subject shall one way or another. Is not that so?—Yes, certainly.

8305. The provisions of the Bill as they stand now give the Governor a final decision in transferred subjects?—In the case of all the subjects, whether reserved or transferred, the Indian members would then have an equal power of expressing their opinion and voting with everybody else.

8306. Do you see any deep vice in having a combined Cabinet which for all subjects has a combined deliberation and discussion, but every decision is marked off in regard to subjects?—Yes, I do think the one is much preferable to the other.

8307. It is a kind of broad idea I have been putting before you. Would you say if that was brought into the scheme it would to some extent mitigate the evils of the dual system?—If it were brought into the dual system?

8308. Well, if it was interpreted in the light which I am rather inadequately trying to put forward?—It would rather cease to be a system of transferred and reserved subjects, would it not?

8309. Not necessarily in regard to voting, any more than I understand your unity system would be, because you would be prepared, I understand, to leave the Governor to exercise his discretion in regard to certain subjects being accepted in the direction that the Indian portion of the Government desire?—Certainly.

8310. You are anxious to see that?—Yes.

8311. You really dislike this dual system, because you have interpreted it to mean two quite separate Cabinets—Ministers sitting with the Governor in one, and the Executive Council sitting in the other. Am I right in that?—Not altogether.

8312. Sitting and voting?—Yes, to a certain extent that is correct.

8313. That is how you have interpreted it?—Yes.

8314. If they were merged as I have suggested would that remove some of the evils?—If they were merged, would not it cease to be a dual government?

8315. We are not tied to the word "duality"; it does not matter whether you call it dual, or what you call it. The point is to get at a scheme which is a workable scheme which will work with harmony, and which will at the same time respond accurately to the pronouncement of the 20th August. What I am asking you is whether, with collective deliberation and separation of decision, you think that would be a preferable scheme to the one as you have interpreted it in the Bill?—Yes, but I should prefer a unitary government.

8316. You would prefer unitary government?—Yes.

8317. But I was asking you whether you would prefer this idea to the one in the Bill?—Well, I think I would, but I am not quite sure that I understand it.

8318. That is probably my fault; it is rather a difficult thing to explain?—No, it is probably my fault.

8319. I wanted to get at certain views of yours on the point. Now, as regards the Government of India, have you read Lord Crewe's Report?—No, I have not a copy of it.

8320. Are you in favour of the statutory powers of the Secretary of State's Council being retained?—Well, I think the powers of the Secretary of State's Council have been so very much reduced in practice in recent years that I do not attach very great importance to the maintenance of the Secretary of State's Council.

8321. Would you like to see the powers of the Council made more effective by statute?—I should.

8322. Would you like to see the financial powers of the Council made effective by statute?—Yes. I am speaking without having seen this Report. I only saw it in the paper.

8323. Would you be in favour of a proportion of one-third of Indians within the Council?—I see no objection to that.

8324. Take a Council of nine, would you be in favour of three Indians?—Yes, I raise no objection.

8325. As regards the Viceroy's Executive Council, would you favour having three Indians on that Council?—I would rather begin with two, as proposed.

8326. Would you prefer two?—You have one now, and propose to put in one more at once.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

8327. You spoke about a case where the Secretary of State had, in your opinion, stopped useful industrial development in India. Do you think that is due to the present constitutional arrangement with regard to Indian revenues belonging to the Secretary of State and everything having to come to Whitehall? Would it, in your opinion, be much better if India were practically cut off from the control of the Secretary of State in matters of finance?—In that particular instance it would have been, I think. I think I should have got my case then.

8328. Would you say so generally?—I would not like to say it generally.

8329. With regard to the question of fiscal autonomy, we have a good deal of evidence on that. Are you in favour of tariff autonomy for India, that is to say, allowing India to set up a tariff if the Government of India and the Legislative Assembly of India consider it necessary to protect infant industries in India?—Yes. I understand that such a tariff, if established, would have to receive the sanction of some authority in this country. So that it would not be inconsistent with arrangements of other portions of the Empire. I should be in favour of that.

8330. That is to say, you would not be in favour of giving the same fiscal autonomy to India as is now enjoyed by the self-governing Dominions?—Not at the present time.

8331. That is the goal to which you wish to work?—There is a case now, I think, before the Legislative Council in India for the imposition of an export duty on hides, with a rebate. I think 15 per cent. is the export duty, and a rebate of 10 per cent. when the hides go to a portion of the British Empire. A very prominent member of the Legislative Council denounced the rebate, and therefore I think there is a danger at the present moment. Ten years ago, one of the ablest of the extreme politicians, B. Bepud Chandra Pal, a man still in the front line, stated what would be done if India could become politically independent. (Here enter the quotation.) Not longer ago, Mr. C. R. Day described the British merchants of Calcutta as "the petty traders who come here to rob us of our money."

8332. Assuming Imperial Preference was granted by India to the other portions of the British Empire, you would be in favour of some considerable measure of tariff autonomy being given to India in order to develop her industrial resources—a modification of Free Trade which Parliament puts upon India?—Yes. I had myself on one occasion to make a small speech in my Legislative Council denouncing a proposal made by certain Indian members of it to impose an import duty on sugar. With that proposal I was heartily in sympathy, but I had to make a speech denouncing it.

8333. On this all-important question of industrial development, do you not think that until greater fiscal autonomy is obtained it will be impossible to get both Indian and foreign capital invested in Indian industries when they see the country being flooded with Japanese and American goods?—I am absolutely in favour of protecting nascent industries.

8334. Do you think the Bill in its present form does not go far enough in the direction of freeing India?—I think it does not, certainly. Lord Minto was strongly in favour of protecting nascent industries, and when I was Commercial Member of his Council I was equally in favour of it.

(The Witness is directed to withdraw.)

(After a short adjournment.)

THE RIGHT HON. EDWIN MONTAGU IN THE CHAIR.

COMMISSIONER FREDERICK ST. GEORGE DE LAUTOUR BOOTH-TUCKER called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Mr. Montagu.

8335. Commissioner Booth-Tucker, Lord Selborne asked me to express his regret that he is unable to be in the chair this afternoon, and he has asked me to preside. I believe you were a member of the Indian Civil Service?—Yes.

8336. For how many years?—For five years.

8337. And since then you have been in the Salvation Army?—Yes.

8338. And at the present you are the head of the Salvation Army in India?—Yes.

8339. For how long?—Off and on, for the last thirty-eight years.

8340. Would you like to make any statement to the Committee?—I would like to say I have been interested in India all my life. I was born in India. My father was in the Civil Service, and my grandfather was a member of the old East India Company, a chairman, so that I have had India in my blood and my bones ever since—in fact, old General Booth used to say that when India was mentioned Tucker came out of his kennel and barked! The few years I spent in the Civil Service were very useful to me, the training I got was useful, and my knowledge of Indian affairs from the Governmental side was useful, because I got to know about the difficulties of governing a country like India from the Governmental side. Then afterwards

wards, when I went out in the Salvation Army, I got to know the other side. When I went to India as a Salvationist I adopted the Indian dress. I was not satisfied—I was too far off; there was a certain gap between me when I was a Government official and the people of India which I wanted to bridge, and I felt that I must adopt an Indian name and wear Indian clothes. I was told I should never get any other Europeans to do it, but we have now got nearly three hundred European missionaries in India, nearly all of whom wear the Indian dress and all of whom have, as soon as they land, to take an Indian name. They are also required to serve under Indian officers, and amongst our officers there is no distinction between the Indian and the Britisher. I felt myself that India needed the Britisher, but needed him as a companion and brother-in-arms of the Indian, and I have always tried, so far as my influence went, to make the two one and to get them to forget any racial difference by the absolute unity between the two. Our work is chiefly not amongst the upper classes in India, but amongst those who need us most, the depressed classes and the criminal tribes, but I travel up and down the country. Of course, I learned one side while I was in the Civil Service, but I have learned quite another side since. Travelling up and down the country now, I hold Salvation Army Congresses and Conferences at which we have audiences of from 3,000 to 15,000 wherever we go. I always have a megaphone to address the crowds, and I have a megaphone for my translator. It is impossible to talk all the languages, although I know several of them. Speaking on behalf of these depressed classes and the criminal tribes, I think that in the Britisher they have a warm and constant friend, and that he has earned the title which he receives in India, "Gharib parwar, man bap"; the protector of the poor and mother and father. Of course, I am not one of those who think that there is nothing to be improved in him. I think, for instance, if I had to go back to be trained now for the Civil Service I should want practice as a public speaker. As a public servant I was practically dumb, unaccustomed to debate or public speech, and unable to meet critics on their own ground; the Indian is a born talker, and I think that the British official in India might be greatly improved if his system of training was altered; if (1) he was trained in public speaking—which at present he does not know, except a little he picks up here and there—and (2) if he was trained in the commerce, industry and agriculture which afterwards he has got to direct. The Salvation Army does a great deal in helping the criminal tribes and depressed classes with industry and agriculture, and we have found it rather difficult sometimes to do all we would like to do, because of the ignorance of commercial, industrial and agricultural matters on the part of those who comprise the Government of the country. But the Britisher's honesty and straightforwardness are of incalculable value, in my opinion, to India, and I would like to see the Britisher improve in three respects: (1) as I was saying, in public speaking, (2) in his commercial, industrial and agricultural training, and (3) in his absolute unanimity with the people. Let him make the people feel that he loves them. I believe you can do anything with Indians if you make them feel—not by the lips, but by your actions—that you love them. I have gone in and out among all classes of Indians, and I am glad to have an opportunity of saying that a more beautiful set of people I have not met in the world, with whom I would rather associate in any sense or put myself under them as well as over them. Take our own criminal tribes and depressed classes, although they may not know how to read and write, they have got plenty in them—they are not a set of fools. Take the simple villager—I love to sit down in a village and gather the villagers round me and talk to them about their own affairs—and they are not fools. As you know, Mr. Chairman, practically India is very much a self-governing country. Every village has got its Lambardar; every class has got its Panchayat, and the village head man manages the affairs of the village, and is looked upon as their representative, and the village Panchayats manages the affairs of the individual castes in the village. I should be sorry for anything which weakened that throughout India. It has occurred to me—I do not know if I may be allowed to express an opinion—I express it perhaps not as a Salvationist, but simply as one who is perhaps a man of affairs and one who has studied the question in America—where I was nine years; in French Indo-China, where I spent some time purposely investigating the French Republican ideas of governing their subjects; in Korea, where I think every Indian civilian ought to go and spend six months to see how the Japs do it; in the Philippines, where the population is very much like that of India, and where the Americans have a good many things which I think they could teach us. When they got to the Philippines the first thing they did was to ship a thousand schoolma'ams, as they call them there, and they said to the Philippinos: "You shall govern your own country, you shall come into Congress, you can be in the Senate, or be in the House of Representatives, but you must learn English first"; and these thousand schoolma'ams there did more to pacify the country than the armies they sent; they were soon able to dismiss their armies. In French Tonquin, too, of course it is a Republic—both France and America are Republics administering the native populations which have, in the providence of God, come under them; and the Japs, of course, have got in Korea a very much similar system—I think that in Japan itself they base their system of Government on our system in England. In India itself it seems to me that there are some plans which we might do well to copy, like the Srimoolams or Consultative Parliaments. I think, Mr. Chairman, I might perhaps say that our British rulers in India have been too nervous about congresses and conferences, and that, I think, may have been due to the fact that they are not, as a rule, very good public speakers. (You will excuse me, but I have got a malady which affects my speech, so that I am not able to speak very distinctly.) Our British rulers, our British officials in India, can write as much as you like, but they are generally very poor speakers, because they have no practice. I think it was splendid to send out public men like Lord Willingdon or Sir George Lloyd, who understand public life and who are accustomed to give hard knocks and to receive them as well; it is a great training for our civilians. It seems to me a great defect in the training of the young civilian if he cannot speak unless he has got a paper to read from. He has no debating ability. If it were not for that they would be all right. The Japanese system in Korea is conference, conference, conference, gather the people together and hear what they have got to say; the Governor has got to keep going out and gathering the people together, not in Legislative Conferences, but preparatory to legislation he gathers the people together in this part and in the other part, and ascertains from them what are their opinions and needs. The principle in Travancore is splendid; they have an annual Parliament—you know about that, Mr. Chairman; they call it a Srimoolam, a splendid thing. They gather together the leaders of the people and they let them talk for three or four days and air all their grievances, a sort of safety valve. Anybody can say where they feel that the Government is wrong, and the Government is not too thin-skinned to listen and to be told its mistakes and shortcomings. They are willing to give and take. I do not know, but I think there is a feeling on the part of the Indian civilian that it is below his dignity to answer criticisms, so that when he is criticised he is dumb and goes on. It is not like that with our public men in England; they expect to be criticised, and they answer the criticisms. The British official in India is a splendid man, he is unbribable, and that in itself, in a country where corruption is widespread, is a very great thing. We find, on behalf of our poor people, that they get into all sorts of trouble, and we can always have somebody to appeal to and feel that justice will be done to them. But in that respect it seems to me that the British official is not sufficiently—what shall I call it?—en rapport with the people, he is not hand and glove with them as much as he should be and as he might be, and as I think he wants to be, and as I believe, if his training was a little bit altered, he would be. If you take the industries and agriculture, the position is most difficult. We are interested in the silk industry. The British official knows nothing about silk, and what he does not know he does not believe, and it is very difficult to get him to move, and if we do happen to convince him the next one is not prepared to take it up or will undo perhaps what has been done by his predecessor, and the simple principles of commerce, agriculture and industry are put under the thumb and the management of people who very often have had absolutely no experience in it, and who give executive orders which very much hamper the progress of the country in those respects. Now, I do not blame the British official for that, but I say that it is our fault in not having given him a proper training. Greek and Latin are not going to teach him how to manage commercial affairs, and it seems to me, as a Britisher who has moved about among Indians, that the Britisher ought to be improved from our end here a great deal and given, in his training and preparation, an experience which would be invaluable to him when he gets out there. I do not know if I might give you an illustration. A great public function was arranged—I will not say where. The whole of the town was gathered together. The Lord Sahib, as they call the Governor, was there, and a lady I know very well said to the cook of her house, "There is to be a great public function; would you like to go?" The answer was, "Yes." He would like to go, so he went. He came back afterwards, and she said to him, "Now, cook, did you go—and how did you like it?" and the cook replied, "Very nice, a fine tamasha." Then she asked, "Did you see the Lord Sahib there?" and he said, "Yes; there were three Lord Sahibs." There was only one, as a matter of fact, but the cook saw what he took to be three Lord Sahibs, beautifully dressed. They were the three Military A.D.C.'s, and he took them for Lord Sahibs. Then he was asked, "Did the Lord Sahib speak?" and the answer was, "No; the Lord Sahib did not speak, but the Padri Sahib got up and he gave a long prayer." This long prayer which was given by the Padri Sahib was when the Governor got up and read his speech. Now, I only mention that as illustrating what I have been saying. With a dumb Government, what can you do? You want a voice for the official. You want him to gather the people together and speak to them—to take them into his confidence and say, "What are your troubles?" The British officials ought to give their reasons, and put their side of any question to the people, and explain why they do things. Very often they do quite the right thing; but they do not take the people into their confidence. Now, when Sir Stanley Reed took up the war propaganda in India, it was simply marvellous how the country responded. For once in its history—since I have known the Government of India—the Government of India spoke and uttered its views. The British lion roared, and everybody heard it. Everybody rushed for the paper—I forget how many millions of copies were disposed of. The people said, "Yes; this is true." They called it the Haqq—the truth. The Government of India said, "We will give you the white as well as the black, and we will give you the black as well as the white, the troubles and everything about the war," and it went through the country, and I believe it staved off very serious trouble at the time. Of course, Sir Stanley Reed managed it in the most masterly manner, and he had the sympathy of the people, because he understood the people. Now, there again the British official in India does not understand the use of the press—the use of the newspaper—and I need not say, Mr. Chairman, that it is the last thing the British official thinks of studying. I do not know about this country—I only speak for India—but I do say that there was the one time in this great emergency when the Government spoke and everybody rallied. They said, "Now we understand; now we know the truth." Sir Stanley Reed told me himself that he insisted upon putting the dark side as well as the bright, and took the people into his confidence. I believe, if the Indians are taken into your confidence, they are a wonderful people. I go to them with my troubles, and I say, "What shall I do? The Sahib (official) will not agree to what you advise." I advise with the very poorest villager there, and I find they respond to it and they can give me a great deal of very sensible advice. The aim, it seems to me, ought to be to unite and bring together the Indian and the Britisher, with his grit, determination and other qualities, which are splendid things. In the times of those riots there—I do not know if I am transgressing, and you must kindly pull me up if I am—but I want to give an illustration of what the Britisher does, and does it without saying a word, without blowing his own trumpet, or having it blown for him. There was a certain City in India very much disturbed. There was an American mission there—fifteen or twenty missionaries—and they were awfully upset. All the Europeans were expecting they were going to be massacred, and these Americans were alarmed and armed themselves with rifles, revolvers, and all the rest, and were guarding their mission. They sent to the Deputy Commissioner, and the Deputy Commissioner came up quite calmly. He said, "It will be all right; do not worry. I have been round." They said to him, "What are you going to do?" and his answer was, "I am going back to my headquarters." It was about twenty miles distant. They said, "How can you, with this going on?" and his reply was, "Very well, if you like, I will stop." And he stopped. They asked him, "Where are you going to stop?" and he said, "In the Dak Bungalow." "Who is to be with you?" And he said, "Nobody." "Where are you going to sleep?" "In the garden outside." No police, no soldiers in the neighbourhood; that one man alone and the whole of that town of 80,000 people in a boil! He called together some of the leading gentlemen there (he knew them very well) and said, "Now, gentlemen, you know there has been trouble here and there about the country, and I hear there is going to be trouble here, so I hold you responsible. I do not intimate, I do not hint for a moment that you have anything to do with it, but you are the leaders of your own nation, and I call upon you in the name of my Government to keep things quiet here. I am staying here, I shall sleep in the garden, and you can send to me if you want me." Nothing happened, and the thing went off quite quietly. That man's name never appeared in the papers, and he never got a K.C.B. or anything else. That sort of thing is done over and over again in India, and I say that India cannot afford to dispense with that magnificent quality that they have got in the Britisher in India; they cannot afford to do without it. I, speaking as an Indian, say that we do not want to diminish or weaken that magnificent element, because it is good for the interests of all the people there. Now, may I make one suggestion, and that is, when you come to representation, if I may touch upon it, the 700,000 village head men of India would make splendid representatives of the country. They are trained, they know their villages off by heart, and they are the chosen representatives of their people. I mention this because that is what is done—this is not a theory but a practice in French Indo-China. The village head men come together to certain centres and they vote for their representatives, who are generally members of themselves, and that very much simplifies the voting problem. They vote when they come to pay their taxes at certain centres. I mention that again because that same thing has been done in the North-West Frontier Province. My brother-in-law, Sir Frederick Cunningham, was telling me how, when there, he recommended that plan to the Government for getting the views of the villages by getting the village head men when they come together to vote for their representatives; he said that in his time that answered extremely well, and from my knowledge of India, if something on that line could be done you would get over the difficulty of a miscellaneous representation, and you would get the agricultural views of matters properly represented. In India, as you know, Mr. Chairman, you have got 90 per cent. of the population agriculturists, while all the sugar-plums go to the cities—10 per cent. of the population get all the Universities, all the hospitals, all the charity money, all the libraries, all the advantages, and the 90 per cent. are very often overlooked, and those 90 per cent. are the backbone of the country. I have thought myself that if some arrangement could be made by which there could be an association of all the villages in India, say about 700,000 of them, with an average population of 300 or 400—if there could be an association formed of every village, then it could be said: "We will help you villagers to have a library in every village, sanitary arrangements in every village, no castes whatever shall be sent to the puddles and

Mr. Montagu—continued.

and pools to drink dirty and muddy water because the high caste will not let them go to the village well, we will see that every village is made a member of the association, and we will see that every village has its own village improvements, and that everything does not go to the 30,000,000 in the cities." this would do much to obviate unrest. If one holds a shilling up to one's eye very closely one cannot see anything beyond the shilling, and I think the cities of India are rather like the shilling; you hold them up to your eye, and you cannot see the 290,000,000 of villagers, and they are voiceless, they are dumb, they are unrepresented. The cities represent the villages as well as the cities, and yet their interests are diametrically opposed. We know it in England; the village population has not got the same interests as the city population, and in India, where you have 290,000,000 of 320,000,000 living in villages, to ask them to be represented by the 30,000,000 city people inflicts a very great hardship upon them—they are voiceless, they are dumb, and yet they are as intelligent as possible. In the system of education we are practically spoiling them. Colonel Thompson said to me when I met him once that he was talking to a zemindar (a large land-owner) in the Punjab—one of our fine splendid fellows who could not read or write, but a magnificent man who knew his mind—and he said to this gentleman, "How is your son getting on?" and the zemindar's reply was, "Getting on? Take him away, make him a lord sahib, make him a magistrate, make him anything you like, you have ruined him for me." Colonel Thompson said, "What do you mean?" and the reply was, "You came to me, I had got my land, and I wanted my boy to grow up and to cultivate the land for me. You said, 'Let me educate him, it will improve him so much,' and I took your word, and you took him, and now he wears trousers and sleeps all the night. You have ruined him; he will not look after the crop, and he knows nothing about agriculture. Make him a lord sahib." If you go into the schools and ask them, "What are you going to be?" the answer is "Baboos," "naukari"—Government service; and then when you say, "India cannot make Baboos of everybody here," the reply is, "Then why do they educate us in this way—" and there is a great deal of sense in it. The Indian system of education is a splendid system. The caste system says that it is the bounden duty of every parent to teach his children his own trade and no other, and the consequence is that when you ask a man his caste you know his trade. He is an expert, and you have not got to teach him. The Indians say that this book knowledge which we are giving them, based on Western ideas, is absolutely unfitting them for that, and making them such that they are fit for nothing else. I do not say do not have the best education that you can give to Indians; the Indian is very intelligent, and he will respond to it, but I do say we ought to modify it, so that we ought to begin at the bottom in lifting up the people. We should give them the American system of education, which in the agricultural districts makes every boy into a farmer. It is part of the curriculum at the school, and the schoolmaster must learn agriculture. In Hungary the schoolmaster must learn silk. He must teach all his boys silk; he must believe in silk; he has got to do it. If you have that system, you will hold the people. You do not want in India a back-to-the-land policy at present, but you do want a stick-to-the-land policy. The Indian loves the land—his bit of land; he knows it, and loves his soil, and what we want is to increase that love of the land and to give him a system which will enable him to double his outturn and show him how to cultivate it intelligently. Now, sir, our British official is sadly lacking in that kind of knowledge. He does not know, and yet he is put to direct it, and the Director of Agriculture, who is a civilian, and tugs and toils for two or three years to get to know the difference between a cow and a buffalo, is just about getting to know it when he is shipped off to something else, and somebody else is put in who does not know what a cow is or anything about agriculture—the simplest things—and yet he has got to direct the agriculture of the country. Those seem to me things which have very much to do with the arrangements of the future. We in the Salvation Army have been forced into industry and forced into agriculture because our people are very poor, and we have had to show them. We have had to create markets for them. We say, "If you weave this, or grow that, we will sell it for you. We will show you how to do it." There are eleven million weavers in India. The original Indian plan was splendid. There were so many weavers in a village producing the clothing for that village, but the English market comes in and cuts the ground from under their feet. We go to the weavers and say, "Cheerio. Here is a better machine for you, which will produce nearly as much cloth as the factories. Stop in your home." He says, "I am not a coolie. Look at my fingers. The Government says, 'Go and be a coolie in a factory,' but I cannot do it." And it is false economy on our part, because that man has a delicate touch. His father, grandfather, and great-grandfather were all weavers, and he is a born weaver. He cannot move about much; his legs have got so that he cannot walk very much, owing to the sedentary nature of this occupation, and if you put that man to be a coolie you do him a cruelty and inflict a loss on the nation. We go to him and say, "First you must have a better implement. You can only produce a yard of cloth in an hour or two, it may be. We will give you a machine which will produce more." He says to us, "Yes, but do not you see my wife prepares the warp, and she can only produce so much warp for me." We say, "All right. Here is a better machine with which you can produce longer warps, so that she can keep pace with less trouble." Then he says, "But we cannot market so much," and we say, "If you will make what we tell you we will market it for you," and we create a market for him." Then we say, "You cannot make cotton pay perhaps, but you can make silk pay, as you can grow your own silkworms." In all these things it seems to me in connection with those depressed and other classes that if we could improve by previous instruction, and if we could send out some people who are expert in these things it would be a great blessing to India—if we could improve the system of education of the Britisher whom we send out there. Then I think I might just mention one thing. It seems to me that very often we can prepare the way for election by selection. It is done a great deal I know, it is nothing new, but still the principle of selection can very often in India prepare the way for election. I do not know that I have anything further to say, sir.

Mr. Montagu.] Thank you very much.

8341. Would you tell the Committee what the untouchable classes really are?—I suppose there are about sixty millions of them in India. They are really the hewers of wood and drawers of water of the country and our work is very largely amongst them.

8342. In an Indian village what is the work that the untouchables do?—Really an Indian village in most parts of India is divided up into certain sections. The idea of the Indian village is a self-contained village where the owners of the land live in one part of the village and the cultivators of the land live in another part of the village—hereditary cultivators and hereditary owners. The hereditary owner gets to know from his very childhood all about the best crops for the land and the character of the land, and the hereditary cultivator works for him. The potter produces the earthenware vessels, the weaver the cloth, and the sweeper does the scavenging. As you come down to the sweeper you come to the bottom of the community, but more or less you have other castes. The caste system in India is largely a hereditary trade union, and an Indian trade union in my humble judgment is better than a European trade union, because everybody has an inalienable right to be born into the trade union of his father and mother. In order to prevent any trade union from being swamped he must not go into another, and he must not intermarry into another, which is rather a good scheme. Then he does not give away the secrets to the other trade unions either. He keeps the secrets of his trade inside his own caste, and there is no such thing in India, you might almost say, whether you take the depressed castes or any castes castes, as unskilled labour. You ask a man his caste and he tells you his profession.

8343. The work of a great number of these untouchable classes is absolutely essential, is it not, to the life of India?—Yes.

8344. It could not get on without it?—No.

8344A. I do not know if you saw in the Bombay Legislative Council, where there is a large Indian majority, that a resolution was rejected, asking municipalities and local Boards there to open wells and dharmsalas to the untouchable classes. An amendment to that was that special wells and dharmsalas should be provided for those people, but both of those resolutions were rejected. So it is a fact that the untouchable classes cannot use buildings and wells to which their work may have contributed?—Yes, that is a fact very largely in most parts of India.

8345. That being the case can an upper caste man really represent this class from whom he would not take a glass of water?—I assume that the other classes would be represented as well; their representative, their chosen elected would represent them. There would be representatives for them.

8346. Therefore you would say it is absolutely necessary that those unprotected and despised classes should have representatives really representing them?—I think so.

8347. Do you know anything about the South Indian Liberal Federation at Trichinopoly?—No, I do not.

8349. If it is impossible to give them an electoral representation, it should be done by nomination, I suppose?—Yes, nomination or selection. Some of the cleverest people I have ever met in India come from those classes—magnificent people with brains. It does not follow that because a man cannot read or write he has not got brains; in fact, the difficulty with people who read and write too much is that they get other people's brains substituted for their own. The man who is absolutely natural, the villager, who grows up naturally, is like a wild flower. I was stopped when I was on a visit to South India not long ago by three or four of our men from a village where we have been about twenty years, who said, "This will not do for us, this big public meeting; we want you alone." I said, "All right, I am at your service." Then they said, "Yes, but you must give us at least an hour," and I said, "All right, I am very busy, but, still, I want to hear what you have got to say." And we sat down there for two or three hours—squatted on the ground together—and they were as intelligent and hard-headed—I do not know if one of them could read or write—but they spoke their minds. One of them could read and write, because he had his notes there; the others supported him, and they were not paupers either. When they first came to us they were deadly poor, and they pointed me out one man who they said then or twelve years ago had given up drink and bad practices and so on, and who was now, by thrifty habits, worth 30,000 rupees—a nice, intelligent man. There is no reason why they should not be associated in the government or management of their own affairs. They understand, and what they like in the Salvation Army is that we put them up. We repeat the Indian proverb, "Let nobody ask what is his caste; he who worships God belongs to God," and we say to them, "We will take a low caste man, and if he has the tact and talents and training necessary, we will make him a brigadier, we will make him a colonel, we will make him a commissioner, in the Salvation Army." A general was passing in Simla the other day, and he spoke to one of our officers, and said, "I stopped at one of your meetings, and there was somebody there who knew Hindustani rather well talking; who was that?" and the officer replied, "Commissioner Tucker." Then the general said, "But beside him stood a man who was holding a flag, a fine looking man, dressed like the commissioner with a red jacket—their jackets just the same—and then he spoke, and he spoke very nicely; who was he?" and our officer's reply was, "He was the sweeper of our headquarters, a scavenger." That man was a sergeant at that time, and to-day he is a captain put in control and command.

8350. I take it you feel very strongly that those depressed classes must be properly represented in any Councils which are set up?—I think so; I think they are the very sheet anchor of the British Government in India.

8351. I do not suppose you have ever read all the proposals of the Franchise Committee?—I have read a good deal, but I cannot say, "I have read all."

8352. You cannot express an opinion as to whether you think the rural and agricultural classes get sufficient representation under those proposals; you have not gone far enough into them for that?—I think the great danger is, so far as I have looked into it, that the shilling close to the eye will obliterate the vast number around. That would be my fear.

8353. You are afraid that, politically speaking, the urban classes may dominate the enormous rural majority?—And that the rural majority will not get their real views or interests sufficiently represented.

8354. As a rule, do these depressed classes trust their British District Officers?—Absolutely.

8355. You said that our officials would have to be much more vocal; that means that in the working of these large councils it would be more necessary than ever to make Government policy perfectly clear to the people?—Absolutely.

8356. And also that the Government should answer criticism?—Quite so.

8357. You think that would be a necessity of the new régime?—I think so.

8358. Do you think it would be any use to have a Government Press?—I think so; I say that the Government at present is dumb, and sometimes is also rather hard of hearing.

8359. You told us an excellent story of how a Commissioner stopped a riot, and you and I know very well that that kind of thing is happening very often in India; but would it not have been a little difficult for an Indian Commissioner to take that step, not from any defect in his qualities, but because he would not be regarded in the same way as being quite independent of factions in the town?—I think that point about being independent of all factions is very important, and I think the Indians themselves very much recognise it; for instance, there is a certain city, I need not mention, in which there is a municipality, and there were only two Britishers on the Municipality Council, and all the Indians on that Council begged that one of these British non-officials might be President, and both the Britishers declined, and said: "No; we will chip in, but you appoint your own." They insisted, and said: "No; we have got divided interests, and we rather feel that you would be impartial to all our interests; our interests clash, and we want somebody who will adjust those clashes, and on whom we can thoroughly rely." I think the Indian loves the Britisher when he really meets him half-way; that has been my experience. An Indian, whether you take the top Indian or the under Indian, wherever you meet him, if you will meet him half-way you meet a sensible intelligent person, who is only too glad to co-operate with you and to help you.

8360. For that reason you would not think it desirable to weaken the British element too rapidly?—No, I think not. I think the Indian needs the Briton and the Briton needs the Indian. I think they need one another.

8361. You have spoken of the advantages of selection?—Excuse me, but may I say with reference to that incident I have described you see the tact of that Britisher. He could not have kept order in that city, but he did not call these gentlemen in and command them in an ordering and masterful sort of way. He simply said, "Now, gentlemen, we are in a difficult position. I rely upon you, and I shall hold you responsible," and they were true to his trust. He threw the responsibility upon them, and I think, while in other cases there are people who have not always had perfect perfect tact, the Britisher, as a rule, has the iron hand in the velvet glove. Sometimes there is a little too much glove, and sometimes a little too little. Sometimes the iron pokes out, and sometimes the iron is missing, which is worse; but, as a rule, the Britisher is a wonderful administrator. I have lived in the American Republic and in different countries in Europe. I have travelled up and down throughout Europe, and I venture to say we have one of the very best Governments in India. I would not like to start upon any reforms with the idea that the Government of India is a bad Government. I believe it is one of the best Governments in the world, and it has an enormous advantage over so many Governments in the world to-day in that it is an honest Government.

8362. You do not think that many of the ills India suffers from—plague, famine, and so on—can be traced to the British Government?—Oh, dear, no. They have existed all the time, and the population has increased, you may say, enormously. That is the tendency—that the goodness of the rule makes the population increase. I think the Britisher in India very often does not do his best by the country because he has not been trained in those particular things which I have mentioned. He has got to direct the commerce, industry, and agriculture of a vast country, and he does not know one thing or another about it. It is our fault for not training him before he goes, it seems to me, or for insisting on a certain training which is not the right one. Just like the Forest Department, which now sends trained people, and it does well; the Irrigation Department sends trained people, and it does well.

8363. Do you think, speaking generally, the people of India, the masses of India, are advancing in general prosperity?—Certainly. I could show you villages of ours where the people absolutely (I have got some of them now) have not got a rag to put round them. They cannot come to meetings because they have not got a rag to put on, but I will show you those same villagers in five or six years and you will find them nicely dressed, with little bits of money saved. You will find the whole thing altered.

8364. Therefore you would say that even under what is called an apathetic rule the welfare of the people is advancing?—Yes; the Britisher does listen to the people, he is fair, and will try to do his best. You have tremendous clashing of interests in India, religious interests, political interests, mercantile interests—commercial and agricultural—all clashing with one another, and to have a fair man who is above it all is a great thing if he will only listen to the voice of all the Indians round him. My criticism of him would be that sometimes he does not listen enough; he is afraid of a Congress and afraid of a Conference. I suggested a Conference to the Government of India on such a simple question as penology, the management of the criminal tribes, because we found in the administration of the criminal tribes that one Government took it up and administered the Act and another Government ignored it and refused to administer it, and so I said to the Government of India: "Why not call all these Governments and your expert prison managers together and let them confer together and compare ideas?" They do it in America, and there are no broken heads over it, and they are learning all the time. Every Provincial Government in India wrote back and said: "No, thank you, the time has not come." The Indian likes a conference, but I think our British officials are unduly afraid of criticism, partly because they are not accustomed to public speaking. If there was a conference they would be called upon to speak. If you will take the people of India into your confidence, like the Japs do with the Koreans, go and meet them and have a congress here and a conference there like these Sri Moolams, and say: "Criticise away, now cheerio, oh, what have you got to say?" I believe they would disarm criticism, especially if they go to them as we go to the Indians and say: "Now what can you suggest; have you any suggestion to make?" Don't let him assume that any suggestion that he will make will be a disloyal suggestion for driving the Britisher out of the country. Go to the Indian and meet him half way. I have never found an Indian, whether he is a high caste man or a sweeper, unreasonable. Say to him: "Come along, let us sit down and talk the thing over together." I repeat that I have never found them unreasonable—in fact, I have found them highly reasonable.

8365. The two matters on which you wish to lay particular stress are better education for the masses, especially agricultural education?—Correct education, I should say, not the present system.

8366. And especially agricultural education for the rural classes?—Yes.

8367. And a better education for the Indian Civil Servant, especially in matters of business and in the art of public speaking?—Yes, I think so. Excuse me, Lord Sydenham, but you remember how you gathered together those editors in Bombay—I forget what was the trouble, but you gathered together all the Indian editors and talked to them. I do not know that they had ever been talked to like that before; the difficulties were all put before them, and they were taken into a conference, "Come along, now." I think it was about the plague regulations or something of that sort. They were quite open to reason, and they were proud to be consulted. Of course they ought to be consulted.

8369. You realise that the proposals of the Bill differ most radically from that policy of yours?—I do not know that I am qualified to criticise. I have read about the dual system, and my criticism of it would have been that this proposal was non-Indian. If I were a British official, the first thing I would want to do would be to call all classes of all kinds into conference, and to let them feel that they had got my ear all the time. I believe the bulk of British officials like to do that, and wish to do it, but they have got a great shrinking from anything that means public speaking, and I am not sure that there is not some law forbidding them to talk on public questions.

8370. There is a general understanding?—Now, think of that, the Governor of the country not allowed to speak.

8371. Not the Governor. The Governor says anything he likes?—But the British official, the Commissioner of a Division, is the Governor there, a Deputy-Commissioner is a Governor there, and yet there is a padlock on his lips, whereas he ought to be talk, talk, talking all the time. If he could drop his pen and do more talking it would be a great improvement if the people got his confidence. The Indian deserves to be trusted.

8372. You have spoken several times about the Japanese Government in Korea, but you know that the Japanese are having very great trouble there at the present time?—Yes, the question is whether they would not have had greater trouble otherwise.

Sir J. D. Rees.

8373. May I ask you a question which your experience would enable you to give a very valuable opinion upon. Do you find in India anything like corporate, collective oppression of the lower castes and classes by the upper castes and classes?—In some villages, certainly.

8374. But, generally; I am speaking as a general proposition, and not of some villages?—I think there is an enormous improvement in that respect; I think there is now a general recognition—an increasing recognition—that the lower classes are also men of intelligence, and that there is something wrong about the system which still exists in some places, where the poor man puts his money in the middle of the road and the shopkeeper puts the food there and takes away the money. That system still exists in some places, and in the schools we have a great deal of trouble; we cannot get a low caste child into most of the schools where the high caste children go. I am not opposed to separate schools, and I think they are a good thing.

8375. Is not Hindooism one great system, from the Brahmin to the leather maker?—I think there are a great many things in Hindooism which are excellent; but I think there are some things in which I cannot say that I sympathise with Hindooism.

8376. You said you thought one branch of the lower classes needed special representation, as a protection, presumably, against some other class?—Yes; I think they do.

8377. I have only one more question. You spoke of the Indian Civil Servant, and gave him a handsome testimonial, which I like to think is well deserved. Of course, the British officials would have to use the vernacular for public speaking, if they did anything of the kind?—Yes.

8378. Do you think that they generally possess a sufficient knowledge of the vernacular languages to make a speech in one of these languages?—Oh, yes; the majority of them, I think, have got to pass examinations in them—they do not get on without. They get that knowledge in their training beforehand, as a rule. In the old days they did not; I had a Deputy Commissioner in the old days who could put very few sentences together, and he could not have stood up and spoken; but that is largely a thing of the past. I think the examination in languages is a very strict one now.

Sir Henry Craik.

8379. I have listened to all you have said, Commissioner Tucker, with the greatest interest. Would you tell me what inference you draw from your knowledge with regard to the proposals now before the Committee? Do you draw any inference favourable to them, or opposed to them?—I draw an inference favourable in certain cases and unfavourable in others, if I may be allowed to say so. I say that the natural desire of the Indian to be taken into consideration and consultation should be encouraged and not discouraged.

8380. You think, if that were possible, it would meet a great many of the desires of the Indian people without any sweeping reforms?—A great many.

8381. With regard to the two points you raised with reference to the Civil Service. Your experience, like my own, is that a great many Civil Servants can speak perfectly well, and are constantly in the habit, upon occasions where it is permissible for them to speak, of speaking in the vernacular?—Yes.

8382. Of course, you know, in the Civil Service at home it would not be permitted for a moment that a Civil Servant should discuss questions in regard to his administration publicly. No officer has any business to express the policy of his Department. He is a man who has to write and not to speak; he has to work in secret?—It seems to me that in India you cannot stop his speaking, because he is a Governor or ruler.

8383. The difference arises there from the fact that the Indian Civil Servant is not merely a Civil Servant like the Civil Servant here?—Not a bit.

8384. I know as a member of the Civil Service for many years that we were tongue-tied because we were required to be?—Quite so.

8385. But you think he has also to make a declaration of policy?—Yes. It is his duty, it seems to me, to gather his people round him and to consult with them.

8386. You do not think it would lead to any difficulty in connection with possible charges as to taking sides in a public controversy with one side or the other?—I am afraid if you are going to have those Committees and Councils and so on, he is forced to become a public man, is he not?

8388. I will not keep you any longer, but on the other point, with regard to his not having knowledge of the particular subjects with which he has to deal, that, of course, is a thing which one finds, administering as I did a Department at home in the old days, constantly present, and I did not try to be guided by what you might call the expert knowledge of my own staff particularly?—Quite so.

8389. Would it not be far safer that you should have an expert at the elbow of the administrator to tell him what it is right to do rather than that he should try to act upon some knowledge which he has picked up?—That is a good theory, I think, but when it comes to the actual practice we find—take the Director of Agriculture—that our Director of Agriculture thinks it is his solemn duty to undo the work of his predecessor, and that is where trouble comes in. He wants to make a name for himself, I suppose.

8390. Still, it becomes very dangerous if the Administrator himself thinks that he can be his own expert adviser. Then you have nobody to appeal to, and he may be very obstinate and difficult to deal with. Is not that a danger?—It may be. To take an illustration, Lord Willingdon is an expert farmer, and when he came to Bombay he was in a position to advise the people. He got a little farm started to show them, and from his knowledge he intelligently advised the people. Now the civilian who goes in has got those 290,000,000 agriculturalists there, and if he can go in and out among them, and they see that he knows about the matters in which they are interested, his influence is greatly increased. And then the business men fret. I talked to a leading business man in Hong Kong, and he said, "It is mortifying. Here we are with Government officials here in Hong Kong who block our way all the time because they do not know the first principles of commerce and trade."

Lord Islington.

8391. Mr. Commissioner, you were speaking about the means of getting representation of the depressed classes in the Legislative Council?—Yes.

8392. I understand you differentiate between the population and the village as an entity?—Yes.

8393. It is only a portion of that village which comprises the depressed classes, and the other portion would be the upper classes of the village, the owners, and so on?—Yes.

8394. Then you suggested, and I think it was a very interesting suggestion you made, that with a view to getting representation in the Council there should be an association of head men?—Yes.

8395. That there should be groups of villages who might have the privileges of electing their own representatives?—Yes.

8396. What are those head men? Are they elected, or are they head men for life in the village? What is the practice in an Indian village, because I do not know?—Generally in an Indian village, if it is a composite village, then the head of the higher caste represents the whole village, and he has done it from time immemorial.

8397. His son follows him?—Yes.

8398. It is a hereditary post?—It is really a hereditary post, but it is not according to primogeniture, and he can be removed if he does not do his duty properly.

8399. The first point I would ask is this: Supposing you had one representative for a group of so many villages in the Legislative Council, would he truly represent the views of the depressed classes of those villages?—No: I think there would have to be some arrangement by which the proportion of low caste people should have their separate representative.

8400. There would not be a true representation?—No.

8401. Their interests would not be considered necessarily?—No; not necessarily, unless you had a head man selected who was sufficiently broad-minded. There are some head men who are splendid, and whom you could trust with your life, or anything you had.

8402. I would like to ask a further point. Assuming this suggestion of yours to be carried out, would the head man who was elected be of sufficient intelligence to be able to present his case with effect in the Legislative Council?—Oh, yes.

8403. Quite apart from whether he could read or write?—Quite.

8404. He could make himself felt?—Quite.

8405. Men could be produced with that degree of personality and general standard of intelligence?—Yes; you can find in all these castes men of the highest intelligence, men who can give a very sound judgment on the practical questions which affect them.

8406. When you got to the lower strata, the depressed classes, you would have the same system for them?—Yes.

8407. Groups of villages, too?—Yes.

8408. How would you work your representation of a village? It would be simple enough if each village were represented by the head man; but how are you to get the representation of the village for the depressed classes?—They have all their Panchayats; each class has its Panchayat. The Indian Village system is a splendid labour exchange. When the crops are cultivated the cultivators do the work for the land-owners, and when the crops are ripening seeing that they will not kill the birds, which free them from the insects, the whole population turns out—the potters turn out, the weavers turn out, and the sweepers turn out; everybody turns out into the fields day and night to watch and harvest the crops. Then when the crop is gathered there is a heap for the sweepers, a heap for the potters, and a heap for everybody else. It is a splendidly organised system. Then the Committee of each party divides it up among themselves. The mayor of the village does not say to the sweepers, "You must divide it in such and such a way"; he says, "That is the share of your caste from time immemorial." If it is a big crop the bigger the heaps; if it is a less crop the heaps are less. The land-owners divide it up among the various castes, and they get free unpaid labour for gathering the crops and for protecting the harvest from birds. It is a splendid system.

8409. The question I want to ask is, have you anybody who corresponds to the head man in the depressed classes?—Exactly—that is it; each group has its own head man, and the head man of the village never interferes in their affairs.

8410. Would you say that a man of equal or sufficient intelligence could be drawn from that class?—Everyone of them.

8411. Quite able to represent the interests of his class in the Legislative Council?—I have spent my time among them and they are very intelligent people.

Mr. Montagu.

8412. Mr. Commissioner, that Panchayat system you have been describing does not exist in every village in India, of course?—Practically every village.

8413. Still?—Yes. They manage their own affairs.

8414. Has the work you have been doing among the criminal tribes been supported and commented upon by the Indian politician at all?—They have been very kind to us indeed; we have not a word to say.

8415. They have supported you?—They have supported us. Sometimes they have said, "What about the religion?" That is the only point they have raised, but practically these people, as you can imagine, are without religion; a man who lives by plunder and theft and robbery has not got much religion to boast of, and the politician class say, "We would rather have him a good man, even if he ultimately becomes a Christian, than have him a bad man, robbing us."

8416. Do you know of any movement for the improvement of the position of the depressed classes among educated Indians?—Yes, there are quite a number.

8417. There are some in Bombay, are there not?—Yes, The Servants of India, and other associations. We work in harmony and friendship with them. There is a Prisoners' Aid Society in Bombay; we are on it, the Servants of India are on it, and others are on it. In the Punjab there are quite a number of Mohammedan and Hindoo associations doing criminal tribes' work.

Die Jovis, 9° Octobris 1919.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Earl of SELBORNE.	Mr. F. D. ACLAND.
Lord BRODRICK (Viscount Midleton).	Mr. BENNETT.
Lord ISLINGTON.	Sir HENRY CRAIK.
Lord SYDENHAM.	Mr. MONTAGU.
	Major ORMSBY-GORE.
	Sir J. D. REES.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF SELBORNE IN THE CHAIR.

Sir WILLIAM DUKE, G.C.I.E., K.C.S.I., is called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

8419. I think you are a member of the Council of India?—I am.

8420. Since what date?—November, 1914.

8421. What was the last appointment you held in India?—I was a member of the Executive Council in Bengal.

8422. Was all your service on the Bengal side?—The whole of it.

8423. You have been good enough to send in answers to the questions we put to you?—Yes.

The questions and answers are as follows:—

I wish to state by way of explanation of my previous connection with the subject that I was employed in Bengal on the preparation of the local Regulations under the Government of India Amending Act of 1909, by which the Legislative Councils were enlarged, mainly on an elective basis and had their functions extended, and that during the following five years I was a member and during one session president of the Bengal Legislative Council. I had thus opportunities to observe the stimulus which the development of the Councils gave to public interest in politics and the business of administration, and the rapid increase and intensification of public criticism. It gradually became apparent that the operation of the system was one-sided, that it led to a continually increasing volume of criticism not generally very friendly to the Government, and tended to unite groups with very divergent views and interests in a common opposition. On the other hand, there was very little to arouse any sense of partnership with the Government in responsibility for the administration of the country. Accordingly, as I was a member of the Council of India at the time when a further advance began to be mooted I was already prepared to co-operate in measures which would give popular representatives a real share of responsibility for the administration of the country and would establish them in a genuine partnership with the Executive Government.

I fully accept the declaration of August, 1917, and I support the present Bill as a whole. I am not prepared to defend every individual provision in it as the ideal means of giving complete effect to the objects of the declaration in the shortest possible time, but I believe that as a whole, and subject to the necessity of securing the assent and support of the greatest possible volume of instructed and friendly Indian opinion, it is well adapted to the purpose and provides the safest and surest method of giving effect to it.

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India, and, if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"? And do you generally accept the proposition contained in the Preamble?—(a) I accept the proposition. (b) I understand by "responsible government" government by Ministers responsible to the Legislature in the sense that the retention of the confidence of a majority is necessary to their continuance in office, and that the Legislature is similarly responsible to constituents. (c) I do.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the Provinces involves the establishment in Provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority (Clause 6)?—I do.

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the Executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—(a) I do. (b) No. They have influence which for some purposes may amount to power, but they do not possess power in any constitutional sense, nor in the last resort in practice.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of government in the Provinces in which at present the Provincial Executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes?—I do.

5. If you accept the propositions stated under questions 1 to 4, do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view?—I think that the dual form of government is the only scheme so far suggested which is consistent with development by progressive stages.

6. If you have any other method to suggest, does it (i) provide possibilities of advance by stages and facilitate the "progressive realisation of responsible government," and, if it does, in what way (Clause 2, 3, &c.)? and (ii) does it afford means of judgment (a) to the electors, and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress of the success or failure in results of the control exercised by the Legislature and those who represent it in the Executive?—I have no alternative method to suggest.

7. If you consider a dual form of government acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail the modification of which you regard as necessary? If so, what are those points, and what modifications would you suggest?—I accept the scheme of the Bill.

8. In particular, do you think (i.) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure"—i.e. should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their department by the Governor or if they fail to retain the confidence of the legislature (Clause 3 (1))? (ii.) that the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities (Clause 3 (3))? (iii.) that the executive council should in all provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian (Clause 4)? (iv.) that the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council (Clause 7 (4))?—I accept the four propositions of the question, except that it may be expedient in some Provinces that the Executive Councils should consist not of one official European and one non-official Indian, but of two of each.

9. Referring back to questions 2, 3, and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the Legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed generally by clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and legislative powers as (i.) suitable, or as (ii.) unnecessarily severe, or as (iii.) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament (Clause 9)?—I regard the limitations of Clause 9 of the Bill as suitable, not unnecessarily severe, and adequate to safeguard the responsibilities of Government to Parliament in the last resort.

10. In particular (i.) do you think that the Legislature should have power with whatever limitations to vote supplies (Clause 9 (2))? (ii.) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—(i) I do, with the limitations proposed by the Bill. (ii) I do.

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to Provincial Legislative Councils over Provincial Governments?—I do generally, although I should not have been ill pleased to see a higher degree of authority conceded to the views of the Legislative Assembly on some Central subjects concerned wholly with internal administration.

12. Do you agree that it is advisable none the less to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature (Clause 16)?—I do.

13. Do you accept the plan of a bicameral Legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential (Clauses 14, 15, and 16)?—I do.

14. Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature (Clause 20 (3) and 4))? Or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities?—I accept the provisions of Clause 20. (2) (3) and (4).

15. Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council? If not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest?—I accept the changes made by Clause 21.

16. Do you think that the development of provincial autonomy on the one hand, and of self-government in the Provinces on the other, involves any modification of the provisions of Sections 2, 33, and 45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23)?—The unlimited powers of control vested in the Secretary of State and the Governor-General in Council by Clauses 2, 33 and 45 of the existing Act are clearly inconsistent with the principles of Provincial autonomy and of self-government in the Provinces. If not modified they might be used to nullify many of the purposes enumerated in Clause 1 of the Bill, and indeed it might be held that it was the constitutional duty of the superior authorities to impose their own views upon the Provincial Governments in all subjects in case of serious difference of opinion. Some modification of the power of control seems therefore imperative, but in my judgment it would be impossible to define the modifications required both in the immediate and in the more remote future once for all in the substantive provisions of the Statute. I therefore approve the procedure by which the Secretary of State is enabled to limit the exercise of his own own powers by rules which can be altered from time to time with much greater ease than the substantive Statute.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible Government involves periodical examination of progress by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examination?—I approve of the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill. It seems certain that the working of a measure which is experimental in character, and even if completely successful will only have provided an instalment of the objects stated in its preamble, must in any case be brought under review at no very distant date. There are obvious objections to fixing that date in advance, particularly in case it should prove to be too remote. These objections should, however, be outweighed by the inducements to make the best of a system which must continue for a definite period, and by the patience which should result from the knowledge that there will be a certain and not too distant opportunity for consideration of the case for further advance.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—No.

19. Have you any observations to offer on the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs?—As regards Lord Southborough's Committees, while I recognise the difficulties in the way of setting up immediately any system of direct election for the Council of State, that of secondary election by the Provincial Legislatures is thoroughly unsatisfactory. Its evils might be to some slight extent mitigated by a system of proportional representation. My views on the matters dealt with by the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs are stated in my evidence before that Committee. I would add that if the dual system of government provided by the Bill is set up in India there must be a corresponding discrimination in the methods of the Secretary of State in dealing with the various Governments in India. In matters transferred to popular control it is obvious that his methods must approximate to those followed by the Colonial Office with the Dominions. It is inevitable, however, that in the earlier stages questions of much delicacy must constantly arise as to the demarcation of these subjects and as to the mutual relations of the two sides of the respective Governments. With regard to these, it will be useful and perhaps necessary to the Secretary of State to have competent assistance and advice, and that of competent Indians ought to be specially valuable. With regard to the remaining functions of Government not so transferred for the time being, it seems to me that there should be as little radical change as possible in the methods and machinery for dealing with them. The process should be the counterpart of that taking place in India, the maintenance in essentials of the existing system but the gradual diminution of its field of operation by transfer to the other side. This would involve progressive reduction in establishments rather than change in system.

8424. Of course, we have the evidence you gave before Lord Crewe's Committee. I would first of all like to ask you about that. I am afraid I have not had time to read the whole of the evidence given before that Committee. Are you in favour of the abolition of the Council of India?—No, not at this stage.

8425. You would say: Keep the Council of India on during this transition stage?—Certainly, during this transition stage.

8426. Certainly for the next ten years?—Yes.

8427. Would you make any change in its powers?—I do not think it essential, or perhaps desirable, to make any change in its positive powers. Of course, I contemplate that in that part of the field of administration in India which is to be considered as transferred ——

8428. No, I am only talking really of its relations with the Secretary of State?—Then my answer is No.

8429. Do you favour any change in its composition?—I doubt whether any material change in its composition is necessary. I do not think any change in its statutory composition is necessary. I am not sure as to the number of members required to have Indian residence. I take it that would practically remain the same, and I suppose it is possible in any case, if desired, to increase the number of Indian members.

8430. Would you have a larger number of Indian members?—Well, it might be desirable to have a larger number of Indian members.

8431. Would you like to see what I may call the Service members drawn more from the men in their service in India, rather than from the men who have ceased their service?—I am not certain that a general change in that direction is to be desired, but I can see no objection to its being tried. I should be willing enough to see it tried. There are conceivable objections to it.

8432. You would have no objection to the inclusion of younger members of the Service, or of more Indians?—No.

8433. Would any change in the statute be required to do that?—I do not think so. I am afraid I have not considered the point. I do not think any change is required.

8434. You point out in your evidence in respect of Clause 23 of the Bill why it is necessary to give the power of making these rules to the Secretary of State. The rigidity of statute law might cause an extremely difficult situation as time went on?—Yes, it would inevitably require a new statute as soon as any further advance was to be made—any degree of advance at all.

8435. Not only that, but in a very short period the mere experience of working might show a change was required?—Yes.

8436. And, therefore, you are strongly in favour of giving the Secretary of State power to make those rules?—Yes.

8437. Has he not got the power now?—I think not. I think it would be a stretching of the statute if he made rules declaring that he would not exercise powers which are more or less expressly entrusted to him.

8438. Is there not rather a difference of opinion among lawyers about that?—Yes, I daresay there is.

8439. I mean it is conceivable that he has full power now?—At least, it is conceivable that if he did choose to declare that he would not exercise certain powers, it might not be challenged, but I do not feel on sure ground.

8440. I understand that the criticism of the Government of India is directed to this point only, that it wishes the Council of India to be consulted about those rules?—Yes, I believe so. It does not wish especially that rules fundamentally affecting its own position should be passed without its having an opportunity to make full representation, and have it fully considered by the Council.

8441. I think it asks for the agreement of the majority of the Council?—Yes, it does.

8442. Do you think that is a reasonable proposition?—If the Council continues with that statutory power, I think it is the sort of function in which a majority of the Council should be required.

8443. Will it have that unless it is given it?—No, I do not think so.

8444. You would have to enact that?—Yes.

8445. By the Bill as drafted, those rules would be laid on the tables of both Houses of Parliament?—Yes.

8446. And would come into force if not objected to by either House within a certain period?—Yes.

8447. The Parliamentary control could be strengthened by reversing that process and saying that they should only come into force when the resolution had been passed by both Houses agreeing to it?—Certainly that would make the Parliamentary control more direct, but it is hardly for me to judge; it is rather for members of Parliament to decide whether the opportunities for getting such a resolution through would be adequate in cases which the Secretary of State might consider it essential to be dealt with promptly.

8448. My question is rather directed to asking you whether such a change would tend to allay the anxiety now felt by the Government of India?—I should think so.

8449. You touch in your Memorandum on the question of the Council of State. As recommended by the Franchise Committee, the Council of State would be elected by the same constituencies, and those very few, as the Legislative Assembly. Is not that so?—Yes.

8450. You do not like that proposal?—I do not like it. The constituencies are extraordinarily narrow, and tend to reproduce exactly the same characteristics in the Council of State as in the Assembly.

8451. How would you like to see the Council of State formed?—I should like to see it given more distinctly the character of a revising chamber. I take it that that would be best attained by rather an elaborate composition, by drawing from various sources in various ways; but so far as it is to be elective I should like to see it elective on a broad basis, but not, of course, on anything like the basis of universal franchise.

8452. I have no personal knowledge of India—you must remember that. I ask you this question: Is it your opinion that there is material for a thoroughly good Council of State to be found in India?—Yes, I think there is if objection is not taken to its being arranged by class representation. If you do not object to the Council being mainly representative of classes, then I think there is plenty of material.

8453. Do you think there would be any delay involved in seeking a new basis?—I fear so.

8454. You think there would?—I fear so, and therefore I did not intend to press the objection I took.

8455. But you regret that portion of the Franchise Committee's report?—Yes.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

8456. You had experience in India before you came to the Council of India, had you not?—About thirty years, yes.

8457. Was it the impression in India that the work of the India Office was slow, and it was difficult to get things through?—Undoubtedly there was that impression.

8458. Has your experience in the India Office borne that out—have you found the method cumbrous?—Its procedure is somewhat elaborate, but I have not observed anything in the procedure of the India Office which would account for the general impression that was prevalent in India. I put it in this way. The procedure of the India Office may account for delays of many weeks, sometimes of months even in extreme cases, but the idea used to be in India—I am talking as a provincial man, you understand, not having been most of my time in close touch with the Government of India—the impression in the provinces used to be that things were hung up for years. I take it they were not hung up by the procedure of the Council or of the India Office. I think it more probable that in many cases the Government of India objected to move on the initiative of one province.

8459. Do you think if there was some adjustment as between the office and the committee system, all the small questions which have to be dealt with might either be eliminated or might be dealt with rather more rapidly?—Undoubtedly. I think many questions of extremely small importance are sent to committees, and time is lost.

8460. Have you found anything in the existence of the Council which really tends to make matters go more slowly, or that there is really any bar to progress by the existence of the Council?—No. As there is a Council, and as ten or a dozen or more people have to see things instead of one or two there is a delay of days in their doing so. Beyond that I see no bar to progress.

8462. And to withdraw in any degree that expert advice would be serious?—I should think from the point of view of the Secretary of State it would be very serious.

8463. On the other hand, do you see any objection to the system of interchange as between the India Office and India of officials from time to time with a view of keeping a general touch between the two?—The question refers to officials, not to the Council?

8464. Yes?—No, I see no objection whenever it can be conveniently arranged. Of course, it is a difficult matter to arrange. To begin with, if you expect good work from the India Office establishment, it is essential not to destroy all their hopes of rising, promotion, and reaching headships of departments.

8465. Would you see any objection to an Indian Civil Servant coming home and acting on the Council for a period, and then becoming, we will say, Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal or Governor of the United Provinces?—I have said already I am very willing to see it tried. I do not think it is altogether ideal from this point of view, that at present the Council, I take it, is entirely outside the sphere of ambition and influence. They are at the end of their career; their career is finished. A man who still looks forward to advancement might not be in quite so independent a position. But, apart from that, which I do not regard as fatal, which I do not think likely to be fatal, I do not see any objection.

8466. With regard to Clause 23, may I take it that you would feel that whatever the powers of the Secretary of State are, it is well that they should be thoroughly understood in India, and not be supposed to be subject to constant alteration?—Yes, undoubtedly.

Lord Islington.

8467. Carrying on one or two questions that Lord Midleton asked you with regard to the internal arrangements of the India Office, I think you said just now that delay occurs because in comparatively trivial matters the whole of the Council have to see the papers connected with them?—The Committee has to see them, or perhaps two committees, and the Council have to be given an opportunity of seeing them if they want to.

8468. And I suppose in that direction matters might be expedited?—Yes, I think a good deal could be done in internal reform in that way.

8469. Would you favour the proposal which I see has been made, I think before Lord Crewe's Committee, that the member of the Council who is the Chairman of a particular committee, the Judicial and Public Committee, or whatever it may be, should be brought into much closer association with the departmental officers than he is at present?—Was that a proposal of Lord Crewe's Committee?

8470. No, it was not a proposal of the Committee; it was put before the Committee—it was put by certain witnesses before the Committee?—The proposal that I have understood to be made is that, instead of the Committee system, individual members of the Council should be turned into heads or super-heads of departments?—That I do not favour.

8471. It went as far as that, I believe?—Yes. As a matter of fact, the Chairman of any committee is already in very close touch with the department, and can be in closer touch if he desires. The departmental officers are very willing to give him information and to consult with him.

8472. You would not agree with the proposal that the member himself should occupy the position now occupied by the head of the department?—No, I do not approve of substituting the consultative system by a system of individual heads.

8473. As regards the number of the Council, would you agree to fix the number, or would you prefer to see discretion as between a minimum and a maximum of councillors?—I think it is much preferable that there should be a discretion, for this reason, that you cannot always get perhaps the precise kind of experience that you want. You may not get one man who will combine certain kinds of experience, and it may be more desirable to take two.

8474. Would you reduce the maximum?—It is now 14. I do not think it is urgent to reduce it, but I imagine that 12 would be found quite workable.

8475. Assuming you had 10, with a discretionary maximum of 12, how many Indians would you favour being appointed to the Secretary of State's Council?—Three

Three as at present, or possibly four. I have no strong views on the subject. When an Indian with good official experience can be obtained, then there is no reason why the number should not be increased. It depends who the Indians are. Some Indian members of the Council have had all the necessary official experience, and that has served a double purpose. May I put in one point I left out? If it is desired to have more Indians, it is rather an argument against reducing the Council, because it is somewhat difficult to keep Indians continuously in this country. Naturally, they want to go home from time to time. They are longer absent on the whole.

8476. Would you specify the kind of official you would like to have on the Council rather more than is at present done? For instance, would you like to see on the Council an Indian who has experience in commerce?—Yes, certainly, whenever one can be obtained. It seems to me a very difficult class of member to obtain, because the Indian who has experience in commerce and has commercial interests probably does not want to come to this country.

8477. Would you like to see an Indian on the Council who occupies an official position in India, in the service or on the Government?—They are very useful members, but they do not probably supply all that is desired by Indian opinion.

8478. Just a word with regard to the powers of the Council. You say you would leave them untouched. Should I be right in saying that there is a nominal power of financial control of the Council, but really in practice it is not very effective, and it is almost literally and truly only nominal?—I doubt whether it is really so nominal as the question seems to suggest. It is quite true that things never come, I believe, to an impasse between the Secretary of State and the Council; that is to say, the Council has never been known to over-rule the Secretary of State; but although that may be the case, I think that the existence of the power of the Council may have a good deal to say to what is put before them.

8479. Do you think there have ever been cases where a matter involving expenditure has been carried with the tacit assent of the Council, though the Council may not have agreed with it individually or even collectively?—Not within my comparatively brief experience. I would not speak to matters which are really outside my own experience.

8481. Would you say, from your experience, since you have had an opportunity of seeing the work of the Council, that the power of the Council has in any way deteriorated?—From my experience, no. I am inclined to think from all I can gather that the Council is perhaps more regularly consulted and working more in accordance with the idea of the functions embodied in the Act than at some previous periods.

8484. I see in your note here that you indicate that you would rather favour something being done for the Central Government as is done for the Legislative Assembly?—I am not prepared to go the length of recommending the establishment of any responsible Minister in the Government of India as yet; but I should have been glad if some higher degree of authority could have been distinctly recognised for the Legislative Assembly in respect of matters that are purely internal—matters of domestic economy in India. I recognise, of course, that the policy of the Secretary of State must necessarily be to attach very high importance to the opinion of the Legislative Assembly when the Government of India is able to accept it. When the two authorities, the executive and the legislative, are in unison in such matters, then I think the Secretary of State in the future must inevitably attach a very high importance to their views. But if it were possible to recognise that definitely in the Statute it would have a good effect in India, and I think it would be in accordance with what must be the line of our future policy.

8485. Would you say that in its early stage it was a beginning for the Central Government in the direction of what is proposed to take place in the Provinces?—That is how I regard it. I consider that eventually that action must be taken in the Central Government. That is the eventual line of policy, and if it is possible to recognise it at present so much the better.

8586. To that extent could you say it would meet with the request which has been made by Indian opinion that something should be done for the Central Government?—Yes. It would not go very far, but to that extent it would meet Indian views.

8487. Now, as regards the electorates, do you consider that the Southborough Committee proposes satisfactory electorates on the whole in the Provinces, or do you think they should undergo further revision before they are put into force?—No. Unquestionably the whole business is very tentative, very experimental; but I believe that the electorates they have proposed are as good as you are likely to get for a first attempt. It may very shortly—no one knows how shortly—be necessary to revise them. They may prove unworkable in one way or another, or defective; but in my judgment they form the best possible scheme for a first experiment.

8488. You would say that your inclination would be, with all their imperfections, to start them as they are, with certain modifications, I suppose?—Yes. I have not thought of minor difficulties and modifications. I am not referring to the very great difficulty which I know exists in Madras; but, on the whole, yes.

8489. You think the labour community and the Ryot are sufficiently directly represented in those Councils?—Yes. I think they have gone as far down—I am quite certain they have gone as far down—as it is possible to go at this moment towards getting an effective electorate. I am sure if you went further down you would not have an effective electorate. You would have an electorate that would neither understand the questions put to it nor, probably, vote upon them. My only doubt is whether the present electorates will be found within a measurable time to rise to their responsibilities, but that remains to be seen.

8490. I would like to ask you one or two more questions as regards the method of government in the Provinces. You accept the general proposals, the system of government with regard to reserved and transferred subjects?—Yes.

8491. Would you desire to see those divisions made as slight as possible? Would you desire to see that in all matters for discussion prior to decision the discussion should take place in the branches of the Government combined?—Yes; it is the greatest difficulty that I have had personally in connection with the scheme. There are two absolutely opposing principles: One is that duality in government is certainly a weakness; the more unified a Government is, the stronger and more effective it is likely to be. The other is that it is absolutely essential to give responsibility—to make a start in giving responsibility—and it is only by duality that responsibility can be given. Therefore I wish to see the Government as much unified as possible without obscuring and doing away with the responsibility of Ministers, and without weakening the value of what we are doing from that point of view.

8492. Would you go so far as to try to lay down in the Bill that all matters outside the purely departmental questions which the Minister deals with himself, all questions which are to be decided by the collective decision, must come before both branches of the Government sitting as a Cabinet, where they would be fully discussed before the final decision is made?—It is going a long way to say that every decision which requires collective decision must be discussed by the whole body. I mean to embody that as a statutory precept or precept of rule, but that is what I should like to see done.

8493. I am merely alluding to those subjects outside the ordinary departmental subject which is dealt with by a Minister, which in the ordinary course would have to come before, as at present suggested, the Ministers sitting together or the Executive Council sitting together, presided over respectively by the Governor?—

Governor?—I should say that in certainly nine cases out of ten, or nineteen cases out of twenty, the decision should not be taken until both parts of the Government have expressed their views upon it, but I feel a little difficulty in saying that there should be an absolute rule.

8494. You would say that it would be likely to obviate friction and discord in the future if all questions, whether they be questions under the category of reserved or transferred subjects, were accessible in all their details to both branches of the Government. Would you agree to that as a general proposition?—I agree to it as the general rule, as the general principle. I am not prepared to say that there should never be an exception.

8495. Can you think in your mind of any exception which would lead rather to smoothness than to friction if it were kept from the knowledge of a part of the Government? Well, I see you are not prepared to give too positive an answer, but you agree generally with the propositions I have put forward? I will not press you further?—Yes, generally I do.

8496. One more question, and that is as regards the financial aspects of it. Do you agree to the joint purse, or do you favour more the subsequent proposal of the Government of India of a separate purse?—I did long favour the separate purse, but for some time I have come to think that there really is a greater advantage in the joint purse, provided that both parties will work in a reasonable spirit. The joint purse does, I think, make great calls on the reasonableness and mutual forebearance of both sides. As it is not absolutely certain that reasonableness will always be present, it is necessary, I think, to provide some reserved power in case of a deadlock. In fact, that is provided. And, that being so, I prefer the joint purse.

8497. Anyway, you do not consider that a joint purse is incompatible with the proposed dual system?—No, I do not think it is necessarily incompatible with it.

8498. Would you like to see set up in each Province —would you favour seeing set up in each Province by statute—a financial department with a Minister in charge?—I have a doubt about that; I doubt whether it is necessary. It is necessary, I think, to give very definite and high authority to the financial department as such.

8499. That is the intention of the question. There will be a very definite department, in whose hands are the whole finances of the Province?—Yes, and it must be so, though it need not necessarily have the last word.

8500. In every department there must be a responsible Minister at its head, must there not?—Yes. necessarily there must be.

8501. I am sorry to keep you so long, but your experience in these matters is so valuable to us. Would you like to see in these Provincial Governments, as the development of local government, district boards, and all the lower local government bodies develop—would you like to see established in each Provincial Council something in the nature of a Local Government Board? —Yes.

8502. With powers approximating to the powers which the Local Government Board exercises in this country?—Yes, I should.

8503. Have you given consideration to the question of the inclusion among the transferred subjects of the whole of education?—I have considered it.

8504. Will you express an opinion about it?—I think it is inevitable, eventually at any rate. I do not think that education can be satisfactorily, or properly, administered in two divisions.

8505. When you say eventually, do you mean that you would not do it now?—Well, I was rather thinking of certain reservations made about the University of Calcutta.

8506. Do you think there might be difference in practice in different provinces with regard to immediate action?—I think very likely differentiation in various provinces would have been appropriate. I think education is in a very varying position in different parts of India, and suitably there might have been differentiation of treatment.

8507. Do you think that is impossible now?—Yes. I am not prepared to recommend a departure from the proposals of the Southborough Committee.

8508. One question about the Provincial Governments. Do you think it is a fair criticism to the alternative proposal put forward by the Provincial Governors that it would be very difficult to envisage the next step forward from that except in terms of dualism—what we have got to call dualism—of some kind?—Either that or by the practical grant of responsible government.

8509. You think it would be possible to go forward from that to a grant of responsible government without going through anything of the nature of a dual system?—When you say " possible," I think it might be found inevitable; I do not think it is desirable. I think it would be much too sudden a plunge, but I think it is what would probably follow.

8510. And therefore is that one of the main points in your mind against it, that it would perhaps necessitate a much too sudden plunge forward to the next stage?—That is the main point in my mind.

8511. Whereas the dual system, with its clear disadvantages, has the advantage of being able to go forward in a better manner?—By progressive stages which can be calculated according to the circumstances of the time, according to the requirements.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

8512. I will ask you some questions about the function of the Council of India in regard to the control of the expenditure, both of the Government of India and of the Provinces. At the present moment does not every form of new expenditure by the Government of India, or proposed by the Government of India, have to come before the Council in London?—Yes, above certain small limits.

8513. What is that limit?—I cannot give the various financial limits. There are different limits for different purposes.

8514. Take an irrigation scheme of development. Would that have to come before the Council?—Yes, anything like a large scheme would.

8515. And railways?—Yes, railways, certainly.

8516. And education?—Yes. Since education is not so expensive the Government of India could do something more on their own, but not very much.

8517. Under the Bill as drafted the present financial control by the Council is retained?—It remains, yes.

8518. And it will apply to Provincial Governments as well as to the Government of India. That is to say, no Provincial Government, particularly in dealing with reserved services, will be able to propose expenditure, or to carry out expenditure, without the assent of the Council in Whitehall?—No, that has not been touched by the Bill. I may explain what, as I understand, has actually happened: that the Secretary of State has already agreed to delegate powers up to certain financial limits, and I believe in practically every case of delegation to the Government of India—probably not in every case—the Government of India has passed on that delegation to the Provincial Governments; they have re-delegated it. What is contemplated, as I understand, apart from the Bill, is to continue to revise those powers of delegation. That could be done entirely apart from the Bill.

8519. Does not the difficulty lie in the fact that statute law states that the revenues of India, Provincial and Central, belong to the Secretary of State, and may not be expended without the assent of the Council? Does not that work in the opposite direction to delegation—the existence of that statutory power?—I suppose it does. It means that the Secretary of State cannot divest himself of his responsibility to Parliament, but must be prepared to face the responsibility. He must necessarily always have that in his mind when he is fixing a delegation limit. He fixes a limit, we will say, for some particular purpose, of five lakhs of rupees. If complaint is made, he no doubt can say: " Well, surely, I have not looked into it, I do not look into such matters personally, but I consider that up to five lakhs of rupees I can trust Governments in India." Whether he could say the same with regard to fifty lakhs would be a question. He must always have have in view whether he is reasonably exercising his responsibility to Parliament and the manner in which he could answer to Parliament for it.

8520. Another point in this connection is this: Will proposals for expenditure by Provincial Governments under the Bill come direct to the Secretary of State in Council, or will they have to come through the Government of India? Particularly in regard to transferred subjects I have in my mind—take a project for education in the Presidency of Bombay. Will that proposal have to go direct to the Secretary of State in Council here in Whitehall, or would it go to the Government of India and through the Government of India?—I had not thought out the procedure, but I really contemplated, on the rules made, that very little in connection with transferred subjects would come at all. The Secretary of State would not practically exercise any control over the revenues allotted for transferred subjects. I take it it would be more a matter of report than sanction, and that he would merely keep himself informed.

8521. You say the revenues allotted to transferred subjects?—Of course, if it were a joint purse——

8522. In that case the whole of the provincial revenues will be available?—Yes. I take it the position will still be the same. Although there is a joint purse, when the Provincial Government is agreed on the Budget allotments of transferred subjects then the revenues are allotted, and there is an end of it.

8523. What was exactly the position of the Council in regard to revenues. Take all-India revenues. Does the Government of India have to get the assent of the Council before it imposes a new tax, or before it will propose a new tax, to the Indian Legislative Assembly?—Yes, I take it it will require previous sanction.

8524. The previous sanction of the Secretary of State in Council?—Yes, for taxation.

8525. That is to say, to all new expenditure?—All new revenue. I believe so.

8526. Is the present procedure that before the Budget is published in India it has to come home to be examined in all its items here in London, and be approved in London, before it goes forward as the proposal of the Government of India?—Yes; the main scheme of the Budget has to be submitted, and particularly such matters as the question of any alteration in taxation.

8527. They have to come before the Council of India here in London?—Yes.

8528. And you think that ought to continue?—Yes, I do think so.

Mr. Bennett.

8529. Did I take down correctly an answer which you gave to a question put by Lord Islington? I have it in these words: That there should be statutory recognition of the Secretary of State's obligation to attach special authority to proposals on which the Assembly and the Government of India are in agreement. Have I correctly taken it down?—Yes, I think that is correct.

8530. The obligation, of course, could not be absolute?—You could not lay down an absolute rule that the Secretary of State must accept, because the Government of India and the Legislative Assembly might make proposals that Parliament would not tolerate.

8531. But it should be as definite an obligation as can be made?—Yes. I perhaps was wrong in saying statutory, because I am not sure that it could be embodied in the Statute.

8532. It is rather difficult to draft?—Yes; they have power to do it by rule.

Lord Sydenham

8533. Speaking generally, I believe you regard the provisions of the Bill as the best possible at the present moment?—In the present circumstances.

8534. You have alluded to the necessity of securing the assent of the greatest possible volume of friendly Indian opinion. I do not think we have had a single Indian witness here who approved of the Bill as it stands. Can you point to any Indian opinion which whole-heartedly supports the Bill?—I think there is a great deal of Indian opinion, even as far as I have understood the evidence of witnesses who have been examined here, which does support the Bill. Many of them want something more at one point or another. There are many people who would be glad to see the Bill go further, but I think, regarded as a whole, there is a very great deal of support for it in India.

8535. The Bill as it stands is really supported by no one?—You mean there is no one who would not like to make some amendment?

8536. Who does not wish to make an amendment?—That may very well be.

8537. In a book I have received from India there are these words:—"This, then, is the outstanding position. We have a Bill which we have every reason to dread, which its author does not contend to be a satisfactory measure, and does not conceal his desire to abandon. But the prospect is that that Bill may be finally passed and fastened upon us." The writer says further that there is no hurry, and he asks for a different Bill altogether. Does not that show at all events that there is an extreme dislike for the Bill in some Indian quarters?—I am not prepared to say how far the views of the writer may be supported by other opinion in India.

8538. I suppose you know that nearly all the non-Brahmin organisations in India have sent us telegrams expressing fear of the effect of the Bill. Does not that indicate that some Indian opposition is serious?—I am aware that a great deal of non-Brahmin opinion in Madras, and possibly also a certain amount in Bombay, is dissatisfied with the proposals in the Bill for general electorates—is alarmed and dissatisfied. That is the case. But I think as a rule the objections are limited to that particular point and that particular apprehension. I think the people who express these apprehensions are, in other respects, generally in favour of the constitutional proposals of the Bill.

8539. You say in your Memorandum that a dual form of government is the only scheme consistent with development by stages. Now, supposing that scheme of the five Lieutenant-Governors was adopted, and that there were two Indians and two British officers, as I think you propose, and that in time there were three Indians, and then four, and finally an Indian Governor, is not that progressive?—The objection I take to it in the first place is that I do not think it is in accordance with the pronouncement of the 20th August, 1917, in the matter of responsibility. The second objection I take to it is that in effect to my mind there is only one stage, and that is the stage when the Indian members become the majority, and you pass at once from one form of government to another.

8540. It is all a question in your mind of the technical definition of responsibility?—And of progressive stages.

8541. And of progressive stages. Now are you really satisfied with the proposals of the Franchise Committee? I gathered from your answer to Lord Islington that you thought they were capable of revision?—I should be very much surprised if, in the course of a few years they had not to be revised in one direction or another. It seems to me impossible that the first attempt, without previous experience, at setting up an electorate of many millions can really be satisfactory. You can only proceed there by trial and error.

8542. Do you not agree that it is most important that we should at the outset get as close to just conditions as we can, because in certain respects it may be very difficult to make revisions at a later period?—I agree, and I think that the general class of person, the general stamp of men whom the Committee contemplate enfranchising, is the proper kind of man who should be enfranchised.

8543. But you realise that the franchises as proposed are most unequal, and in some respects illogical, and that they penalise some Provinces relatively to others?—They vary as between Provinces certainly; so do the characteristics of the people.

8544. Do you agree with the rather strong criticisms in the Government of India Despatch of March 5th?—Do I agree with them generally?

8545. Yes?—I think they are excessive.

8546. They are too critical?—Yes.

8547. You said with regard to the franchise you have gone as low as it is possible, but to my mind that is not the whole point. Is not the real thing not the lowering of the franchise, but whether the elective members are really fit to represent particular classes in the peculiar conditions of India?—The question is whether whether they will represent them—whether the people who will be elected will properly represent the constituencies. That no doubt is so.

8548. Do you think the rural population which is of importance is sufficiently protected from domination by the towns, whose interests may differ?—I admit, on my experience, that the rural population in India is in a very inferior position as regards the towns, as regards pressing its interests and getting them represented. But it is enormously the more numerous, and it will have under this system a very great weight of representation in the Councils, and if its representatives are worth anything at all I think it should be sufficiently protected.

8549. Do you think that the non-Brahmin classes and the depressed classes who are showing signs of alarm will be adequately represented by persons really entitled to speak on their behalf?—About the non-Brahmins, using that word in the sense that it has acquired in the Madras Presidency, I am really not qualified to speak. There are, I believe, about 40 million non-Brahmins in Madras, and they include everybody who is not a Brahmin; they include a good deal of wealth and education, and they ought to be able to find people to represent them, though I quite recognise there is a difficulty. Elsewhere in the provinces of Upper India, of which I do know something, I do not think the difficulty arises. I do not think Brahmins are likely to be represented in any higher degree than their culture and intelligence warrants.

8550. Take the five million Mahrattas in the Bombay Presidency, who are special, almost racially special—do you think that special arrangements ought to be made for their representation?—I am not acquainted with the internal affairs of Bombay, and I prefer to go by the opinion of the Bombay Government. If they consider that under the proposals made the Mahrattas will get representation I should assume that they would.

8551. But as a matter of principle involved do you not think a large number of people of that class ought to be provided for in the electorates?—They ought to have representation, but I am not convinced that there is any reason why they should not get it.

8552. Will you admit that if a just system of representation such as I have indicated is not provided the whole foundation of responsible government must be wanting?—I do not think I will admit it. In every country there is only a certain proportion of the population which takes an active interest in politics and which really returns persons to the Legislature and in that sense is really represented; and responsible government is not really incompatible with that being a comparatively small section. It is possible that in India, to begin with, some parts of the electorates will not make use of their opportunities, but I do not admit that the fact that they do not at first do so until they have been taught better or learned better makes the application of responsible government altogether unsuitable. I do not think it does.

8553. But suppose that we now set up an electoral system which does not provide for a real and adequate representation of the agricultural and working classes of India who provide all the revenue, and if the system is such as to put political power in the hands of a small privileged class, should we not be false to our trust to the people of India?—If that really happened——

8554. I am putting it to you as a hypothesis?—On that hypothesis we should have failed to carry out our duty.

8555. In that case might we not expect very grave troubles?—If the privileged classes to whom you refer abuse the position in which they find themselves we certainly should.

8557. One last question. I think you said that you consider that any objections to Clause 28 are outweighed by the encouragement to make the best of a system which is only to last for a short time? Do you not think it is also just possible that there will be a very strong temptation to make the scheme unworkable in order that the demand for complete Home Rule may be substantiated?—I have looked at it, I think, from every point of view. I think there are some people who will not be anxious to work the scheme fairly, who will rather keep before them merely the idea of obtaining complete Home Rule, or the greatest approximation to it; but I do not think that that will be the attitude of the great bulk of educated people in India. I think that they will be anxious, having obtained a certain amount of power for their own affairs, to show that they can administer them well, and that they will do the best they can to make it a success and to found their claim for the next stage really upon the successful results of the first stage.

8558. Do you know we have been told by a witness in this room that unless the Bill is drastically amended in certain respects there will be an agitation which will stagger the imagination? Do you think the people who make those sort of statements are likely to make a Bill which they dislike a complete success at the outset?—No; but I do not suppose that these are mainly the people who will have to work the Bill. I do not suppose that people of that kind will form majorities in the Legislature, or will be the people who will have the working of the system. All that amounts to is that there are a great many extremists in India who are not going to be conciliated by any Bill. I do not think anyone expects that they will be.

Sir J. D. Rees.

8559. Are not the towns of India for the most part large villages? Do the expressions urban and rural connote industrial and rural occupations, as in this country?—The conditions are very varied in certain parts of the country. In certain parts, certainly, quite populous towns are really merely agglomerations of agricultural villages; but in other parts there are great industrial towns. There is no uniformity.

8560. The towns which are really large villages are greatly in the majority—those which have no industrial part. Is not that so?—Yes, the small towns are very largely of that character.

8561. Is there anything in the religious and economical interests or in the habits and customs of the Mahrattas so distinguishing them from other Sudra cultivators as to call for special representation?—I know very little about the speciality of the Mahrattas.

8562. If responsibility is not given now in these stages, and if the declaration of August, 1917, is carried out, will it not be necessary at some stage to make a sudden jump from the present system into full responsibility?—Inevitably.

8563. Would not that be most disastrous and impossible?—Yes.

8564. If the electorate given by the Report to a Province are such as its Government have recommended, can it be fairly said to be penalised in that behalf, and are not these electorates really all given upon the recommendations practically of the Local Governments concerned?—I think perhaps Madras is an exception, but I understand that practically all the Local Governments propose very much the electorates which have been recommended by the Southborough Committee.

8565. I have only two questions to ask you. You have said, I think, that you do not think it would be a good plan to bring home men actually in the Indian Civil Service to the Council?—No, I said I was willing to see it tried, but that there was the objection to it that such men would not be in the same position of independence as are men who have finished their career.

8566. Do you think that an attempt of that kind to try to draw the bond closer between the India Office and the Indian Civil Service might be carried out by bringing home the members of the Indian Civil Service to hold certain posts in the ordinary administrative staff of the India Office?—To a certain extent that can be done.

8567. You think it can be done. It has never been tried yet?—No. No one has ever come home to a prominent post in the India Office until he has retired from the I.C.S., but, of course, some men have retired very early in order to come home.

8568. But you think that that is not an impossible thing?—No, it is not impossible.

8569. The other question is one of an entirely different sort. You spoke of the Mahratta population, and and the necessity of giving them some representation to secure them something: what form would the communal representation which you advocate take?—I do not advocate communal representation.

8570. In any form?—No, I am not an advocate of communal representation.

8571. But is it not necessary for such representation?—No, I merely admitted that it was essential that the people should be represented, but I have not admitted a previous proposition that Mahrattas will not get themselves represented under the proposals. My own belief is that they are in sufficient numbers, and probably of sufficient intelligence to get themselves represented.

8572. Suppose communal representation were allowed, would you think it best to have separate constituencies or to have a certain number of reserved seats?—Where communal representation is inevitable, as it is in the case of Mohammedans, I think it should be by separate constituencies, by local constituencies.

8573. And then those who form part of those constituencies would have no part in the other?—They would be excluded from the general electorate.

8574. You are not prepared to assign a certain number of seats, to earmark a certain number of seats for them?—No, I do not like that idea at all.

8575. We have had many opportunities of discussing these things together, and I have only two questions to ask you. You were, before you became a member of the Executive Council of the Presidency of Bengal, Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal?—I was first a member of the Lieutenant-Governor's Executive Council in 1910, and then for about eight months I was Lieutenant-Governor, and then I was a member of the Governor's Executive Council.

Mr. Montagu—continued.

8576. I want to ask you a question as an ex-Lieutenant-Governor: If there were riots in your Province and the form of government in your Province was that recommended in the Bill, do you think that you would be hampered in dealing with an emergency with the promptness which was necessary?—Under the form of government proposed in the Bill?

8577. Yes?—No, I think not. I think I should not be hampered.

8578. I imagine that a Lieutenant-Governor without an Executive Council would be able to deal most quickly with a thing of that kind, would he not?—Yes, because he would have no one to consult but himself.

8579. One more question. Would it be fair to say, in your opinion, that the admitted delays in the government of India—I do not mean the Government of India, but the Government machinery—are in the main due to the necessity for a Provincial Government receiving the sanction of the Government of India, and the Government of India of the Secretary of State in Council?—Yes. There are a great many contributory causes for delays, but I think that the main one is excessive centralisation or what you may call the bottle-neck in India.

Chairman.

8580. Is there anything you would like to add to what you have said?—I think not.

Chairman.] We are very much obliged to you.

SIR JAMES BRUNYATE, K.C.S.I., C.I.E., is called in; and Examined as follows:—

Chairman.

8581. I think you have been a member of the Council of India since 1917?—Yes.

8582. You entered the Indian Civil Service in the United Provinces in 1891?—Yes.

8583. You were at one time Secretary of the Government of India in the Finance Department?—Yes, that was the last appointment I held. Most of my experience in India has been financial, and most of it, including all the latter part of it, has been in connection with the Government of India. So that I feel myself rather specially disqualified for offering opinions on a scheme which is so largely concerned with Provincial matters.

8584. We have had the advantage of reading a very interesting contribution which you made to the Report of Lord Crewe's Committee. Is there anything you would like to say on the subject generally, or in relation to that Report?—On the subject of the reform scheme generally?

8585. Yes?—I think, as it has been impracticable for me to submit a written statement and you have kindly excused me from doing so, I might just mention at the outset that I fully accept the pronouncement on which this whole scheme is based—the pronouncement of August 20th, 1917. I accept with misgiving, but I do accept the scheme of diarchy, which is the central feature of the Joint Report and the basis of this Bill. Those are the two main points I want to state to the Committee, just to indicate my general attitude towards the reform scheme. For the rest I am content to await any questions which may be put to me

Major Ormsby-Gore.

8586. You have noticed, I dare say, in the public Press and in the evidence before this Committee, that your division of the functions of the Government of India into two categories has been used by persons who are anxious to see some responsibility in the Central Government of India in support of a proposal to create diarchy in the Government of India. Would you like to say anything on that? I dare say you noticed the leading article in the "Times" this morning referring to it?—No, I have not seen the "Times" this morning. I should like to say that I am totally opposed to dualising the Government of India at this moment and at this stage, and I do not accept any description of my scheme which regards it as instituting a form of dualism, or a half-hearted approach to dualism. I think that those who seek to dualise the Government of India at this stage do not fully realise the extreme anomalousness of the diarchic system as a system of government. I have come to the conclusion, as I said a few moments ago, that that system of dualism is one which we must, in fact, adopt in the Provinces, but I am absolutely clear that we cannot afford to throw all our machinery into the melting-pot at this stage, and that we are under no pledge or obligation whatever to do at this stage for the Central Government what it is proposed in the Bill to do for the Local Governments.

8587. It has been suggested that it would be possible to have in the Central Government of India a Minister responsible to the Legislative Assembly of India for overseeing and keeping account of the actions of the various Provincial Governments in regard to transferred subjects such as education—that is to say, for the work of co-ordination, on behalf of the Government of India, of the work of the Provincial Governments in transferred subjects. Do you think that is a practicable proposal?—Well, I think it depends on your general aim. If you contemplated a scheme under which the Government of India would still retain very large powers of control, or if not of control, of guidance and influence, it would be perfectly possible to collect those functions to a large extent and entrust them to the holder of a particular portfolio in the Government of India—not a Minister, because that would mean diarchy again. But the preamble to the Bill begins by asserting most emphatically — the emphasis comes from the position in which the words occur at the very outset of the Bill—the principle of ousting the Government of India from concern in matters which are purely Provincial, and a fortiori in matters relating to transferred heads. Therefore I do not think that the expedient which you suggest is a desirable or a consistent one.

8588. I do not suggest it?—I mean the one you put to me.

8589. You have observed that from India there has been this demand for years for some measure of responsibility in the Central Government. Your argument is that that would introduce diarchy, which is impracticable in the Government of India, and that the process should be by extending responsibility after all

Provincial subjects have been transferred. You would transfer nothing in the Central Government until all Provincial subjects had been transferred?—I do not quite go that length. Your question began by saying that there is a demand from India for some constitutional alteration in the Government of India in the direction of what we call advance. My answer to that portion is that I recognise that. I think it is impossible to meet that demand by immediate diarchy. The scheme which I put forward in connection with the report of Lord Crewe's Committee is the best effort which I, at any rate, can make to meet that demand. But when you ask me as to how soon the state of things, which at this moment in my view makes a larger concession impossible, may be modified, I am quite unable to say; and I certainly should not be prepared to say that it could not be modified until every single subject in the Provinces had become a transferred subject.

8590. What are your views on the demand for fiscal autonomy for India?—As you know, I made a reference to that in the scheme of mine to which you have referred. I think the position in India, in spite of reform, in spite of all we are doing, will be very unsatisfactory if Indian public opinion continues to believe that interests which it has very dearly at heart, as for instance the industrial development of the country, are sacrificed to interests which are external to India, to British interests or British interests disguised in the form of general Imperial interests. In some way I think we have to make it clear that that is not the intention of His Majesty's Government. If that can be made clear, I would not go the length of saying at once that the Central Legislature in India or the Central Legislature and the Government of India combined should have an absolutely free hand in regard to all their fiscal proceedings; I consider that they would still need the guidance of wider experience for one thing. I do not think the experience which is necessary in those matters is wholly obtainable in India. I think they would need the controlling influence which comes from detachment from local feeling. And, of course, His Majesty's Government would still have to be heard in such matters, they would still have to have a voice in such matters from the point of view of international relations. But I do want it to become impossible for any reasonable minded Indian to think that the standpoint from which any Indian proposition in regard to fiscal matters is viewed at home is the standpoint of competing British interests.

8591. One question about the work of the Council. Are you of opinion that the Council of India at present takes up too much time in examining proposals for expenditure by the Government of India or by Provincial Governments, and that that examination is the cause of unnecessary delay?—I do not think the Council of India takes very much time in examining them, because the Council work very quickly, and they are not matters of laborious and anxious study; but I do think too many of such cases come home, and that far too much time is spent in India in preparing them for presentation to the authorities at home.

8592. I gather that you want to keep the statutory power—the financial veto of the Council?—No. I have said in one of my papers that I am prepared to see that go.

8593. You want to keep some statutory power?—I do not press for the statutory power which is called the financial veto, but I do press for what I call the statutory relationship of participation with the Secretary of State in the administration of India. I wish still that India should be administered, as far as home administration goes, by the Secretary of State in Council.

8595. You would retain the whole of the clause of the Act of 1915?—Not quite that. This is the essential portion, in Section 5: "The Council of India shall, under the direction of the Secretary of State, and subject to the provisions of this Act, conduct the business transacted in the United Kingdom in relation to the Government of India and the correspondence with India." That I think is conferring on the Council some sort of statutory participation in the administration of India, and differentiates the Council, as a corporate body, from a collection of mere advisers to whom the Secretary of State can refer, individually or collectively, as he may at any time think fit.

Lord Islington.

8596. As to your reason for desiring to see the removal of the veto power, is it because the existing statutory power is found from experience to be non-effective, or is it because you desire to leave the final authority solely in the hands of the Secretary of State?—The latter statement approaches my reason. I will take two aspects, one a minor matter—supposing a minor matter is under discussion—and the other is supposing a major matter is under discussion. If the matter under discussion is purely minor it seems to me, at any rate, very anomalous that if the responsible Minister of the Crown has listened patiently to the statements which the members of his Council placed before him, he should not be at liberty to have his way in a matter which, by hypothesis, is purely of minor importance. It really would be an extraordinary thing if any members of the Council should say to the Secretary of State: "This is a trumpery matter, but still we mean to have our way and you shall not have your way." If the matter is a major matter I really find it impossible to conceive the conditions, with one exception which I will refer to later, under which the members of Council collectively should refuse to let the Secretary of State take the action which, in agreement with the Cabinet and the Prime Minister, he thought it his duty to take. Because the Council stands responsible to nobody, in a sense they represent nobody, and in a sense they are not constitutionally responsible to anybody. The Secretary of State bears the whole responsibility, and in the last resort it seems to me that he must have his way. The exception I referred to is where the matter under discussion is an important question of apportionment of charge; where it is a question whether a certain heavy charge shall fall on Indian revenues or shall fall on the British Treasury. In that case the Secretary of State himself occupies a very difficult and anomalous position. As a member of the Government or the Cabinet, the interests of the British Treasury are necessarily a matter of much concern to him. As specifically the Minister for India, he is also closely interested in the other side, and if there were no other means of composing a grave difference of opinion on an important question of apportionment of charge, I can conceive that it might be the duty of the members of Council to press their view and to push the whole question to a collision, which, of course, must end in a modification of the Government of India Act. They could only do it once. But as a matter of fact there are recognised arrangements for dealing with questions of apportionment of charge. They can be referred to arbitration and the like, and that, I think, is the correct way of dealing with them, rather than by collision in the Secretary of State's Council.

8597. As regards the first category which you mention, the trivial matters, I suppose you would say that in 9 cases out of 10 the Secretary of State would probably agree to the decision of the Council?—Quite; I think I can say that is the practice.

8598. Or even if he did not he would probably in some cases bow to it?—There would be some sort of via media.

8599. Your difficulty about the veto for larger subjects is mainly because they would come into the realm of what you may call Cabinet questions?—Yes.

8600. And your contention is that an irresponsible body would be clothed with an arbitrary power over the Secretary of State, who is responsible to the Cabinet?—Yes, it would be simply a grotesque position.

8601. If your general proposals were to be given effect to, you would, I take it, admit that you are clothing the Secretary of State with rather more direct power, power in a rather more direct fashion, than has hitherto been the case?—Yes, I am putting him in a position to abuse the intentions of the Act if he wishes to do so.

8602. You are saying that with regard to Central Government and with regard to Local Governments the vetoing power of the Government of India is not to obtain, but only an allowing power is to be granted them. Is that a fair description?—Are you passing on to another matter?

8603. I am passing on now to the power of the Secretary of State. I have passed from the financial position of the Council, and I have passed on now to your other proposals in your note, in which, as I read them, you lay down that the Secretary of State will have the power of disallowance, while the Government of India and the Local Governments will be confined to that of merely allowance on subjects of legislation, of administration, and of finance?—That is ordinarily the position I suggest. In a sense it does not differ very much from existing practice, I think. I see Sir James Meston is in the room, and he might be able to correct me at the appropriate time if I am wrong. But take finance, for instance. A scheme involving expenditure is put forward in the Provinces. Either it is within the power of the Local Government, in which case the Local Government sanctions it without reference to the Government of India or the Secretary of State.

8604. It is within the delegation power?—Yes, or it is not within the power of the Local Government, and in that case it has to go to the Secretary of State under the existing practice. There is no intermediate limit within which a Local Government's proposal can be sanctioned by the Government of India, but cannot be sanctioned by itself. If it cannot be sanctioned by the Local Government it must go to the Secretary of State. So that though I take it when the proposals go to the Government of India they could say, "We cannot support this proposal to the Secretary of State," and in that sense they might disallow it, in actual practice the more usual thing would be to discuss it with the Local Government and see if they could arrive at an agreement on the matter, and then send the modified proposal to the Secretary of State. A blunt veto from the Government of India at that stage is not usual, even under the present practice.

8605. One other question. I think you suggest, with a view to advancing devolution, that the delegation limit should be extended?—Yes.

8607. They should have a wider discretion over finance, without reference home, than has hitherto been the case?—Yes.

8608. Have you anything in a concrete form which you could tell us, or have you anything in your mind as regards this extension of delegation?—Might I make a few remarks without their being put down?

8609. Do you agree that it is a very important branch of devolution?—Yes, I agree with that. [The Witness here made a communication, unrecorded.] I think that the existing limits in almost all cases want some enlargement, but in addition to that there requires to be a study of the material which has come home from the Government of India to the Secretary of State for financial sanction over a long period, so as to find some further criteria by which you can sift out a lot of cases which now come which are not of real importance. You may lay down a limit that every scheme of reorganisation costing £10,000 a year shall come to the Secretary of State, or you may make it £50,000 a year. But even such a limit will still bring a lot of work to the India Office which has really no business to come there at all.

8610. In the scheme?—Yes. Therefore I say the existing scheme of delegation wants enlarging in two directions—first because the limits are not high enough, and secondly because a mere system of limits does not suffice, however you fix your limits, to keep all the unnecessary references from coming home. I believe that some work is being done in that direction in India, and possibly at home, in preparing work in such directions.

8611. Of course, if that were to develop and materialise it would expedite matters very considerably. That is where a great deal of the delay comes in?—Yes, it is important.

8612. If the scrutiny of the details of even a delegated scheme is modified, as at present obtains, it would expedite matters considerably in their materialising in India, would it not?—When we speak of delay occurring in the Government of India, my impression is we really are not generally referring to those isolated cases of proposed expenditure. We generally have in view some very large scheme, possibly the programme of advance set forth by a Royal Commission or what not, which must, under any scheme of delegation, come to the Secretary of State in some form, and the delay occurs in dealing with a great mass of material containing proposals in many different branches, all of which have to be co-ordinated in some way.

Chairman.

8613. You said, I think, in answer to Lord Islington, that you thought the power of veto in certain financial matters now enjoyed by the Council of India should be repealed?—Yes.

8614. That, of course, is a matter on which I give no opinion at all, but your reasons seem to me to be rather far-reaching. You gave as your reason the fact that the Council of India was not responsible and the Secretary of State was?—Yes.

8615. But Parliament imposes definite duties on whole numbers of civilians and naval and military officers in exactly the same way as it does on the Council of India. Nobody suggests that that is a reason for repealing the powers conferred upon them by Parliament?—Surely Parliament does not impose on any other authorities a power of refusing a decision of the Cabinet itself?

8616. But surely that was the intention of Parliament at the time. It may be good or bad, but that was clearly the intention?—I see that was the intention of Parliament, but I think, if I may say so with respect, the cases are not analagous—a case in which one authority is empowered to block the decision of the Cabinet, and the other the case of officers and so forth to which you refer.

8618. Do you doubt that that was the actual intention of Parliament at the time it passed that Act?—No, but the conditions at the time the Act was passed were very new, and I think it is possible for such provisions to become obsolete in constitutional practice.

Chairman.] I am not quarrelling with your opinion, but with the reasons you gave for it.

Lord Islington.

8619. May I ask one further question on that point? Carrying on your view that you would remove the veto, and I think your admission that the Secretary of State will have reposed in him a very responsible power, would you agree to the opinion of the Council if it was in discord with the Secretary of State being in some form recorded, and, if necessary, made public?—Recorded, yes; made public is a solution that I do not like. If one were seeking some kind of intermediate course for giving real authority to the Council, I would rather say that the opinion of the Council should be recorded and placed before the Cabinet. I personally do not want to assert for the Council of India power to override the deliberate opinion of the Cabinet.

8620. I am assuming a case of some very important matter, the Secretary of State taking one view, his Council taking another, and the question becoming a public one in Parliament. You would leave it to the discretion of the Cabinet as to what course the Council took being made known to Parliament?—Yes, of course, if you provide a procedure under which, in cases of difference difference of opinion, the recorded dissent of the Council was laid before the Cabinet, it would, I take it, usually be elicited in the House of Commons that such a dissent had been recorded, and it probably would become public.

Lord Sydenham.

8621. In paragraph 14 of your Memorandum you say we are bound to allow for political experiment in the Government of India. Now we are going to try a tremendously important experiment in the Provinces. Might it not be wisest to wait and see how this works before going higher?—It might be wisest, and I fully admit that it is a difficult question of opinion, but it is proposed to give a non-elected majority in the Legislative Assembly, and the Government of India, therefore, may have to rely for their Legislation largely on the process of certification; I doubt the expediency of making no further concession in the conditions you are going to create.

8622. You will admit that the whole of the working of this rather complicated system must be highly problematical?—Certainly.

8623. You lay stress on the convention of non-interference by the Secretary of State. What do you mean exactly by convention in that sense?—I would like to look at the passage.

8624. It is in paragraph 14. You say: "A time will come when the convention of non-interference will be established and can be formally affirmed by rule?" I do not quite understand your meaning there?—I mean this: Supposing we start the Government of India with no constitutional change in its relations to the Legislature, but give the Legislature this elected majority. In view of that elected majority, and in view of the whole atmosphere of reform, I think that every responsible person concerned with the administration of India will feel that though no constitutional changes have been made it is necessary to defer to a much larger extent to the wishes expressed by the Legislature than has been the practice in the past. If an indefinite time were allowed for that evolution I think there would gradually come into being a group of subjects of less vital importance—matters of everyday domestic interest—in which the Secretary of State, even though charged under the Government of India Act with the duty of superintendence, direction, and control, would in practice almost invariably refrain from interference with a view recommended by the Government of India with the support of the Legislative Council. In that way, postulating that an indefinite time for evolution were allowed, I think you would arrive at a convention of non-interference.

8625. I think you will admit that that is rather vague. You really mean that a habit would arise in process of time which would be likely to become permanent?—I accept that.

8626. But might not the convention of one Secretary of State be immediately broken by his successor?—It might, but it is not always very easy to go back on past practice.

8627. You hope to build up a precedent. Now, with regard to a very large number of the very important questions which the Secretary of State would have to take, I gather you consider that a strong and well-selected Council, with recent knowledge, is essential to India?—Yes.

8628. Do you think that nine members would be sufficient, consisting of one-third non-official Indians, one-third officials, and one-third chosen for special knowledge?—I think it probably would. I would not like it to be less than nine.

8629. Do you think that a term of three years would suffice?—I do not think it would in practice for Service members. The Secretary of State wants to appoint a particular man; very likely he has to resign an appointment in India to take up the appointment at home, or perhaps he has already recently come home from India and has made his arrangements for living in England, and has to alter those arrangements. One way and another I think you will find that three years was too short a tenure to get the man you want.

8630. As a principle you would like the information to be as recent as possible in the India Office?—Yes.

8631. Are you satisfied with the internal machinery of the India Office?—Well, that might be considered from two points of view—the management of the Office as distinguished from the Council of India, about which I really have nothing to say, and the manner in which work is done by the Council of India in association with the Secretary of State's permanent staff.

8632. Is there not really a sort of dualism, consisting of the Secretary of State and his permanent officials on the one hand and the Council on the other?—There is, and I cannot say that it is quite satisfactory. But it is very difficult to see how the Committee system is to continue except on some such lines as we have at present, and I attach importance to the Committee system of working.

8633. Is it not a fact that the Council does not see some important business?—Yes, the political business.

8634. Is it impossible to let the Councillors hold portfolios?—To me, personally, the holding of a portfolio would be a much more acceptable way of rendering any service in the India Office which I was asked to render, but I have never liked the idea, I think a portfolio holder is much more likely to subject Indian proposals to an intensive control and interference; whereas the effect of Committee work and discussion, I think, is to elicit a variety of view which is often valuable, especially in finance, while at the same time preventing an undue tendency to interfere with the Government of India.

8636. Do you think it is impossible to work the Council very much like that of the Viceroy, leaving the Council its present veto for the restricted purpose, and letting the Secretary of State over-ride it in all other matters at his discretion?—I do not like the portfolio system as a means of handling a reference from the Government of India. I suppose the two most important Committees of the India Office are the Judicial and Public Committee and the Financial. I do not belong to the former, and cannot speak with authority about it. But, as regards Finance, the work done at the India Office, in my view, is enormously more valuable, through the variety of knowledge and experience obtained by means of the Committee system, than it would be if the best of us were alone there as the portfolio holder.

Mr. Montagu.

8637. Is not the most hopeful way of improving the machinery of the India Office to lessen its work?—Yes. I did not get an opportunity of saying that, but it is the essential point.

8638. You help at the India Office to conduct a very large banking business?—Yes.

8639. You are aware that the Political Department is largely engaged in the administration of Mesopotamia?—Yes.

8640. And, generally speaking, if business had not to come across the sea to the India Office the situation would be much relieved?—Yes.

8641. We heard the other day, in evidence, of a very valuable proposal for the formation of a technological institute which had been vetoed by the Secretary of State, or postponed by the Secretary of State, and had never come into being. Do you see any reason why, if a Provincial Government wishes to build a technological institute, it should ask the sanction of the Government of India, provided it could get the sanction of its Legislative Assembly?—Of course, in the individual case presented in that way one is tempted to say no. On the other hand, if Parliament is to exercise control through the Secretary of State and watch over the administration of India, the Secretary of State, I think, must be made cognisant of all departures of real importance, and be given at least an opportunity of being heard on them, and in the last resort of vetoing them them. In the case of a technological institute, which might cost from first to last a very large sum of money, initial and recurring, and does represent an interesting educational departure, I hardly like to say, if any superintendence, direction, and control are to be exercised from home, that that should be excluded.

8642. You would justify control from home on the ground that the Legislative Assembly was not yet sufficiently representative?—Representative and experienced.

Chairman.

8643. Is there anything you would like to add?—No.

Chairman.] We are very much obliged to you, Sir James.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Lord BRODRICK (Viscount MIDLETON).
Lord SYDENHAM.
Lord SINHA.

Mr. BENNETT.
Sir HENRY CRAIK.
Mr. MONTAGU.
Major ORMSBY-GORE.
Sir J. D. REES.
Mr. SPOOR.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE LORD BRODRICK (VISCOUNT MIDLETON) IN THE CHAIR.

HIS HIGHNESS AGA SULTAN SIR MAHOMED SHAH, AGA KHAN, G.C.S.I., G.C.I.E., is called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

8644. Your Highness has been good enough to answer certain questions submitted to you, and the Committee have the advantage of knowing your views in respect of those questions?—Yes.

The following are the questions and answers:—

1, 2. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India? and, if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"? And do you generally accept the proposition contained in the preamble? 2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the Provinces involves the establishment in provincial legislatures of a substantial elected majority (Clause 6)?—The preamble to the Bill is in my judgment appropriate and satisfactory. I accept the term "responsible government," though as an ideal my preference is for self-government either on the American federal plan or on Swiss lines, leaving ultimate power through the initiative, the referendum, and perhaps the recall. But the facts of the situation have to be recognised. Our future is linked with Great Britain and not with the United States, or Switzerland—and still less with an abstract perfect State conceived by the mind of a Plato. For a century and a half English institutions and sentiments have been moulding Indian political ideas. The very fact that this Bill is before the British Parliament shows that we must seek progress at this transitional stage in conformity with English views and English institutions. Under these circumstances "responsible government" must be our way towards evolving in the future some plan more suited to a congeries of great States, such as India will become, and I believe the way will be found in something akin to the American federal plan, plus the initiative and the referendum and possibly even the recall. Meanwhile acceptance of the formula "responsible government" postulates the necessity for making the electorate as wide as possible, as well as the establishment in the Provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority.

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the Executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—The non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures certainly influence, but do not control, the actions and policy of the Executive. Such control should now be given in the transferred spheres; and I look forward to the day when, through the referendum and the initiative, the electors will fully supervise their representatives.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of Government in the Provinces in which at present the Provincial Executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes?—As the Joint Report points out, there are great differences in the measure of advancement in the various provinces. Of Bombay I should say that all distinctly Provincial work could be safely left to the control of the electorate; and probably to the same can be said of the two other Presidencies. But in the inland Provinces a varying measure of reservation may be necessary.

5. If you accept the propositions stated under Questions 1 to 4, do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view?—From its nature dualism cannot be a permanent solution. But all our work is spadework at present, and it is difficult to imagine any other coherent scheme for the transitional period. Dualism will prepare the ground and make full responsible government inevitable in time.

7, 8. If you consider a dual form of government, acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail the modification of which you regard as necessary? If so, what are those points, and what modifications would you suggest? 8. In particular, do you think (i) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure"?—i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their department by the Governor or if they fail to retain the confidence of the Legislature (Clause 3 (1))? (ii) that the Governor should have power to disregard gard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities (Clause 3 (3))? (iii) that the Executive Council should in all Provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian (Clause 4)? (iv) that the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council (Clause 7 (4))?—When dyarchy is established modifications must grow out of experience; but it is important to remove, on initiation, any unnecessary ground for friction and difficulty. For instance, I cannot imagine any self-respecting Minister remaining in office if he is over-ruled in his department on important issues. He should not be subject to dismissal by the Governor, for I believe that reliance can be placed on the honourable traditions which will grow up round the appointment. An adverse vote of the Legislature on the proposals of a Minister should not automatically bring about his retirement; a vote for his removal carried by a two-thirds majority should be needed. The power of the Governor to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that the proposed action would be inconsistent with the discharge of his responsibilities is desirable at present as a safeguard from the British point of view. The practical utility of such power, however, may be doubted. In my judgment the best guarantee that hasty, unfair or partial legislation will not be carried out, and also the best protection for the Governor himself, will be for a method of referendum to be added to the constitutional framework even at this initial stage. When in perplexity between the advice of his officials and the secret reports of the police on the one hand, and the behests of the Legislature on the other, the Governor could then avoid the anxieties and doubtful results of dissolution by submitting the measure in dispute to the people by referendum. This plan would politically educate the electors, keep their interest in public affairs keen and vigilant, and ultimately lead to the initiative and the regular use of the referendum in all cases of importance. This alternative method is free from the objection of complete novelty. It is successfully worked in the Swiss Confederation of free Cantons. I support the clauses which provide that the Executive Council in all Provinces should normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian, and that the Governor should have power to dissolve the Legislature.

9. Referring back to Questions 2, 3 and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the Legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed generally by Clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and legislative powers as (i) suitable, or as (ii) unnecessarily severe, or as (iii) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament (Clause 9)?—The restrictions upon the financial and legislative powers of the Legislatures embodied in Clause 9 are unnecessarily severe so far as Bombay and Bengal are concerned, however requisite they may be in some provinces. They are, on the whole, more than adequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament.

10. In particular, (i) do you think that the Legislature should have power with whatever limitations to vote supplies (Clause 9 (2))? (ii) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—The Legislature should certainly have power to vote supplies. I am not enamoured of the elaborate machinery of the Grand Committee for securing essential legislation refused by the Legislature. It may be necessary for the first few years; but after five or six years I would resort to the natural and constitutional solution of dissolving the House on important occasions when the whole policy of the Administration is under successful challenge. In cases where only one measure is the cause of friction I would use the referendum. Thus the people would be trained in responsibility through a general election or the referendum.

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to Provincial Legislative Councils over Provincial Governments?—I do not entirely accept the position of the Bill that the time has not come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to Provincial Legislatures over the Provincial Governments. Powerful arguments have been addressed to the Joint Committee in favour of making at least a beginning of responsible government in the central sphere. I would instance two important departments, Public Works and Education, as capable of being handed over to a responsible Minister at headquarters without unduly fettering the Government of India in the discharge of its responsibilities to Parliament and the Empire.

12, 13. Do you agree that it is advisable none the less to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature (Clause 16)? 13. Do you accept the plan of a dicameral Legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential (Clauses 14, 15 and 16)?—There should be a substantial majority of elected members in the Indian Legislative Assembly. I do not favour, in principle, the bicameral plan for the Central Government, since it may retard true federalism. But at present I see no prospect of applying the federal principle, nor of the British Parliament accepting single-chamber machinery for All-India legislation. Hence I accept a bicameral system as a pis aller; but the composition proposed for the second chamber is too official and inadequately representative. Though here, too, my ideal is self-government through the referendum, initiative and recall, I do not at this stage urge the establishment in the central sphere of these ultimate solutions.

14. Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature (Clause 20 (3) and (4))? Or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities?—The clauses relating to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature are unnecessarily restrictive, and seem based on distrust of the common sense of the people.

15. Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council? If not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest?—I welcome the modification of the existing statutory restrictions on appointments to the Governor-General's Executive Council. I would suggest that the two departments previously mentioned—Public Works and Education—should be made into memberships whose holders would be responsible to the Legislative Assembly and that the remaining places should be filled in equal proportions by Europeans and Indians.

16. Do you think that the development of Provincial autonomy, on the one hand, and of self-government in the Provinces on the other, involves any modification of the provisions of Sections 2, 33 and 45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23)?—Modifications of the powers of superintendence, direction and control possessed by the Secretary of State over the Indian administration and by the Governor-General in Council over the Provincial Governments are essential to the working of this legislation. The modifications required seem to me as a layman to be but vaguely implied in the Bill as it stands, and I think that in broad outline they should be given definite statutory expression. As time goes on and Indians learn in the school of responsibility sponsibility I look for great advances on the present implied modifications, advances which will in due time lead to true federalism.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examinations?—Unquestionably the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress by independent authority. India is changing so rapidly, and the war has so keenly stimulated her material development and the political consciousness of her people, that I think ten years is too long a period between the investigations to be made by statutory commissions. I should prefer seven years, and would remind the Committee that the India of 1919 is entirely different in outlook from the India of 1912.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—The Bill leaves far too much to rules to be made hereafter. I recognise the force of the arguments of the memorandum of the Secretary of State (Cd. 175; 1919) for leaving changes to be worked out in detail in the form of rules, especially for a measure so transitional in character. But in my humble judgment the framework should be more clearly visible in the Bill and less scope should be left for the exercise of mere personal inclination or the prejudices of party outlook by successive Secretaries of State or Governors-General. Sober progressive opinion in India has strong confidence in Mr. Montagu and his reforming purposes; but it knows that political changes in England (wholly unconnected with Indian affairs) may occur at any time, leaving the personality of the head of the India Office in the critical days of inaugurating the new order an uncertain and disturbing factor. The skeleton character of the present Bill may be contrasted with the care and detailed exactitude of the measure which, in 1858, transferred the administration from a trading company to the Crown.

19. Have you any observations to offer on the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs?—The report of the Southborough Franchise Committee is seriously defective in two respects. The first is the non-admission of women to the franchise. I need not recapitulate the arguments on this subject in my book, "India in Transition." I will only say that Indian women, even though in purdah, are neither slaves nor fools. Property, often to a large amount, is found in their hands, and frequently the working of the joint family system makes a woman the practical head of the family or house. The rudiments of English Parliamentary government are being bestowed upon India; and no substantial ground has been shown for confining them to a moiety of the people. The second great defect of the Southborough scheme is that the question of Referendum is totally ignored, though there are many reasons for accepting it as a constitutional instrument specially suited to Indian conditions. In India the elected members are liable to be charged by officials and conservative observers with failing to reflect the real mind of the electors they represent. It is a country, too, where the educated leaders show an eagerness and haste for legislation bringing the social laws, touching the lives of the people at large at many points, more into conformity with Western opinion than the masses may understand or appreciate. This being so, the best safeguard of the Governor in the exercise of his discretion and of British opinion, which is still the final court of appeal, is that when doubt arises on important matters the opinion of the people should be known, not only on general policy, which can best be shown by a general election, but on the particular measure under consideration. For these reasons and to bring home to the electorate a sense of responsibility, as well as to keep their representatives in touch with the opinion of all classes of voters, a modified form of referendum is necessary even at this stage. I suggest that it should be applied not at the unrestricted discretion of the Governor, but only when he carries with him a high proportionate minority—say 40 per cent.—of members of the Legislature voting on the question. But with the development of responsibility time will bring the referendum and the initiative can be made the constitutional method, as in Switzerland, of settling all first-class questions on which opinion in the Legislature is sharply divided, arising between one general election and another, alike in the Provinces and in the Central Government. With these important reservations, I accept generally the proposals of the Southborough Committees as, on the whole, not unsuited to the period of transition, though there may be details capable of amendment with much advantage.

8645. I would venture to ask you in the first instance one or two points to elucidate your answers. You say that dualism cannot be a permanent solution. Now with regard to diarchy, we have had two views put before us: One is that the electorate, or the Legislative Council, should have a partial control of all matters, and the other is that they should have a complete control of certain matters. Which, in your opinion, is more desirable?—I think, given the declaration of the 20th August, that a responsible government is the final objective in view, that the second solution can be the only first step. I do not see how the first solution can possibly be a first step towards responsible government ultimately by stages. They must have complete control of some; then only will they begin to have responsibility in the full sense.

8646. Consider this point. If you give Ministers a complete control of certain subjects you would know where the responsibility lay, would you not?—Yes.

8647. Would it not be more desirable that whatever was a subject for the Legislative Council, it should be clearly understood with whom the responsibility lay?—That is the solution of giving complete responsibility on certain subjects, and then it is clearly understood where the responsibility lies.

8648. It rather depends. If you have a Cabinet, so to speak, in which we will say there are four members, two Ministers and two appointed by the Governor-General, it is possible, is it not, that the Ministers might be outvoted in the Cabinet, and the policy of the vote in regard to such subjects as the Ministers have to deal with might not be that of which the Ministers approve? Which is most desirable, that Ministers should be the arbiters, so to speak, of the policy they introduce, subject, of course, to a possible veto by the Governor at a later stage, or that they should be the spokesmen of the Government in which they might not be in the majority?—I say with the objective of responsible government in view they must have a free hand in those departments vis-a-vis the electorate and vis-a-vis the elected body; that means vis-a-vis the Legislature.

8649. You realise that would hardly be so under the Bill as it stands; you cannot have that with collective responsibility?—As you know better than I do, in politics theory and practice rarely agree after a few months of practice. We cannot foresee how it will exactly work. Nobody who tries now can see how it will exactly work in these questions of details. There will be a good deal of give and take in the Governor's own room. I rely a great deal on the good sense of the people who are made to work any scheme. I do not care what scheme you put forward, you cannot so safeguard it as to be absolutely sure that it will never work crookedly.

8651. The referendum has been usually adopted, has it not, in the case of a well educated electorate? Would you consider that in its initial stage, at all events, an Indian electorate was sufficiently advanced for a referendum?—Well, I think it is a much simpler question to put to an electorate. "Will you have this particular measure or not?" It is a much simpler question to put to an ordinary man than the many different questions which will be on each plank, and out of which he will have to work out in his own mind so much in favour of one and so much in favour of the other. I think the referendum is more fit for an early stage. Because, historically, in England it did not happen to work in that way does not prove that the other is a more advanced way.

8652. We are not allowed to try it in this country, but you think it might be given in India?—Yes, and even in this country, as you know better than anybody else Lord Salisbury, Mr. Chamberlain and a lot of people have wanted it in the past. They have said many measures would never have got through except for the sake of other measures which people wanted. You know that as well as I do.

8653. You recognise that a great deal in this measure will be experimental?—Yes.

8654. Does not that affect your view at all with regard to beginning by touching the position of the Central Government?—Well, I think in those particular subjects it will be very much better that it should be touched. I think it will have a vitalising effect on it.

8655. If you had Clauses 14 to 17, which affect the Central Government, would you prefer to have one Assembly or to have two—to have an Upper House, a Senate, or whatever it may be called—a Council of State?—I am an out-and-out Federalist for India. I am not very much taken up with the idea of the Government of India having two Houses. On the other hand, I realise that at this stage immediately real Federalism we are not prepared for. I will not say we are not prepared for it in India, but the people with whom the government of India ultimately lies are not ready to go in for that big scheme. Given those circumstances I would accept a Second House for the Government of India. Of course it is in the nature of a compromise between a hesitating policy on one side and an advanced policy on the other; there is no getting away from that.

8656. Which, in your opinion, would be best understood in India? It is obvious there must be cases in which both in the Provinces and in the Central Government the supreme authority will have to exercise its power. Is it best that where the supreme authority differs from the Legislative Council it should exercise its power directly or after consideration by a second body such as is proposed—a Grand Committee, or some other body? Which would you rather have? Which would be better understood in India?—I think it would be a protection for the Government to have an Upper House. I realise fully that it is a protection. They take the responsibility to a great extent. It is a shield really in a way. Personally, I think it depends very much on the measure. If it is a measure of foreign policy, or something like that, the Executive Authority could come in far more, but if it is a measure of home policy, my personal liking is entirely for the referendum. If you do not know which policy is really liked by the people, who will be the ultimate sufferers or gainers, go to them directly, and, even if they make mistakes, through those mistakes they will learn.

8657. Supposing the referendum were not adopted, do you think a direct veto by the official responsible, or a further consideration by interim bodies, would be an advantage?—Then, I think, the second House would be advantageous. I think it would be more constitutional, and more in keeping with the principles for which we are sitting here.

8658. I should like to ask you a general question about franchise: Do you think that the views of the Indian people generally will be best obtained by imitating our European system of franchise as far as it can be, or by a large use of communal representation?—I am a strong believer in communal representation. I think I was one of the active authors of getting it admitted long ago. I believe where the community is large enough, and where it wants it, it ought to get it. But that applies to minorities. If you want to protect a majority you must do it through the referendum. That is the only protection for a majority not to be misled by their representatives.

8659. I think your interests are not so much in Madras as in other parts. Therefore I will not carry you into that controversy; but, generally speaking, you think we shall get a better representation throughout India of the opinion of the people by communal representation?—I am convinced of it, and I am convinced that Indian nationality will come quicker and better and in a more wholesome way.

8660. You make a remarkable statement here in regard to the Bill being, in your opinion, too much in skeleton, and you say too much is left to rules to be made hereafter. The great object that I understand you have in view is that there should be certainty and stability?—Yes. I would not have every detail marked out, but I would go a little further than at present. The present one is very skeleton, as you see.

8661. Would you wish the powers in the Bill to be so far set out that there may be no suspicion in India that they may be modified or changed according to the feelings of any individual Secretary of State?—Yes; or I should say of any very small body of men, that it should not be possible for a handful out there, or two or three men here, practically to change it till it has no resemblance to any of the original ideas on which it was built.

8662. I think you have seen, unofficially, a good deal at the India Office, have you not? You have a good many communications with various Secretaries of State?—Yes; but my experience has not been in the general administration of the India Office.

8663. Have you noticed any want of touch with Indian opinion in the India Office?—It depends very much on the Secretary of State. I was myself a member of a Committee, as perhaps you know, that went into the question of the India Office and I unhesitatingly signed the Majority Report. By that I stand, as far as the India Office is concerned.

8664. You say it depends very much on the Secretary of State?—Yes.

8666. At all events you signed the Majority Report?—I did.

8667. You fully recognise that whatever form Indian opinion takes it must be represented at the India Office for the benefit of Secretaries of State in some very definite form. If you dispense with the Council of India you cannot dispense with some similar body for advising. Is that your view?—Even that Majority Report is in the nature of a compromise. We had many discussions. The whole Bill from beginning to end is a tentative attempt. It is the first step. As a temporary measure the majority came to the conclusion that our proposals were the best way out. One of your Committee was a colleague of mine there.

8668. But you recognise, do you not, that the Secretary of State, as the representative of Parliament here, must always retain a paramount power with regard to Indian affairs?—Well, I say always till responsible government is completed—till that time—till this reaches its logical end.

Mr. Bennett.

8669. You are, I see, a very convinced believer in the referendum?—Yes.

8670. May I say that it seems rather a hobby with you; would you admit that?—No. I have seen its working in Switzerland.

8671. Is it not one condition under which a referendum can be satisfactorily applied that the issue should be very definite and clear, and sharply cut?—Just now there is a very big question of the pay and conditions of labour in Switzerland. It is to be decided by the referendum in the next few weeks. That is a sufficiently diffuse question to be solved in that way.

8672. But if the referendum is to take the place of that second consideration which the Grand Committee or the Council of State would give, is it not a procedure that would be a little too complicated for frequent use?—Of course it would be, for frequent use. I do not say that side by side with the referendum you cannot have a secondary body for the minor things.

8673. But you would not regard it, therefore, as a complete substitute for that second consideration?—No. In none of the countries where it has been tried has it been made complete; it has only been made a final decision.

8674. You do not suggest it as a substitute?—No, I suggest it as the final arbiter.

8675. Not to be frequently resorted to?—The initiative depends on the number of people who ask for it, and the referendum depends on the number by which it has been defeated, or the importance of the question. Those have been the lines on which it has been tried, and I believe it has been tried in some of the American states—in South America certainly.

8676. I need not say that you are a very convinced believer in communal representation?—That is so.

8677. As applied to cases in which it is clearly necessary?—Yes.

8678. But you do not put it forward as a good thing in itself?—Good in itself, for where? In India it is good in itself.

8679. But other things being equal, you would avoid it if you possibly could, would you not?—Of course I dare say in an ideal state I would avoid it, and I would avoid it, if I were a German, in Germany.

8680. Having in view the necessity of creating a national feeling in India, you would avoid it, would you not?—No, I would bring it along, because I think it is through that that people will get confidence in order to take further steps toward national union.

8681. But the more you rely on communal representation the more you will be dependent upon it, will you not?—I do not think so. Look at the case of the Mohammedans. Mr. Gokhale, who was at first very doubtful about communal representation, ended his days by being a convinced believer in it, as far as Mohammedans were concerned. Why? Because he saw what happened in practice. He often told me that what led to it was Lord Lansdowne's first Bill. I often brought to his notice that with Lord Lansdowne's first Bill so complete was the separation of the Mohammedans from the Council that it left a feeling of grievance that led to opposition and to a certain amount of suspicion, and it was that, as he himself admitted, that led to the agitation of 1906-7-8. Since then things have worked much better.

8682. You do not agree, then, with the authors of the report, in looking forward to a time when the whole of the communities of India will be merged into one?—I think it is a pious wish. If the authors really thought that was the best they would have suggested it now.

8683. You are in favour of removing the disqualification which it is suggested should be placed upon women voting?—Yes.

8684. You are warmly in favour of that?—Yes; I would give women who have the same conditions the same advantages as men.

8685. Have you seen figures detailing the extent to which women in the Bombay Presidency have exercised the municipal vote?—I do not think, to begin with, the municipal vote is a thing to go by.

8686. No; but it is helpful so far as it goes, is it not?—Even in this country a lot of people do not use the municipal vote. You do not expect, in the first stage in India, that they should use the municipal vote on the same lines as the political vote. It is a great problem here, as you know.

8687. Take such a fact as this, for instance, that out of 1,598 women voters on the register in Bombay City 649 voted: You would regard that as an answer, so far as it goes, to the complaint that women would not exercise the vote—that the vote would be no use to women because they have not exercised it sufficiently? The percentage is 41 per cent.?—I think that is very good.

8688. Do you regard it as satisfactory?—Yes. I know European countries where, in a general election, you do not get that.

8689. It does not differ very much from the percentage of the whole of the voting in a general election in this country?—No. I had no idea it was so big as that.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

8690. What do you mean by Federalism in India? Does that mean a Federation of Native States as well as British India?—Ultimately, yes. Ultimately I hope we shall take in many of the neighbouring States and bring them in as a sort of Zollverein working with the British Empire throughout the world; but, of course, these are dreams.

8691. There is no practical step in the direction of Federalism which you wish to take?—Yes. I say the more independence you give to these Provinces, to their Chambers, and to their electorates, and the more you can make each of them self-supporting, except in those wider military and economic questions, the sooner you will bring about Federalism.

8692. Do you think the present proposals go far enough in relaxing the control, more particularly financial, of the Government of India over the Provinces?—Personally, I do not. Personally I would like to see it as far as possible, but on the other hand I can understand the hesitation of the Government of India at this moment at the first step letting the reins get still looser.

8693. With regard to the Council of State, we have had a good deal of evidence pointing out the very unsatisfactory proposals at present before us, whereby the Council of State derives its origin from the same sources and the same electorate as the Legislative Assembly. Have you any definite proposal that you could put before us for an alternative method of selecting the Council of State?—The only way which I have suggested in a book which I wrote is, that the Council of State should more and more represent the Provinces directly. That is a step towards Federalism. That is what was tried in Germany, and is being now tried, I believe, in the new German constitution, and on a big scale in America and South America.

8694. Do you think there would be any serious objection in Indian opinion if, in the first period, the Council of State were nominated by the Provincial Governors, so many from each of the eight Provinces?—That is the system which prevailed in Germany up to its new constitution, as you know; each of the Federal Governments sent them as plenipotentiaries; they went really as Ministers of those Governments.

8695. Do you think there would be serious objection? Admittedly they would be nominated, and not have any electoral sanction behind them. If they were nominated by the Provincial Governors, what would you say to that?—That is very much the scheme I have sketched out in my own book. Of course, as an author one has a freedom which one has not when working with other people.

8696. In addition to the referendum you add the Initiative and the Recall?—Yes, the Initiative especially. I think it is very important.

8697. The Recall is what I want to ask you about?—I am not ready at this moment for that. I say ultimately the Recall. To begin with by "Recall" is understood one thing in America and different things in France and Switzerland and Italy, but the Initiative, I say, ought to go with the referendum; the two ought to go together.

8698. Has any education about the referendum taken place in the Indian Press—is it before the Indian public in any way?—No; but it is such a simple idea that I think it appeals to the looser Indian minds. From my own experience of Indians, my own countrymen with whom I have lived, I think, it is a thing which any class will understand.

8699. I have heard it suggested, turning to another question which you have been asked, the question of women franchise, that while both Mohammedan and Hindoo women would undoubtedly exercise the franchise in Bombay and Madras, in Northern India there would be far greater difficulties. Would you admit that it might be desirable to make a distinction between different Provinces of India with regard to women's franchise?—Certainly not, on the contrary, I say the only objection in regard to Northern India would be that they would not use the power. Well, let us see whether they would or they would no. Let us give them a chance. Why should we assume that they will not before it has been tried?

8700. I have heard it stated that a greater proportion of Hindoo women would exercise the franchise than Mohammedan women. Do you think that is true?—According

According to communal representation that would not affect it very much. The principle of communal representation is a protection for them.

8701. That would be an answer?—That is obvious, is it not? I see in England other causes stop women's suffrage from developing in the early stages. Into those causes I need not go.

8702. With regard to the report of the Crewe Committee, where you and I were colleagues, supposing we cannot get our proposals for an advisory Committee in lieu of a Council, would you rather have the Council kept, or would you rather abolish it altogether as Professor Keith says?—In our discussions I was one of those who were for absolute abolition, as you know. I accepted that as a compromise.

8703. And if we fail to get the compromise you would rather have the Council abolished?—Yes. I signed that Report, and I stand by that. But if it is left out it is quite a different question.

8704. I merely wanted to get your view on that particular point. Your reason is, that you think the existence of the Council tends to bring to Whitehall a large number of subjects which ought to be dealt with in India?—To a certain extent; and it gives the Secretary of State a sort of false security. He thinks he is in touch with direct opinion, when he may be only in touch with the indirect opinion. It is a bad atmosphere for him.

8706. You rather agree that during the first period of ten years the Secretary of State ought to have at his elbow almost a certain number of Indians who are in touch with Indian feeling and Indian thought independent of official communication?—That is, of course, our Joint Report. That is the scheme we bring forward, because he will have both sides. But if one side is to go I do not see how he can have the other. If the Secretary of State's Council goes I do not see how he can have Indian members on his Council.

Lord Sinha.

8707. On the question of Franchise, would your Highness consider that it is desirable to adhere to what is called the Lucknow Compact?—I do, on the question of Hindoo and Mohammedan, certainly.

8708. And it would be unwise to disturb that?—I would not touch it, and if the Mohammedans took anything else I would strongly advise them to stick to that.

8709. On the question of transferred subjects, would your Highness be in favour of education on the whole being transferred, or only a part being transferred to the Ministry?—I want education everywhere, including the Government of India, transferred, as you see.

8710. Yes, I have seen that. With regard to the Central Government, apart from the introduction of responsibility in the form that your Highness suggests, would you consider that it would go some way towards that object if we have an increase in the addition of Indian members in the Executive Council? The Report recommends two. If we have an increase in the Indian members, and especially the means of selection from amongst the members of the Legislative Council, would that go some way towards the scheme which your Highness recommends?—If we do not get responsibility in the Government of India then certainly I would like to see half and half, and I think half and half is the minimum. Anything else would be a perpetuation of the present state of affairs.

8711. In your Highness's opinion would that give some amount of satisfaction to both Hindoo and Mohammedan public opinion in India if we fail to get any element of responsibility in the Central Government?—Yes; if you fail to get that, that is the next best.

8712. In your very interesting book "India in Transition" you wrote: "Responsible government in the narrow and technical sense in which Mr. Montagu's announcement has been interpreted in some quarters has really been successful alone in the United Kingdom, and there only up to a certain point," and then you went on to show how badly it has worked elsewhere, and you say "It would be a disaster to India to be forced into the narrow form of constitutionalism that has developed with its essential condition of two rival parties"?—Yes.

8713. Do you realise fully that it is responsible government, in that narrow technical sense, which you so strongly condemn, that has brought us into the dual system with all the many attendant evils which we all feel?—The answer to that is the preamble here. We are dealing with English people. It is they who have got the future of India in their hands. Our destiny is not our own to say: "This is the plebiscite," or "This is the system and we will take it." Given the fact that the English historical development took this line, and that we have been 150 years with them, we will have on the one hand to work that system, and on the other hand right it as it goes along. That is how constitutions have developed in other countries, too. As to the evils, for instance, in some countries, like Spain and France, to which I have referred, at this moment there are great movements in both countries to right them. I think that will come through the people as it goes along.

8714. Your general view is that India must seek progress in conformity with English views and English institutions. Now do you not agree that neither in this, nor in any civilised country in the world, would anyone dream of setting up a divided Cabinet?—There is no other country of three hundred millions governed by forty millions 5,000 miles away. You must take facts as they are. The whole thing goes together. We are here. There is no getting out of it. It is a purely problematical development. There it is. There are the facts before one. We cannot be logical and illogical.

8715. Do you think it is wise to introduce into the preamble of the Bill the term "Responsible government" in its narrow technical sense, which you have stigmatised?—Of course, if I had had the making of the declaration I would have put "self-government," but it was not I who did that. It was not my job.

8716. Would you prefer that the Bill should be amended, and point to the better government of India or something of that sort?—Well, "Better government" is a term which has been associated with so many Irish Home Rule Bills. I have seen so many of them go in and out that I would not touch that point. I have seen three of them in my own short life—"Better Government of Ireland" Bills.

8717. You have pointed out that we have made the very great mistake in the past of limiting the right of representation to the "richest and most educated" of the population, and you say it is owing to that most serious error that "national conservatism, which is necessary to the evolution of the modern state, has been artificially prevented from making its voice effectively heard." To remove that, you propose that each of the various religions and races as recorded in the census would provincially be a milit, to use the Turkish term, and each would have a fair share in the Assembly directly elected?—Yes.

8718. That is your view as to communal representation, with which you are heartily in sympathy?—Yes.

8719. Now, taking the case of Bombay, where there are five million Mahrattas, who have supplied us with fine fighting men during the war, and who have sent in a powerful plea for special representation, would you give it to them?—Personally, I would give it to anybody who wants it, and who are numerous enough to ask for it. If they are a majority that protection would be by the referendum as I foresee it. That is the real protection for the majority from being misled by a small handful, who might get in on a wave of enthusiam, and misrepresent their electorate.

8720. The Government of India has pointed out that the representation of the depressed classes under the Southborough Committee's Report is inadequate.

There

There are 60,000,000 of these people, as you know, and they do some of the most essential work of India. Do you think they should have it?—Certainly. I would make the franchise as wide as possible.

8721. Do you consider it vital that the agriculturists and working classes should be liberally represented, having regard to the fact that they provide nearly the whole of the revenue?—Certainly. I have advocated that throughout in my books and writings.

8722. Do you think that if we are to obtain real Indian opinion those classes, and those special classes to which you have referred, should be represented as far as possible by their own people?—Yes. Of course in the case of labour people guilds and so on could be made. A great deal of that must develop as we go along.

8723. You have strongly advocated the enfranchisement of women. My information is that that would be resented by large numbers of high caste Hindoos and by orthodox Moslems. Is that wrong?—How could they resent it? The Moslems have not resented them having the right to property for 1,300 years. In Moslem countries they have the rights of citizenship.

8724. Is not that rather a different matter?—Why should they resent it? I cannot imagine that it should be an insult to a woman to give her the right to vote. It gives her that human dignity which goes with it.

8725. I do not think it is a question of an insult; but your opinion is strongly that it would not be resented?—I am certain of that. I think the other way round would be resented, and the resentment would come on England and not on anybody else. It would make a cause of dissatisfaction in the home, as far as I can see.

8726. Do you not think it is rather a delicate matter for a Government to deal with, because it really might look like an interference with the social and religious customs of India?—Then you would have to do away with all the legal system; you would have to do away with all sorts of things.

8727. You know that a very strong feeling has been aroused about the Inter-caste Marriages Bill, and the Government has been attacked merely for publishing and circulating that Bill. Do you not think it would be better, therefore, that the Government should stand aside from this Women's Franchise question and leave it entirely in the hands of the new Council?—No, I do not. The two things are not on all fours at all—the Inter-caste Marriage Bill and the other question. The difference is enormous. One is giving a woman a right to protect her property. I have heard any number of purdah women say in the past that expenses were run up by men in the municipalities, and they, the women, had to pay the taxes.

8728. You would not be satisfied to leave that question to be decided by the representatives of the people themselves?—If you immediately make a referendum in India I would not mind it, but there is no likelihood of that, so you ought to take the responsibility, if you take the responsibility of all the rest.

8729. You have spoken very strongly about the referendum. Do you know any country in approximately similar conditions to India in which the referendum has been adopted?—In Switzerland there are four different languages, and no religions hate each other so much as those which are very near to each other, like the Calvinists and some other Protestants out there. There are the Catholic French and the Protestant French. It is the most divided country in Europe. My own experience has been that the referendum is one of the things which has kept them together.

8730. But there are not 80 per cent. of uneducated people in Switzerland?—But you are not giving the vote to 80 per cent., are you?

8731. Not at first?—You do not give the referendum to them either.

8733. Do you think that a referendum worked through the Post Office would be free from fraud on a huge scale?—The Savings Bank system has not been full of fraud, has it?

8734. There are not 5,200,000 people who are dealing with the Savings Bank, and surely there is no analogy between those two cases?—People bring letters in. I do not see the difference between putting them in and putting the other in.

8735. Now you know so well what false rumours can do in India: all the troubles in the Punjab and the very sad loss of life which accompanied them were really due to falsehoods circulated about the Rowlatt Bill——

Mr. Montagu.] I do not want to interrupt Lord Sydenham, but a Commission has been appointed to inquire what the causes of the Punjab troubles were, and I should very much prefer that the form of the question should be altered—if Lord Sydenham will say "it was alleged."

Lord Sydenham.

8736. I will say it is alleged. (To the Witness.) Would it not be possible by those means to vitiate what might seem to be a simple issue on a referendum?—No; I think the simpler it is the less people are liable to be led away by rumours—the simpler the question put. And as to the Punjab, I have not been there, and I want to see what the causes were.

8737. In your book I think you deprecate two Chambers in the Central Government after the short transitional period?—Yes.

8738. Have you modified that view at all?—In my book I have advocated Federalism, after which their duties will be reduced enormously. When their duties are reduced enormously, I modify my views. When it is a Federal Assembly, including Afghanistan, Persia, Thibet and Siam, I would modify my views.

8739. Do you not think that setting up two Chambers now might prejudice your ultimate Federal scheme of a single Chamber?—I think as time goes on, as the Provincial things develop, the second Chamber will gradually have less and less work to do.

8740. It will ultimately disappear of inanition?—Yes; and become a sort of Foreign Affairs Committee.

8741. What you contemplate after the transition period is federation, in which all the major States join?—Yes; the Indian States.

8742. Do you really think the chiefs of those great States would ever abandon the powers they now possess in order to enter the federation?—The powers put forward in my book they do not possess now, except in a very minor way. The Post Office, for instance, they do not possess now.

8743. You realise nobody can enter the federation without abandoning powers?—Yes; but they do not possess those.

8744. There are particular powers they do not possess now?—Yes; so I do not see where they would lose.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

8745. Are you speaking of the powers as to Foreign policy?—Yes; and the Post Office.

Lord Sydenham.

8746. In the future you are looking forward to a very great Eastern Federation, including Afghanistan, Persia, and a few other places?—Yes.

8748. You do not think so?—No. I have known the United States. It is not on the same level all over.

Mr. Montagu.

8749. Have you discussed the referendum idea with any other Indians?—No.

8750. Have you ever heard it mooted from Indian sources?—I have suggested it to the late Mr. Gokhale and others, and I have told Lord Sinha about it. I have often suggested it to them.

8751. Is it really a very simple question—I mean that which the voter has to decide?—It is in Switzerland and some of the American States, and in Australia. It is the sort of thing the Indian mind, as I know it or as I imagine I know it, would understand.

8752. Do you think it is really a simpler problem to the man who receives a referendum paper to vote for a Bill rather than to vote for a man?—I think so.

8753. Do you think the electors in this country would have found, for instance, the issues of the late strike a simple question to decide?—Would that have ever gone to a referendum?

8754. I was only asking you whether it is always a simple question which has to be decided in a referendum; that is all. The second question I wanted to put to you was this. Supposing your idea of Federalism in India were to come about, the Central Government would graduallyy have fewer and fewer powers: Would it ever disappear altogether?—No, because for foreign affairs, military, postal, possibly aerial communications, and so on, it would have to go on.

8755. Meanwhile, the Provinces would have more and more to do?—Exactly.

8756. And the scheme which is known as diarchy is only applicable, is it not, to a Government which has a considerable number of powers left to it?—Naturally, yes.

8757. Therefore, is it not true to say that diarchy may never be necessary or expedient in the Central Government?—At present the Central Government keeps so many powers at this first stage.

8758. What sort of power have you in your mind that the Central Government has still to keep that it will not keep eventually?—For instance, education: They have still a finger in that pie.

8759. Under the scheme of the Bill, and Mr. Feetham's Committee's Report, it is a very little finger, is it not?—There is a certain amount in irrigation, and so on. If that finger were abolished, my hesitation would also be diminished to that extent.

8760. With regard to women's suffrage, is it your idea that arrangements should be made for women in purdah to vote?—Special arrangements?

8761. Yes?—I do not know what in normal cases is done in the Law Courts, but I would not go further than that. I would not give them more protection than they have now in insisting on their property rights.

8762. What sort of matter which it is proposed to deal with by rule would you like to deal with in the Bill?—I meant more enfranchising powers.

8763. Supposing that on questions of that kind this Committee were to report upon the policy that ought to be embodied in the rule, and their report was accepted by both Houses of Parliament, would not that remove the vagueness of the Bill?—That would, and that is what I have put that in for as urging the very measure you suggest.

Sir Henry Craik.

8764. Would you apply this referendum to all-India matters as well as to Provincial matters?—At the first initial stage I would keep it to the Provinces.

8765. Perhaps the difficulties of a referendum over three millions of people might appal one?—No; it is not that, when we see how well public utility services go on over vast areas.

8766. You must recognise that the proportion of voters in the referendum in Switzerland is much larger than it would be in India?—Yes.

8767. You have only something like 1 or 2 per cent. of the population voting, and a large number even of those who vote are not literate in India?—Yes; and many perhaps would not vote.

8768. So that you would only have about 1 or 2 per cent. of the population voting in this referendum, and of that 1 per cent. about four-fifths would be illiterate?—Those are the facts of Indian life to-day.

8769. That makes a certain distinction between it and Switzerland, you admit?—If a man is intelligent enough to see all for which a candidate stands——

8770. Still, the mere fact that he is illiterate, and it would have to be explained to him, means it must go through some other person's hands?—They only put a cross in any country, either for or against.

8771. You think a question could be put so plainly that a cross would give a vote?—Well, the plank on which a man elects to stand.

8772. I understand you do not contemplate the application of it to all questions?—No. The whole Bill is tentative.

8773. Now about communal representation. While you are in favour of it, you admit the difficulties and evils which are pointed out so strongly in the Joint Report, paragraph 231?—Certainly, I would not have put those evils in that strong way.

8774. But you admit it is contrary to the general principles of popular representation? However desirable in this case it may be, it is inconsistent with that?—No; I do not think so. I cannot see the inconsistency.

8775. Then you rather differ from the Report?—On that particular point.

8776. What is your opinion as to the form which communal representation should take? Would you be disposed to accept the nomination as suggested in paragraph 232 of the Joint Report as a means of getting communal representation?—No.

8777. You are against that?—Yes; I am against nomination.

8778. Are you in favour of the principle of having a certain number of seats allotted, earmarked as it were, for each community?—For each community, yes.

8779. That they should have a number of seats, the occupants of which must belong to that community?—That is the practice of communal representation.

8780. But, of course, there is another, that instead of reserving a certain number of seats you should have special voting lists?—No; I want the seats.

8781. You want the seats; you do not want special voting lists?—No; the system of the Lucknow understanding.

8782. The form of communal representation your Highness would like is not nomination and not special electoral lists, but the reserving of a certain number of seats?—Yes. I am not in a position to say there may not be one or two small communities here and there which at first may need nomination; but it would be on such a small scale.

8783. And in every case reserved seats; in no case special lists?—That is so.

Sir J. D. Rees.

8784. Does the referendum which you recommend connote an increased electorate, or do you recommend it for the Southborough electorates, which you accept?—I accept the Southborough electorate, as I accept the whole Bill, as a practical compromise out of the difficulties of the present time.

8785. But in that case?—In that case I accept it for the electorate.

8786. The referendum is designed to avoid the necessity for frequent elections?—Yes; for general elections; and also people saying that a man has got in on certain planks and then used his powers for quite different and other objects. That is the great argument for it.

8787. Are the Mahrattas of Bombay generally Hindoo cultivators?—I have known Mahrattas of that class.

8788. What is the majority of them?—They would be cultivators—they must be.

8789. Are they widely different from the cultivators elsewhere. Is there any special difference attached to Mahrattas, economic or religious?—No; but the language is different, as you know.

8790. Is there any distinguishing characteristic, economic or religious?—I do not know much about the inner religious differences of Hindoos. I am not in a position to say.

8791. From your knowledge of Bombay, do you see anything distinctive about Mahrattas which would call for particular special representation?—Well, as a matter of fact, where I have lived all my life everybody is a Mahratta who is not a non-Mahratta.

8792 You do not see any particular reason?—No.

8793. Are they a particularly depressed class?—No; I should not have said so.

8794. Are they oppressed?—No; they are like all the other peasants.

8795. May I ask if, amongst the Mohammedans in India, it is at all a usual feature for the higher classes to ill-treat or oppress or treat with contempt the lower classes?—No.

8796. Are

8796. Are the Hindoos less kindly people than the Mohammedans?—No.

8797. Do you accept the picture, which has often been placed before the Committee, of Hindoo society being of such a character that the upper classes and castes—of course, there is that distinction—oppress the lower classes and castes?—No; not oppress.

8798. You do not accept it?—Personally, I do not like the idea of classes and castes; but that is a different thing.

8800. I will say non-Brahmin Hindoos?—There again, as far as I can see, that would include all kinds of Hindoos. Do you mean the depressed classes or the trading people?

Lord Sinha] There are 155 different classes, we are told.

Sir J. D. Rees.

8801. I gather you would answer my question in the negative. Do you approve of the special reservation of a large proportion of the general seats provided for non-Brahmin Hindoos?—No.

8802. With regard to the enfranchisement of women, without raising the question of principle at all, I know your opinions from your book and evidence. Have you explored Mohammedan opinion? Is your opinion as representative on this point as one would be inclined to think?—I will tell you one of the things which brought me early in life to think that the municipal suffrage should be given, namely, the complaints of purdah women and other Moslem ladies about the fact that they have no way of protecting their rights with regard to taxation.

8803. I was not on the principle. I wanted to ask you how far you had explored Mohammedan and Hindoo opinion. I specially excluded the merits of it?—I thought that was an answer, because if they were not in favour of it they would not have complained.

8804. Did you receive complaints from Mohammedans and Hindoos to any great extent?—No; but such people as I have seen in the course of my life have constantly complained.

8805. An objection has been raised to female suffrage on the ground of the purdah, that it would be difficult for purdah women to record their vote. I would like to ask you whether a widespread misapprehension does not exist in this country as to the extent to which the purdah prevails in India?—Yes, I think so.

8806. Is it not the case that purdah is a Mohammedan institution which has only been adopted out of imitation, or because the Mohammedans were the ruling race, by the rich amongst the Hindoos?—I do not admit the first part that purdah is a Mohammedan institution. It is a very old and ancient one in the East generally—in China. That is why I would not answer that without putting that reservation.

8807. Subject to that?—Subject to that I say it is by no means common amongst Hindoos except in certain parts of India.

8808. Is it not exceedingly uncommon?—Yes.

8809. Most rare?—Yes, except in Rajputana I have never seen it.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).] The Secretary of State wanted to ask one question with regard to the answers which you gave Sir Henry Craik.

Mr. Montagu.

8810. Perhaps I am wrong, but I am a little afraid there was some confusion between you and Sir Henry Craik. He put to you this question: Do you prefer communal representation by separate electorates or by the reservation of seats, and you replied, by the reservation of seats as in the Lucknow Compact?—Yes, by separate electorates, reserving the seats for them—the two together.

8811. Then let me repeat the question which I think Sir Henry Craik had in mind in order get it clear. There are two proposals for insuring minority representation; one is by maintaining the general electorate and reserving seats in a plural constituency?—Oh, no, the other way round. I beg your pardon; I am very much obliged to you.

8812. I thought some of your Mohammedan friends in India might object?—That is my conviction. I am very sorry I misunderstood.

Mr. Spoor.

8813. You state here in the first paragraph of your Memorandum, "Our future is linked with Great Britain," and you refer to the fact that for the last century and a half our English institutions have been moulding Indian political ideas?—Yes.

8814. Now it has been suggested—in fact I believe it has been stated by one witness—that it is regarded as an object of the Bill that British influence and British control should be in the course of time entirely eliminated from India, or that as a matter of fact that would be the tendency if this Bill is passed, that more and more British control and British influence and British prestige, I suppose, would decline. Do you share that opinion?—Not at all. I think it would improve the prestige as I understand it for righteousness and honour and justice, and that is the only prestige I would accept.

8815. But so far as British control is concerned, I take it you would admit it is inevitable that that would lessen as time went on?—Yes. That is the Preamble of the Bill, is it not?

8816. And that in consequence of that the tendency will be for India to develop her own political institutions rather than to continue to copy ours—that is necessarily copy ours?—Yes. As they saw where your institutions did not fit in in practice they would be modified.

8817. You seem also to be of opinion that even at the start the electorates should be made as wide as possible. Are you of opinion that the proposad electorate is in any degree satisfactory, even at the beginning?—As you know, a Commission was sent out; they studied things on the spot; they suggested this as a compromise. It is very difficult for one man who has not seen all the facts and so on, to say: "Well, I do not approve of this; go so much further," or "so much less."

8818. But in your opinion it is apparently desirable that the electorates should be extended?—As wide as possible.

8819. We have had it suggested in the course of the Committee's sittings that it might be possible to include a larger number of industrial workers?—Yes.

8820. From your experience of India, do you think that that is practicable?—I should welcome it if it were practicable.

8821. What is your opinion of that proposed method by which it could be done? One method proposed was that the basis of qualification for the franchise might be the earning capacity of workers. Do you think that is a practicable and desirable scheme?—I do not know enough about how it would work. I do not know how you could do it, in order to be able to reply, "Yes" or "No," but if it can be worked it would be a very good thing.

8822. You agree as to the desirability of including as many of the workmen as possible?—Yes; and as wide a franchise as possible in the interests of all concerned.

8823. In your fourth paragraph you speak of Bombay and the other two Presidencies, and you express the opinion that all distinctively provincial work could be safely left to the control of the electorate?—Yes.

8824. Would you recommend what has already been proposed here, that complete provincial autonomy might be tried in certain cases and diarchy in others, so that the two experiments could run side by side?—In Bombay I would welcome it. In Bombay, my own Province, I would say we are perfectly fit to run our own show, but that might raise opposition in other Provinces.

8826. With reference to Budget control, you are of opinion that the restrictions embodied in Clause 9 are unnecessarily unnecessarily severe so far as Bombay and Bengal are concerned?—Yes.

8827. Do you not think that complete Budget control throughout the Provinces is desirable if you are to have any really effective measure of self-government?—I am certain about Bombay that complete Budgetary liberty is necessary.

8828. I take it that what would apply to Bombay would apply with equal force to other Provinces that may have reached a similar standard?—Yes.

8829. With regard to the question which Lord Midleton referred to, and Mr. Montagu also, in paragraph 18 of your Memorandum, as to the lack of definiteness in the Bill, do you think that there is any degree of danger in that lack of definiteness? I mean so far as it is unsatisfying to Indian public opinion?—Mr. Montagu corrected it in suggesting that this Committee might make certain proposals to remove that lack of definiteness, and make it a little less skeleton, and if that came in the body of the Bill, that would, of course, remove that trouble.

8830. In the event of the suggestion which Mr. Montagu has made, and which some of us hope will be adopted, not being adopted, do you think there is any degree of danger in the fact that the Bill is merely a skeleton?—Yes; I think so. I think it would very much take off the advantages of the Bill.

8831. It would contribute to continued agitation in India?—Yes; it would be the cause of legitimate disapproval.

8832. There is only one last question; I hope Lord Midleton will allow it: It is with reference to your proposal for progress towards Federalism in India. You have great faith in the Federal system. In this scheme of yours would you agree to the inclusion of Burma in the present Bill? The Committee has been asked by Burma's delegates if Burma could not be included in the Bill. Having regard to your idea that in the course of time the tendency will be towards Federalism over the whole of India, do you think that at the present juncture it would be desirable that Burma should be included?—Well, of course, I am a strong believer that Burma ought to have been included from the first. Apart from Federalism, from the few occasions I have been in Burma that is the conclusion I came to long ago, that any attempt to separate Burma from India is a wrong step.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton.] We are very much obliged to your Highness for your evidence.

SIR THOMAS HOLLAND, K.C.S.I., K.C.I.E., D.SC., LL.D., F.R.S., is called; and Examined. as follows:—

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

8833. You have had a long experience in India on the Geological Survey?—Yes.

8834. And also you were temporarily a member for Commerce and Industry in the Governor-General's Council in 1919?—Yes.

8835. We shall be glad if you will give us any guidance as to the extent to which you think the proposals in the Bill may affect commerce and industry in India?—I should like, with your permission, to confine my attention to one very narrow subject, and that is the question of the transfer of industries.

My remarks will be based on the assumption that the scheme outlined in the Joint Report determines the general policy of reform; and I propose to examine only one special division of the practical issues from the point of view of the kind of official that has been described aptly as an "administrative engineer."

The administration of our revised industrial policy is a question to which I have had to give special attention as President of the Industrial Commission and of the Indian Munitions Board.

Probably the only controversial question is that following the recommendation of the Committee on the division of Functions, namely, that "development of industries" be included with the "transferred" provincial subjects.

The fourth despatch of the Government of India on Constitutional Reforms, dated 16th April, 1919, summarises the essential reasons, not for refusing, but for postponing, the transfer. I should not add to their authority by repeating these reasons, but wish briefly to refer to one important consideration which the Functions Committee failed fully to realise, namely, the kind and magnitude of the foundations that have yet to be laid before any appreciable progress can be made towards the development of modern technical industries.

I am not referring to the so-called cottage and village industries; if they could be separated conveniently from the others they might respond appreciably to patriotic local effort, and it should be one of the functions of the new provincial departments of industries to invite local effort in assisting these in their competition with the products of power-driven works; they have their art value, apart from the fact that they form the livelihood of many thousands of the depressed victims of the village money-lender.

But beside these cottage industries we are faced with the urgent necessity, from an economic and even a military point of view, of pushing ahead more energetically with the preliminary prospecting work necessary to lay a substantial foundation for modern technical industries. The danger and the great cost of being even temporarily isolated was realised by India during the war.

It will be seen from the fourth chapter of the Industrial Commission's Report that at present in India we are unable to produce more than a small fraction of the necessary materials, and thus a much smaller fraction of the articles essential for the maintenance of ordinary civilised activities.

We make one form of ordinary structural, but none of the special, steels, or of the essential varieties of ferro-alloys; we have recently produced copper on a small scale, but we smelt no zinc, tin, aluminium or tungsten. We manufacture a small number of heavy chemicals, but on economic lines very few of the numerous varieties of medicines, drugs and dyes that are imported. We export raw rubber to the value of one and a half millions annually, and import rubber goods worth more than a million. We export raw hides and skins worth ten millions, and import leather goods worth a million.

Any technologist will realise the state of a country that makes no nails, screws, steel springs, iron chains, wire ropes, steel plates or sheets, machine tools and internal combustion engines.

This is but a small fraction of our deficiencies, but it is sufficient to form a mental conception of the kind as well as the degree of development that is urgently necessary, and it is sufficient to indicate the nature of the foundation work necessary before any appreciable progress can be made. We have yet to create and organise the technical staff, build up a body of efficient technically trained artisans, and undertake an enormous amount of research work on our raw materials, which are largely the property of the State. We have not even made a reconnaissance survey of our hydro-electric power resources.

It would not be fair to the Reform Scheme to thrust this heavy task, which is largely the result of our own sins of omission, on to untried shoulders. One of the greatest difficulties connected with the Reform Scheme in any case will be to find capable administrators, for administration is an art requiring an apprenticeship as much as carpentry or house-breaking.

Our system of education hitherto has tended more to handicap than to qualify Indians to tackle administrative puzzles in the utterly unfamiliar field of commercial technology. In other branches (with which Indian leaders are already, to some extent. familiar) it is proposed to transfer to the control of Ministers ready-made and working administrative machinery, with a trained personnel and established record record of experience. But for the programme laid down by the Industrial Commission we have, so far, no precedents, few data and little staff. To complicate an experiment by introducing two uncertain factors at once may be political, but it is not scientific.

Local patriotic effort, with abundant public funds, but without experience of technical and commercial pitfalls, will merely reproduce on a grander scale the disasters which followed the swadeshi fever of 1907.

It is wise to remember that new Ministers, for many obvious reasons, will be over-anxious to see early results, and it will require a stiff back to work without distraction at the foundations whilst the uninformed public are shouting for a sight of the completed edifice. They are already wondering why the Commission's Report has not yet been followed by the industrial millennium.

Being the victim selected to undertake the thankless task of foundation laying, I would gladly thrust some of my responsibilities on to Provincial Ministers if I could conscientiously do so. Non-interference with transferred subjects would be an evergreen excuse for slow progress, an impervious shield against critical attacks; but we are expected to assist India "well and truly," not to manufacture plausible excuses.

It is obvious that there is much spade work to be done before we can fairly saddle the new Ministers with the responsibility for the entirely novel policy of industrial development. Policy without a trained staff is as useless as strategy without an army. When we have done something more substantial to make up for past neglect than publish the Report of a Commission, we shall be able to hand over to Ministers, then more familiar with official machinery, a working organisation. I hope that will be soon.

I should like to confine my remarks to that one phase of the proposals of the Functions Committee.

Sir J. D. Rees.

8836. May I ask whether you see any reason to fear that the passing of this Bill will in any way prejudice the foreign capital invested in India?—Judgment on that question involves a large number of discordant considerations, but I should say on the whole, no.

8837. Has the knowledge that the Bill is on the way prejudiced them in any way? Have not shares rather maintained their position or risen of late?—There has been a distinct tendency lately towards industrial expansion in India. Shares, whether of European firms or good Indian companies, have risen in value, or rather they have risen in price, and I think generally the Bill has had no depressing effect whatever on either the industrial or the commercial outlook. At the same time one has to remember that there are certain conditions due to the war which have encouraged the outlay of money in India; possibly to some extent the economic conditions in this country have favoured the development of companies in India instead of here. But I think, in spite of those, we are quite justified in assuming that the Bill has had no depressing effect whatever on the desire of Europeans in India to extend their commercial and industrial operations.

8838. I presume, as regards gold mines in Mysore and coal mines in Hyderabad and so on, it could have no effect? There is no reason why it should have any?—No.

Mr. Montagu.

8839. I should like to ask you a question or two about your evidence from the point of view first of the division between Provincial subjects and all-India subjects. Leaving the question of transfer out, you would regard industrial development as being in the main a central subject, would you not?—The general policy is that the Central Government will be responsible to fill in the gaps, the obvious gaps, in the skeleton that will be left by local effort. Only certain questions will be taken up by local effort. A fewer number will be taken up by private enterprise, only those, of course, that offer immediate and certain profits. It will be the business of the Central Government to see that that skeleton is filled in.

8840. Now, supposing, therefore, that we can confine the question of transfer only to that part of industrial development which will remain under your scheme Provincial—the general policy, as you have said, is to be Central—taking only the Provincial part of it, why exactly would that be more difficult to work with a Governor and Minister than it would be with a Governor and Executive Council?—I have tried to explain in my preliminary note that the first thing is to provide the staff and the organisation. With the Executive Council and the present machinery of Government we have a staff to draw on which will be more or less accustomed to administrative methods. It will be the easier to build up a staff under their control during the next three to five years than it would be if we handed over the control of the subject to untried Ministers. I think there is one small matter that has to be taken into account, too, and that is the question of recruiting. It is not easy under any circumstances to get young men to go into a new service that has no traditions, and so far as they know is of quite doubtful permanency. It will be still more difficult to get young men to take up work of this sort if in addition to the service being absolutely new the conditions of control are entirely novel, and from the point of view of a kind that they would look upon with a certain amount of hesitation.

8841. I thought you told the Committee earlier that you hoped the time would very soon come when you could hand this over to Ministers as a going concern?—Yes.

8842. Therefore the man you recruit now will very soon have to accustom himself to work under a Minister. Is it not better for you to do it from the outset?—No; I find no difficulty in getting young men to like their work in India when they go there, but a great difficulty in getting young men to go to India. As soon as they have realised the conditions of work in India there is no difficulty in getting them to retain their interest in it.

8843. According to your idea you will be able to assure him when you recruit him that he will not have to serve under a Minister?—No; I should warn him that the subject will ultimately possibly be transferred. I think you could do nothing else.

8844. Let us assume in the alternative that your suggestion is accepted by Parliament, and the development of industries, in so far as it is a provincial subject, is put in the custody of the members of the Executive Council acting with the Governor. You have no guarantee, of course, that the gentleman in charge of the Development of Industry Portfolio will not be an Indian member of the Executive Council?—No.

8845. And you have no guarantee at all that that gentleman will ever have held any other office or have any knowledge of administration?—If he is an official he certainly will have had other experience.

8846. If he is an official; but of all the existing Executive Councillors in India I am right in saying, I think, that there is only one Indian gentleman who has been an official?—That is so, possibly—I have not gone over the list. I have not the slightest doubt, as I said in my note, that this is going to be one of our most serious difficulties, to get Indians who are really experienced in official administration, and we will have to put up with that difficulty for some years.

8847. You know that in this country any number of men find themselves at the head of departments who have never had any official experience before?—Yes.

8848. And you know they find salvation in the fact that the gentlemen employed in the department are men who have had administrative experience?—Yes; and most of the heads of departments have been through the sixth form of a Public School.

8849. That does not invariably follow either; it certainly does not apply to myself.

Lord Sinha.

8850. I think you expressed an opinion before, on that informal Committee on which we both sat, that in the present state of finance in India the development of all the larger industries will really depend upon the Central Government. I may be wrong, but that is the impression in my mind?—Yes; I think I made that remark, and it is possibly correct; but I cannot form any clear idea at present as to whether there will be enough money available among the local Governments, or whether, in fact, the money will be absolutely necessary. What one wants in the development of industry is not for the Government to pour out money, but to be quite sure that private enterprise can be judiciously fostered. That requires, on the part of the Government that does it, something more than mere money. It sometimes, for instance, wants the Government to be in a position to place large orders continuously for a period. The Central Government can more often arrange for co-operation among the Local Governments to assist in that respect than any one Local Government can do. Also with regard to many industries it would not be judicious on the part of a Local Government to advance money, even if they had it, for industry or for the development of an industry that is of only partial value to that particular Province. And for that reason I think that many of the so-called large industries, by which I mean industries covering the interests of more than one Province, can better be assisted by the Central Government than by any Local Government.

8851. With regard to this, of course, there will be no question of reserving or transferring under the scheme of the Bill?—No.

8852. Those remain with the Central Government?—Yes.

8853. With regard to the rest of them, would you agree with the conclusion to which the informal Committee of the India Office came, viz., that the development of industries, in cases where such development by the central authority is declared by order of the Governor-General in Council to be expedient in the public interest, should be a central subject?—Yes. I would agree with that proposal.

8854. Then with regard to the others, that is to say industries other than those covered by what I have mentioned will be Provincial?—Yes.

8855. And, so far as those were concerned, would there be any objection, to your mind, to their transfer to the popular minister?—Only for the reason which I have given as a reason for postponing the transfer. I have no insuperable objection to the transfer, and I am hoping that foundation work will be done as quickly as possible to enable the conditions to be ripe for transfer. As to that, that will largely depend upon the speed with which the India Office deals with proposals from India.

8856. Of course, whether it is transferred or not transferred, the Minister or the Member of Council would have necessarily to rely largely upon expert assistance?—Yes.

8857. The Directors of Industries, or whatever you may choose to call them, and the staff, which you rightly point out, is so essential?—Yes.

8858. If the Minister or the Member of Council was inexperienced, he would be intelligent enough to know that he must rely upon expert advice, if things are to go all right—at least, one would hope so?—There is as good reason to expect they will go all right with a minister as with anyone else when he has got the right kind of staff to advise him. One is of course aware of the fact that a Minister who has to hold his position at the will of the people may have certain pressure brought to bear on him with regard to local industries in a way that would not be possible to a permanent official, but that is a matter which is purely local. It affects this country and our colonies.

8859. Therefore, it would not be an insuperable objection in the case of an Indian Province?—No.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

8860. Have you read the Report of the Crewe Committee about the proposal to establish an Indian High Commissioner to buy stores for the Indian Government in this country?—Yes.

8861. Does that have your support?—Yes, on the understanding that the first effort is made to buy the stores in India itself. If we have a corresponding department in India, which intercepts all demands for stores and makes a first attempt to raise those stores in India, it will be a great advantage to have some agency at home which will purchase the residue and generally advise the Spending Departments in India as to where they can make better bargains.

8862. You take the view that at the present moment the Indian Government and Provincial Governments buy a great many things in this country which could be made equally well in India, and which would help the industrial development of India?—I think that the Stores Rules of the Government of India, published in 1913, contain a good deal of pious swadeshi sentiments, but they have been of absolutely no value, for the reason that a local official wants to get his stores as safely and as easily as possible. He does not want to be responsible for the work of inspection and valuation. He is generally late in sending in his indents, as he is always overworked, and he finds it much easier to take the priced catalogue of a European firm and make out his indent from that, and send it to the India Office Stores Department. He is certainly well treated as far as quality of material is concerned, but the result of the working of those rules has been that we have had no real encouragement of Indian industries from Government. It is only during the war, when we were forced to get our materials in India, that we found, one by one, that we could get things made in India, and that we could purchase things in India which previously we had never dreamed of being able to do.

8863. Would you like to say anything to this Committee about the present position of the Indian Budget? Do you think that greater freedom—greater statutory freedom even—should be given to the Government of India in regard to its fiscal policy?—With regard to its fiscal policy, I think I can only speak with very great prejudice, because I have not considered the question from this side; but frequently one feels in India, looking at things from the point of view of Indian interests, that we want, and we are always longing for, more fiscal freedom.

8864. There is among the colleagues you have worked with who have taken an interest in India industries a strong desire for what is called fiscal autonomy?—I think so—fiscal autonomy with certain reservations. Obviously it would be unwise for India, or any other constituent of the Empire, to go ahead with a fiscal policy without control by the Secretary of State, having in view the Imperial interests of the Empire as a whole.

Mr. Bennett.

8865. Does your objection to the transfer of industrial development to Ministers extend also to the transfer of that subject to the Provincial Governments?—No; I am in favour of the greatest freedom of action on the part of the Provincial Governments preparing a way for the transfer.

8866 Then you do not altogether agree with the view taken by Sir John Hewett the day before yesterday, when he said that the Central Government cannot divest itself of responsibility for the industrial progress of the country. I do not know whether you have read his evidence?—No, I have not.

8867. He went on to show how in the case of the Tata Iron and Steel Company's enterprise it would have been impossible for a Local Government to have put it through. But did he not do himself a certain injustice in that, inasmuch as at the inception of the scheme and in its early years he himself, as Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces, energetically and sympathetically helped it?—He probably did, but the Tata Iron and Steel Company's scheme has nothing now to do with the Central Provinces.

8868. No, but at its inception?—That was an idea which was given up. The scheme as finally matured developed in quite a different Province.

8869. I mentioned this as illustrating the idea that it is important that the Provincial Governments shall have large powers in regard to industrial development. You agree to that?—Yes. I do not think that what I say is wholly inconsistent with the remarks of Sir John Hewett which you have read. I still feel that the Central Government is responsible for the general industrial policy, and, as I said before, is responsible for filling up the gaps.

8870. You would leave as much initiative in these matters to the Local Governments as possible?—Yes

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton.)] Thank you.

(The Witness is directed to withdraw.)

(After a short adjournment.)

8871. Sir

SIR MURRAY HAMMICK, K.C.S.I., is called in; and Examined.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

8871. Sir Murray, you served for a long time in the Madras Presidency?—Yes.

8872. And you are now on the Council of India?—Yes.

The following are the questions with the answers already submitted by the Witness:—

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India? and, if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"?—And do you generally accept the proposition contained in the Preamble?—My answers to the questions are: (a) I accept the proposition announced in Parliament. (b) I understand the expression "responsible government" to mean an Executive Government responsible to a Legislative Council, which is elected on a popular basis.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the Provinces involves the establishment in Provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority (Clause 6)?—Yes.

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the Executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—(a) Yes. I think that, to a certain extent, Provincial Legislatures should control the action and policy of the Executive. (b) They have at present an undefined power in this direction, which is considerably more effective than is generally thought. I imagine that every Provincial Government at present is very anxious, as far as is possible, to meet the wishes expressed in the Legislative Council. Its power is very considerable. It can very much delay Government measures which require legislation, and it can and does draw the attention of the Government to existing grievances.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of government in the Provinces in which at present the Provincial Executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes?—Yes. As long as the Secretary of State and Parliament are responsible for peace and order in India and its protection from attack outside, Provincial Executives must in these matters remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and be in a position to enforce their wishes.

5. If you accept the propositions stated under questions 1 to 4, do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view?—I see much force in the objections that have been put forward to the dual form of government; but I have been unable to find any better way of securing what is the aim of the proposed reforms. I see no other workable method by which Ministers and the Legislatures can be made responsible within certain limits for a part of the administration.

6. If you have any other method to suggest, does it (i) provide possibilities of advance by stages, and facilitate the "progressive realisation of responsible government," and, if it does, in what way (Clause 2, 3, etc.)? and (ii) does it afford means of judgment (a) to the electors, and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress of the success or failure in results of the control exercised by the Legislature and those who represent it in the Executive?—I have no other method to suggest.

7. If you consider a dual form of government acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail the modification of which you regard as necessary? If so, what are those points, and what modifications would you suggest?—The practical effect of the Bill will depend to a great extent upon the rules framed under it. I have not seen any draft of the rules. I have no modification in the Bill to suggest.

8. In particular, do you think (i) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure," i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their Department by the Governor, or if they fail to retain the confidence of the Legislature (Clause 3 (1))? (ii) That the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities (Clause 3 (3))? (iii) That the Executive Council should in all Provinces normally consist of one official European and the Legislatre Clause 3 (1))? (ii) That the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council (Clause 7 (4))?—I agree as to (i), (ii) and (iv). I am doubtful whether the work of the Executive Council in Madras can be efficiently conducted by two members; but I think, to begin with, two members may be tried.

9. Referring back to questions 2, 3 and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the Legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed generally by Clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and legislative powers as (i) suitable, or as (ii) unnecessarily severe, or as (iii) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament (Clause 9)?—I have no suggestions to make. I consider the limitations imposed by Clause 9 generally necessary and adequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes to Parliament.

10. In particular, (i) do you think that the Legislature should have power, with whatever limitations, to vote supplies (Clause 9 (2))? (ii) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—Yes. I think the plan of Grand Committees the best that can be devised to meet the necessity which exists that the Government shall have power to secure essential legislation.

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to Provincial Legislative Councils over Provincial Governments?—Yes. I think it is of importance that the Government of India should remain for the present without the dualism which it is proposed to introduce into the Local Governments.

12. Do you agree that it is advisable, none the less, to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature (Clause 16)?—Yes.

13. Do you accept the plan of a bicameral legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential (Clauses 14, 15 and 16)?—I accept the plan proposed.

14. Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature (Clause 20 (3) and (4))? Or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities?—Yes.

15. Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council? If not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest?—Yes.

16. Do you think that the development of Provincial autonomy on the one hand, and of self-government in the Provinces on the other, involves any modification of the provisions of Sections 2, 33, and

45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23)?—I agree with the modifications made in the Bill as regards the sections referred to.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examination?—I agree that a periodical examination of progress by an independent authority is advisable. I am inclined to think that ten years is too short a period, and would prefer to see the time extended. Ten years is a very short period for development, and I doubt whether much will be gathered within that time.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—I have no remarks to offer.

19. Have you any observations to offer on the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs?—I agree generally with the conclusions of the Committees held under the Chairmanship of Lord Southborough. I am, however, of opinion that it is advisable, if possible, to provide for the better representation of the non-Brahmin castes in Madras, and am in favour of limiting the number of seats to be held by Brahmins in the Council. I am also in favour of giving larger representation than is proposed for the outcaste section. This can only be done by nomination. As regards the Committee on the Home Administration, I have expressed my views in the evidence I gave before that Committee. I am not in favour of making any radical changes at present in the constitution or powers of the Council of the Secretary of State; but I consider that when the next examination is made into Indian affairs special attention should then be given to the matter, and I think that then, probably, it will be found advisable to alter the present arrangements.

8873. You have been good enough to furnish us with some answers to our questions, and I notice you say that you see much force in the objections which have been put forward to the dual form of government, but you have been unable to find any better way of securing what is the aim of the proposed reforms. Which in your opinion is the best method? Is it better to give the Legislative Councils a partial control of the whole administration or would you prefer to give them the complete control of a certain number of subjects subject to the veto of the Governor?—I think the second is the preferable course, to give them complete control of a certain number of subjects. That is the only feasible way of obtaining the end we have in view, I think.

8874. There would be less duality if we could find some means of securing the complete responsibility of Ministers over a certain number of subjects?—Yes.

8875. You think the plan of Grand Committees the best which could be devised, but are you clear that it is desirable to have any form of Grand Committee? In your experience of India, if a popularly elected body is to be checked, would you prefer that the check came direct from the Governor or that it should be filtered through a Grand Committee in the manner proposed by the Bill?—I am strongly in favour of the Grand Committee procedure; I should not at all like to see the direct action of the Governor to overrule the Legislative Council without the intermediate body of the Grand Committee for the matter to filter through.

8876. Looking to the position of the officers under the Governor, do you think it advisable that they should have to fight the same measure in the Legislative Council and to fight it again in the Grand Committee, especially if it happens to be an unpopular measure?—I see no objection.

8877. They would be forced to sit in both?—Yes.

8878. Do you think it fair to ask them to go through both those stages before the Governor intevenes?—I think so. My own experience in India is that the more you can allow people to argue and talk the better.

8879. As regards the Governor himself, it is contemplated under the Bill that he may be Chairman of the Legislative Council, or that he should designate somebody else for that post; do you think it desirable that the Governor who is to be the umpire should have to preside over the Legislative Council?—I am inclined to think that under the new scheme the Governor had better not preside over the Legislative Council. I do not feel certain about it, but I have seen occasions on which I think it would have been better, even in my time, if the Governor had not been in the chair, and I think in future there will be more occasions of that kind, and therefore I should think it would be better that he should not be there.

8880. You think ten years too short a period; what period would you suggest?—I should think fifteen would be better.

8881. If a considerable advance was made now, you think it would require some fifteen years for the electors fully to realise all their responsibilities?—I think so.

8882. From your experience would you say that anything in the nature of a referendum to the electorate would be understood at the present time?—Most certainly not—I do not think so at all.

8883. The electorates are in embryo, and should be educated; is that your point?—Yes.

8884. I see that you are in favour of a better representation of the non-Brahmin castes in Madras and of limiting the number of seats to be held by Brahmins on the Council. I gather that you concur with the non-Brahmins that, despite their great numbers, they would not be able to hold their own with the Brahmins; is that your view?—I do not think at first they will; I am very strongly of that opinion.

8885. Having migrated to the India Office I should like to ask you this question: Do you find the India Office procedure as faulty and as tardy as many people in India have represented it to be and believe it to be?—No; I do not think so at all. I am not of that opinion. I do not think when I was in India we ever complained of the slowness of the India Office; our complaint was very often of the slowness of the Government of India, and I do not think myself the accusation was often made when I was in India that the India Office was slow in getting measures through.

8886. Do you think that if the points on which the India Office, especially as regards finance, have to exercise a detailed control were reduced and the procedure was somewhat simplified the India Office might be purged of any difficulties which have beset it up to now?—Yes.

8887. As to the manner in which the questions are discussed and presented, you regard that favourably?—Yes.

Mr. Montagu.

8888. How long do you think it will be before the Brahmins in Madras will be asking for communal representation because they cannot get a fair representation in competition with the non-Brahmins?—Very many years hence, I think.

8889-90. In other words, how long do you think exceptional arrangements for securing the representation of non-Brahmins will be necessary?—I should say certainly until the next revisionary body goes out to examine the question.

8891. When you felt in India that the Government of India was slow, of course you had no means of knowing whether they were referring home or not, and waiting for decisions at home?—No.

8892. Is it not, therefore, fair to say that the only way of getting speedier administration in India is to minimise the references home on the one hand and from the Provinces to the Government of India on the other?—Oh, yes; I quite agree with that.

Sir Henry Craik.

8893. To what do you attribute the slowness of the Indian Government, which is a constant complaint?—I think one reason is that they have to consult so many bodies in India. I mean the number of Provincial Governments is so large and the variety of opinions they receive is so great that it naturally takes time in arriving at any conclusion.

8894. The general complaint now is rather of the slowness of the Government of India than of the slowness of the India Office?—Quite so; I think the Government of India did not do their work expeditiously for one reason, that although I am speaking without much much knowledge of the procedure of the Government of India, they did too much through their large Council. I think the individual members might have more authority than they have.

8895. It is done too much by Minute?—Too much by Minute.

8896. Instead of meeting and settling the thing?—Yes.

8897. The system of written Minutes exists, I suppose, very much more largely in India than in the ordinary public work administration here?—Very much more.

8898. That is to a certain extent necessary, because they are not so immediately in touch with one another, they cannot go and see one another and talk to one another?—No; and another reason for Minuting in India is that it is more necessary there to leave a record; officers are perpetually changing, and it is very necessary to leave a full record of discussions which occur on Government matters.

8899. You think, with regard to communal representation, the soundest method of obtaining it would be by nomination?—I think it the only sound method as regards the outcast population; but I do not think as regards the non-Brahmin castes the best way would be by nomination. I am inclined to think the best way would be by some kind of communal representation.

8900. Probably by proportional representation, or something of that kind?—Yes; you might make it proportional.

8901. Not assigning certain seats which must be filled necessarily my non-Brahmins?—Yes; I am almost inclined to think that. I think it will not be safe unless you insist upon a certain number of seats being reserved and held by non-Brahmins.

Sir J. D. Rees.

8902. Sir Murray, may I ask you this: You say in your Memorandum, on the first page, that the power of the Legislative Council is very considerable, and that it can very much delay Government measures which require legislation. Can it not now prevent Government legislation?—Oh, yes.

8903. It can actually prevent it?—Yes.

8905. You say at the end of your Paper that you think "It is advisable, if possible, to provide for the better representation of the non-Brahmin castes in Madras," and upon that I should like to ask this: Is it because you think that the Brahmins in office on the Councils have been unjust to the other castes, or oppressive, that you have that opinion?—No.

8907. Are they not the head of the Hindoo system?—They are.

8908. And are not all the people they control in the Hindoo system?—Yes, no doubt.

8909. Is it unnatural that the leaders of the Hindoo system should have the chief control of the Hindoo system?—It is quite natural that they should desire it, but I think it very undesirable that they should continue to have the control that they have now.

8910. You think it is too much?—Yes.

8911. Even for the natural leaders of the people?—Yes, I think so.

8912. At any rate your opinion is not founded, I understand, on the alleged fact that they habitually ill-treat the lower castes?—No.

8913. Or have any hostility to them?—I think they have hostility to them; they are out for their own benefit. I cannot bring instances of individual injustice, but I know from personal experience that their superiority and their attitude in the districts make them extremely unpopular with the great number of non-Brahmins.

8914. Are they more unpopular, for instance, than any superior class, like the landlords in Ireland, or any other particular class you may instance?—Perhaps they are not so unpopular as landlords in Ireland.

8915. What I want to get at is this: Does this being out for their own interests, as you say, amount to any more than the usual self-interest motive which is common to all human beings? As the case is put here it has been rather distinctly put upon the basis that the other castes require protection against the Brahmins. Would you put it in that form on your Madras experience?—Yes, I should almost put it in that form. What has happened is, I imagine, that in times past they were content to be ruled by the Brahmins; then we came in, and they have looked to us to keep the balance more equalised between the people there. They have come to look upon us now as the great power—and now certainly I am speaking only for Madras—to which they can always appeal to obtain fair treatment by the Brahmins. What I feel is that under the new system they will lose that confidence that they have got now; they will find they have not got it, and a state of feeling will arise which will be extremely dangerous to public safety and public comfort.

8916. Have not our chief agents, we being in the position you describe, been Brahmins?—Very often; but they have had over them always the very careful eye of a European.

8917. Do you think there has been also, to take the other side of the question, a corporate collective anti-Brahmin feeling in the country—in Madras for instance?—I think it has developed since I left; it did not exist when I left, I think, but as far as I can gather from the present state of things there is a very strong feeling which is spreading rapidly.

8918. It is new?—I think it is new.

8919. Would you attribute that to the exploitation of this natural jealousy on behalf of political ends?—Partly.

8920. To any great extent?—No, I do not think so; I think it is attributable to the fact that they have suspected that under these coming reforms they are going to lose the security they have now in the autocratic administration they have got under us, and they are afraid that when that power has gone which we have now their chance will be less. That has brought together a number of non-Brahmins to take up the attitude which they are doing now.

8921. You think that the Brahmin representation should be limited politically in the same way that it is administratively in the Madras Presidency, where you provide against the complete——?—I think so to a certain extent.

8922. And for very much the same reasons?—Yes.

8923. With regard to the slowness to which my Right Honourable colleague on my left referred, is it not the fact that the Government of India, the Local Governments in India, make the most extraordinarily careful enquiries before they take any serious legislative or administrative step?—Yes, certainly.

8924. Does not that necessarily take a very long time?—Yes, it does.

8925. Is it desirable that it should be altogether curtailed?—No, I do not think it is.

8926. Would you say that the charge of dilatory procedure was really established then against the administration of the Governments in India?—I think it is very much exaggerated.

8927. Do you see any objection to transferring all industrial development to the Provincial Governments?—No.

8928. Has not the Madras Government been very generally extremely interested and anxious to forward that?—Very much so for many years past. It has been ahead of most of the Local Governments in that matter for several years past, I think.

8929. But the checks have proceeded from above?—Rather—not only from India, but from the India Office.

8930. You are one of the members of the Secretary of State's Council, and expressed in the beginning a general approval of the reforms?—Yes

8931. Therefore, you are not in sympathy, I presume, with the attitude of the Madras Government which was expressed?—No.

8932. I should like to ask you on that, as one who was a member of the Madras Government, when an opinion is invited from a local administration on an important measure such as this, is it usual in such cases for the opinion sent up to consist merely of the personal opinions of the ministers of the Government, or do they take into account, and, if so, to what extent, public opinion, educated or otherwise?—In a matter of this sort, of course, they must have referred to and consulted many officers under them, but then it was for the Governor and the three members of Council to make up their own minds, and I suppose they were unanimous in sending on their views. I mean because a certain number of the public objected to this there was no reason for the Madras Government to say so; they had made up their own minds and they stated their opinion.

8934. Sir Murray, we have had, I think, abundant evidence here as to the demand in India for these reforms; do you think this Bill will satisfy in any real degree this Indian demand?—I am afraid not.

8935. Do you think it is desirable that the Bill should be in any particular way strengthened in order to meet that demand in the interests of peace?—No.

8936. For example, you say here in answer to Question 11 that you think it is of importance that the Government of India should remain for the present without the dualism which it is proposed to introduce into the Local Governments. Do you not think an increase of any representation in the Central Government would not only be in harmony with the pronouncement, but would be desirable from every point of view?—No, I do not think so; I do not think it will stop future agitation, and I do not think it is a good thing in itself.

8937. Do you think the promise of the pronouncement will be in any way fulfilled without increase of representation to the Central Government?—Yes, quite, I think.

8938. As regards this Question 17, you think the period of ten years is too short for this periodical examination of progress. I do not know whether you are aware that we had a distinguished Indian here this morning, who suggested that, as a matter of fact, ten years was much too long?—No, I did not know it, and I entirely disagree with him. What I mean is that I think it will take two or three years for any considerable mass of the people to understand anything about these reforms at all; certainly, speaking of Madras, the people of the country will not realise in the slightest bit until they have had two or three years' experience of them what is being done, and after that it will take certainly another eight or ten years for them to realise what an election means and what issues are at stake in the election. At present, even in the Madras City Corporation, each election shows that the policy of the candidate has nothing whatever to do with his chance of getting votes; it is purely personal, and it will be the same throughout the country for two or three elections at least. I have not the slightest doubt that some time you may develop a public feeling of the kind you have in this country, but it does not exist at present, and it will take much more than ten years to cultivate it.

8939. Is it not the fact that there has been extraordinary political development in the country during the last ten years, and more particularly during the last five years?—Yes, no doubt, but I think it is only skin deep, and I do not think it has reached the people in any sense of the word, as I understand by "people."

8940. Having regard to the likelihood, that not only in India but in world politics we are likely to have changes very rapidly, and I think the pace is being accelerated all round, would it not be wiser to fix a shorter period? Ten years, after all, is a long time today?—I am afraid I do not look upon ten years as a long time at all; I look upon ten years in the development of a big change, such as this is, as a remarkably short time, and I think ten years——

8941. You prefer a conservative estimate?—Yes.

8942. Just one more question with regard to this representation of the non-Brahmins. You seemed to suggest in your answer to Sir John Rees that there exists in India a real fear of the Brahmin tyranny: Is that so?—Yes, I think so.

8943. You think that, whatever may have obtained in the past, that fear—if I may so put it—is not diminishing?—I think it is an increasing one. I think it is increasing at the present moment.

Mr. Bennett.

8944. Sir Murray Hammick, have you found in India, in your own service, instances of anti-Brahmin obsession; men with a sustained bias against the Brahmin and a fear of the Brahmin, alleged or real?—Yes, I think I have.

8945. These men are rather given to exaggerate the power of the Brahmin and his capacity to oppress, are they not?—Well, I think they are given to exaggerate his desire or wish to oppress; but I do not think they exaggerate his power, because I think his power is enormous.

8946. You would think it right that anyone seeking to arrive at a just conclusion with regard to this problem should be on his guard against this extravagant antipathy to the Brahmins?—Yes.

8947. When you expressed your belief in the necessity of communal representation in order to safeguard the interests of the non-Brahmin communities, had you in mind the recent election to the Madras Council, in which five non-Brahmins captured seats? You had not forgotten that?—No; I had not forgotten that.

8948. Has that conditioned or in any degree modified your views?—No.

8949. As to the ten years. Was it considerably less than ten years after the introduction of the Morley-Minto reforms that the Government of India and the Secretary of State at home recognised that another and an important step forward should be taken?—Yes.

8950. It was considerably less?—I think it was.

8951. I think one might fairly say that at the end of five years it was held that a new step would be necessary?—I did not think myself at the end of five years it would be necessary; but it was certainly less than ten.

8952. The feeling began to prevail at that time; it was seriously recognised?—Yes.

8953. Under those circumstances, do you not think that ten years will be a sufficient interval to elapse before the inquiry is made into the working of these reforms?—I speak with considerable hesitation on the subject; but I really think that to give these reforms a fair chance this is a much greater leap in the dark than the Morley-Minto reforms were; a much greater change in the condition of things, and it should be well understood in India that for ten years, or fifteen years, no change would be possible. I think fifteen years is a sufficient period, and after fifteen years the matter would be inquired into. I think the shorter you make the period the greater the agitation you will get for change.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

8954. What is your present proposal with regard to non-Brahmin representation? What percentage of seats would you give them? I understand you would guarantee them a certain percentage of seats in the Legislative Council?—Yes. I have not really studied the matter. You would not guarantee the Brahmins a fixed number, but you would guarantee the rest.

8955. I mean that you would guarantee to the non-Brahmins a certain number of seats; what proportion?—I should think something like 33 per cent.

8956. One-third of the Hindoo general constituencies?—Yes.

8957. You think that would satisfy the reasonable demands of the non-Brahmins?—I do not think it would satisfy anybody, because I do not think anything you do will satisfy anybody out there. You will have complaints from all sides, but I think that ought to satisfy them.

8958. Nothing

8958. Nothing short of communal representation for the Brahmins would satisfy the non-Brahmins in Madras—or rather the anti-Brahmins?—The anti-Brahmins I do not think would be satisfied with anything except exclusive representation. They will not be satisfied at seeing a Brahmin get a chance at all, which is absurd. Their attitude is, I admit, most unreasonable at the present time.

8959. Now, I see, you say in answer to Question 19, "I am in favour of giving larger representation than is proposed for the outcast section. This can only be done by nomination." Do the outcasts have caste panchayats of their own?—Yes.

8961. Have these caste panchayats got any knowledge at all beyond their own village?—Absolutely none.

8962. So they would not know a more educated outcast man in another village?—Probably not.

8963. In Madras there are outcasts in each village?—Yes.

8964. Or are there whole villages of them?—Yes; there are whole villages consisting of outcasts; there are complete pariah villages, and every village has a pariah quarter, and into that pariah quarter no Brahmin can enter without befoulment.

8966. You think there would be no difficulty in the Council owing to the presence of nominated pariahs?—I do not think so—not the educated class; there are a certain number of educated outcasts whose presence will not be objected to in the Council.

8967. I turn for a moment to the Committee on Home Administration; you favour Sir James Brunyate's proposals as against the proposals of the majority of the Committee?—Yes; I do.

8968. Do you support his actual concrete proposals?—No; not altogether.

8969. Is there any important particular you would like to bring to our attention in which you differ from him?—I do not think so; on the main proposals he has made I am in agreement with him certainly

Lord Sinha.

8970. Sir Murray Hammick, with regard to this dual system of government, do you agree that it is advisable that the two sections should be in as close association as possible for the purposes of consultation?—Yes, certainly.

8971. That each should if necessary only decide by vote amongst themselves over its own subjects, but ordinarily all subjects should be jointly deliberated upon; is that your view?—Certainly.

8972. May I take it that your view is also that the purse ought to be joint?—Yes.

8973. It ought to be a joint purse, the funds being allocated yearly, or, if necessary, for a longer time between the two sections of the Government?—Yes.

8974. As regards this question of communal representation in Madras, the non-Brahmin caste Hindoos are divided amongst themselves into a very large number of castes, are they not?—Yes.

8975. Would it be possible to form these into one electorate?—I think so.

8976. We have been told that there is as much difference between them, inter se, on the one hand as between them and the Brahmins on the other?—Well, there is as much difference between them in one sense of the word, but there is not the same antagonism between them as there is between them and the Brahmins.

8977. With regard to the present elections, in which the non-Brahmins seemed to have carried the day, why do you say that does not affect your opinion? I thought it would?—It may have been done from a reasoned desire to show the Brahmins did not wish to come to the front on this occasion, which I am told is the case; I do not know whether it is true or not.

8978. Supposing it is not an engineered election, and supposing the Brahmins are not keeping back purposely in order to show that the non-Brahmins can get in, assuming that it was done in the usual natural way, then it would affect your opinion?—It would.

8979. That would show that there was now greater organisation amongst the non-Brahmins?—It would.

8980. And if there was greater organisation, I suppose they would be able to get their proper place in the Council?—I doubt it very much, until you have got to a stage at which the elector will be more influenced by political considerations and policy and so on than he is by personal considerations of the candidate.

8981. Of course, hitherto there has been no question of policy as between candidates?—No.

8982. Because candidates who want to become members of the Legislature have nothing to do with policy?—No.

8983. Therefore up to now there could not be anything but personal questions taken into acount?—I would not go so far as to say that—for instance, in my own district there were several crying grievances which men had which they might have asked their members to voice for them, but it never occurred to them to do that; it was only whether So-and-so was a more respectable man than the other man.

8984. I quite admit that that was the only question of importance, but is not that due to the fact that the decision has hitherto lain with the Government?—To a certain extent, no doubt it has.

8985. Now, with regard to the Central Government, I understood you to say to Mr. Spoor that you were not in favour of any advance in the Central Government?—Yes.

8986. Do you mean that in the direction of diarchy, or generally?—No; I only meant in the direction of diarchy. I am in favour of increasing the number of members in the Legislative Council, for instance; but I am entirely against the diarchial principle being introduced at present in the Government.

8987. You know, do you not, that it has been a very constant, at least a very loudly expressed demand on the part of the Indian political classes that there should be a position of equal partnership between Englishmen and Indians and between India and England?—Yes.

8988. And that as a corrollary to that they have always asked that the Executive Government should consist of half Indians and half Europeans?—Yes.

8989. Would you object to that so far as the Central Government is concerned, without dividing the subjects? We have this morning had that view advocated before us?—I would not object to that on any ground, except that I think it would be difficult at the present time to find a sufficient number of efficient Indians to take up the posts.

8990. You would have the whole of India to choose from; you remember that?—Yes.

8991. And you would also have this, that every five years there would be a number of men being trained in the work of high administration in the Provinces?—Exactly. I think it is quite possible if you were increasing the number of Indian Civil Servants, as you are doing now, that in a very short time you might find a sufficient number of Indians of sufficient capacity to be members of the Executive Council of India.

8992. Having regard to the desire and the sense of self-respect which prompts that desire, would you agree to an increase beyond two of the Central Council? You know the Montagu-Chelmsford Report recommends that there should be two members instead of one, as there is now in the Viceroy's Executive Council?—Yes.

8993. Would you agree that if the addition of another satisfies Indian political opinion it would be expedient to make that concession?—If you could find a man of sufficient capacity to take it I would, yes.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

8994. I want to ask you one question: I think there has been some impression that in recent years the practice of the Secretary of State relying on his Council or consulting them has been reduced, and that the Council is less consulted than it used to be: has anything of that kind come under your notice?—No; certainly not during the time I have been on the Council.

8995. Besides the Council meetings, do you find that the Council take as full a share as has always been customary in the business of the office?—I have no experience of what happened, except what has happened during the past three years while I have been on the Council; but I should say the Council were consulted quite sufficiently by the Secretary of State. There is no complaint of that sort at present.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).] We are much obliged to you for your evidence.

(The Witness is directed to withdraw.)

MEMBERS PRESENT:—

Duke of NORTHUMBERLAND.
Earl of SELBORNE.
Lord BRODRICK (Viscount Midleton).
Lord ISLINGTON.
Lord SYDENHAM.
Lord SINHA.
Mr. F. D. ACLAND.
Mr. BENNETT.
Sir HENRY CRAIK.
Mr. MONTAGU.
Major ORMSBY-GORE.
Sir J. D. REES.
Mr. SPOOR.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF SELBORNE IN THE CHAIR.

Lieutenant-Colonel R. H. ELLIOT, I.M.S., is called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

8996. I think you were a member of the Indian Medical Service?—Yes.

8997. For how many years?—Twenty-three.

8998. When did you retire?—In 1915. I was invalided.

8999. What was the last post you held in India?—I was Superintendent of the Ophthalmic Hospital and Professor of Ophthalmology in Madras.

9000. I believe, like every other great public service, the position of the Indian Medical Service has been under review lately?—Yes.

9001. And you have hopes of a settlement?—I think that there is every hope of a settlement.

9002. You are generally aware of the proposals of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report and of this Bill, which it is our duty to consider?—Yes.

9003. Perhaps you have followed the recommendations of what is called the Functions Committee, of which Mr. Feetham was Chairman in India?—I know something of them.

9004. And one of those recommendations was that some of the Medical Services in India should be what are called transferred subjects?—Yes.

9005. The Committee would be glad if, speaking on behalf of the Indian Medical Service and knowing their views, you would tell us of the effect on the work of that department and on its recruitment which these proposals will be likely to have?—May I first say that I am speaking simply as a retired officer and not as a representative of the British Medical Association, with which I am generally associated, being a Chairman of one of their committees; but I am not speaking as Chairman of the Naval and Military Committee, the British Medical Association. I have had no opportunity of consulting the Association, and I am merely giving my own views, which are founded on a very large numbers of letters which have been written to me by officers in India, both in the Medical Service and outside the Medical Service. The point that I make is that this step will be extremely unpopular and that it will lead to a large number of retirements to begin with among senior officers, and also if that occurs it will most certainly make recruiting of European officers in this country increasingly difficult. If I may venture to say so, I think it would be very unfortunate at a time when, thanks to the continued efforts and kindness of the Secretary of State for India, we have almost reached a settlement. It has been very difficult. We have had four years of uphill work to get to a settlement, and I am afraid that if this is done—I go on the letters which men have written me from India, both men in the I.M.S. and men out of it—I am afraid that if this is done it will make the Service extremely unpopular.

Chairman—continued.

9006. Will you kindly explain exactly what the objection is?—You know that Europeans do not like serving under Indians, and they do not feel the confidence that there will be the same support and the same progress in the Service under an Indian Minister that they feel they will get and are getting under British Ministers.

9007. You have spoken in very general terms. I imagine you mean it to apply to the position of a medical officer in a district?—All civil medical officers throughout India, yes, certainly. All the medical officers in civil employment would be affected by it.

9008. Do you wish to give any illustration or to develop that a little more?—I could, but I would rather not. One could only illustrate it by personalities, and I prefer not to.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

9009. Is there an increasing number of Indians entering the Service?—There is a very large number of Indians entering the Service now.

9010. Is their capacity, both administrative and scientific, showing signs of progress?—Yes, certainly, progress, and there will be great progress if you give them time; but I do not think that their services are of the same value to the country at the present moment as the services of the Indian medical officer from Britain of the type you have. At the present time it is a question of progess and of training, and the whole work of the Indian Medical Service has to bring out the best that is in the Indians, and will do so; but it is a question of making alterations at a time when the country is ripe for them. My own belief is that it is not at the present time ripe for any large change.

9011. You have spoken of the effect on the Service of a possible transfer. What do you think will be the effect upon the progress of public health and sanitation of the handing that over to the care of an Indian Minister?—I do not think it will be for the good of India at the present time.

9012. Why?—Because I do not believe you will get the same sympathy and the same energy for sanitation from an Indian Minister that you will get from the British Minister at the present time.

9013. Do you think that the possible withdrawal of senior officers will be due more to present conditions of service and a sense of grievance that they feel or due to apprehensions as to what may happen in the future?—both are operative; there is no question that both are operative; but, so far as the first is concerned, very strenuous efforts have been made to get that matter settled, and as the result of long work it looks as if we were on the eve of a settlement.

9014. Is the Medical Service at present mostly a provincial service—that is to say, is it mostly under the direction of the Local Governments or does it deal very largely and mainly with the Government of India direct?—Each Local Government controls its own Medical Service to a very large extent indeed. The officers are responsible to the Surgeon-General, and the Surgeon-General is responsible to the Local Government. The administration is done by the Local Government.

9015. As the result of that is it largely the case that Medical Officers remain in one Province throughout their career in India or do they move about India?—In my time they were always tied to a Province, but now they move about more; but even now they stay a good deal in one Province. I have left the country six years.

9016. From the letters you have received is it your experience that there is a different feeling, a different attitude, in different Provinces, or do you speak almost entirely for Madras?—Oh, no; I get men to see me from every Province, and I receive a large number of letters from all over India.

9017. And the opinion is the same from every Province?—The opinion is absolutely the same throughout.

9018. You state that there are Indians in the Service at present, and that they will no doubt receive promotion and move up in the Service as they are fit for it. That means that in the course of time, probably fairly soon, possibly even already, you have got to a stage where Europeans are serving under Indians. Is that so?—Yes, it must be so to some extent.

9019. Do you feel that there is an objection to that, which is a process already begun and certain to go on and continue, and very likely to expand, or that there is no objection to it, but that there would be grave objection to serving under an Indian Minister as distinguished from an Indian superior officer?—I do not think that European officers like serving under Indian officers.

9020. In any case?—In any case; but I do not think that they regard it as as serious a matter as having the last appeal to an Indian officer, which they would have in the case of an Indian Minister.

9021. Can you say from your own knowledge that any grave harm has been done to the Service from your point of view, looking at it from the point of view of the recruitment of British members, by the fact that there are Indian members in the Service under whom British officers are required to serve?—It will certainly take away from the popularity of the Service.

9022. It has taken away already?—It certainly has taken away from the popularity of the Service.

9023. Do you regard this possibility which is now opening up as likely to go further in the same direction?—Much further.

9024. When you say that the British Medical Association is not prepared to recommend young medical men to enter the Service——?—Excuse me; I have said I have no brief for the British Medical Association.

Lord Islington.

9025. Is there a feeling of dissatisfaction as regards the pay in the Service?—Very great.

9026. Has that been going for some years?—It has been increasing, of course. If I may answer it in this way, the outlook for a medical man in the last few years in England and elsewhere has gone up considerably, while in India the expenses for all alike have gone up. The consequence is that men have more and more felt the difficulty of living on their pay, and, in addition to that, in the old days an Indian medical officer in civil employ recruited his pay very largely by private practice. During the war a large number of them have had to leave private practice; they had to go out and serve on military duty on considerably lower pay, and a very large number of officers in the Medical Service at the present moment write to me that they are actually in debt, men who were well off a few years ago. So that naturally the question of pay is pressing very hardly at the present moment. But, as I said before, every effort has been made to meet that question, and we are in hopes that it is going to be met.

9027. Would you say it is an important factor in what you allege to be the deterioration of the Service?—The question of pay?

9028. Yes?—It is undoubtedly an important factor in the deterioration of the Service.

9029. Were you in India when the Public Services Commission were there?—I gave evidence before them.

9030. Have you read the report of the Public Services Commission?—I have read it through.

9031. It was published in 1915, was it not?—It was.

9032. Has anything been done that you know of to give effect to that report with a view to improving the conditions of the Service, both from the British and Indian point of view?—We did not think that the Public Services Commission helped us very much. We were utterly disappointed with their recommendations, but the Secretary of State for India has helped us very materially since then.

9033. Would not you have said that it would have helped you if one recommendation had been given effect to, namely, the increase of 12½ per cent. on all the salaries. Would not you characterise that as a certain amount of assistance?—If it had been given at the time straight away I think it would have been welcomed. The time came when men would not look at 12½ per cent. They felt that it was far too little to give them.

9035. When did that come into operation?—I am extremely bad at dates. I think it was very early this year, if I remember rightly. It was made retrospective.

Lord Sinha.

9036. The objection that you mentioned with regard to European officers in the Indian Medical Service working under the control of an Indian Minister is a purely racial one?—I do not know quite what you mean by purely racial.

9037. Is it a racial objection at all—the disinclination or unwillingness of an Englishman, or European, to serve under an Indian? Do you call that a racial objection?—I do not think it is a question of race. I think it is a question that they feel that if they served under an Indian Minister they would not get the same sympathy and the same support that they would get if they served under a British Minister. If that is racial then it is racial.

9038. But apart from that is there any objection on the part of English officials to serve under Indian officials on the ground that they are Indians?—I think there is some, but I do not think that it weighs in comparison with the point which I have mentioned. I mean I think that there are many Indians that Europeans would be glad to serve under.

9039. On the other hand, I take it that your point of view is that most of them would be unwilling to serve under most Indians?—I am afraid so.

9040. Now is the want of support and sympathy that is apprehended based upon any definite grounds?—It is based upon their experience of India and living in India, and having to do with Indian as well as British officials.

9041. In what way is an Indian Minister likely to be wanting in support of what may be proposed for the improvement of sanitation?—I do not think you will get the same enthusiasm and the same support from an Indian Minister that you would from a British Minister, taking most cases.

9042. We have heard from other witnesses that there is probably too zealous an enthusiasm on the part of Indians in the matter of sanitation. Do you agree with that at all?—I do not.

9043. And that they are likely to be carried away by their zeal to initiate measures for which they have not got the finance. I suppose you do not agree with that either?—I regret to say that what I had to do with Indian Ministers of the Government did not lead me to believe that at all.

9044. With regard to Indians who are already in the Indian Medical Service, do I understand you to say that their inclusion is a grievance so far as English members of the Indian Medical Service are concerned?—I do not think it is quite a grievance. I think it is recognised that Indians must come into the Service. They do not like it, of course, but it is recognised, and I think they work very loyally with them—both the Indians and the Europeans work very loyally together.

9045. The more Indians are included therefore in the Indian Medical Service the greater will be their dislike, necessarily?—The less popular the Service will become for purely European officers, unquestionably, and the harder will it be to persuade European officers to go out in that Service.

9046. Would you therefore suggest as a remedy that the Indian Medical Service should be exclusively reserved for Europeans?—I would rather not make any recommendation, for one reason among others that the matter has been dealt with, I understand, by a Commission or a Committee with Sir Verney Lovatt at its head, and with the Director-General of the Indian Medical Service, and other I.M.S. officers as members, and I think it would be presumptuous of me to make recommendations on the matter. I do not feel competent to do so. It is too difficult a question.

Mr. Montagu.

9047. As regards the Committee to which you refer, the proceedings and deliberations, I believe, were opened by Sir Sankaran Nair, were they not?—I refer to the Committee that went round India with the Director-General as its Chairman. I think they were opened by Sir Sankaran Nair.

9049. As at present organised in India, so far as I understand it, sanitation and public health are in the portfolio, curiously enough, of education. The Indian Medical Service and the welfare of the officers of the Service are under the Home Department, are they not?—I believe so.

9050. Suppose it happened that the member in charge of the education portfolio and the Home member were both Indians, you would find that the destiny of the Indian Medical Service under the present constitution would be in the hands of the Indian members, without any alteration of the law, would you not?—Yes.

9051. Do you think what is proposed now makes much difference?—If they found that every service that the Indian Medical Service had to do was under Indian Ministers I think it would greatly detract from the popularity and make recruiting extraordinarily difficult.

9052. Are you aware at all of the enormous interest and eagerness with which the prevention of malaria is treated in Indian newspapers and among Indian politicians in Bengal?—No, I am afraid I am not.

9053. Would you not be rather surprised if you found there was a lack of interest among Indians in measures to be taken against these terrible diseases which from time to time devastate India? Is it not rather unnatural that you should anticipate that they should lack desire and eagerness and energy to cope with that?—The masses of the Indian people.

9054. No, the leaders of educated Indians?—The mass of Indian people take no interest in it at all.

9055. In malaria?—They take no interest in sanitation of any sort or kind, the mass of the people.

9056. But if your relations lived in villages or districts which were continually being decimated by disease, would it not be very remarkable if you did not take a great interest in it yourself as an educated man?—Even as an educated man. No! not if you put it down to the will of God and are resigned to it. I am speaking of the mass of the people.

9057. There are conspicuous instances, are there not, of hospitals in India and in the war area in Mesopotamia, controlled or presided over by Indian Medical officers with great success, although the majority of their subordinate officers are English?—I know they have done splendidly, some of them.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

9058. Do you think that the vesting of the headship of the Indian Medical Service in the Home Department has been altogether satisfactory?—I do not know; I am not in a position to give an opinion.

9059. You are aware that in this country a Minister of Health has just been appointed?—Yes.

9060. Would you say that the problems in regard to health to be dealt with in India were equivalent or greater as compared with those in this country?—I do not think that any Government in India has begun to wake up to the work they ought to do for health. There are 600,000 totally blind people lying in the villages with nobody to care about them, many of whom might be rescued if the Government would take and send out, like they have done in Egypt, travelling hospitals. Those people do not know there is help to be got. They are a nuisance to their people, nobody bothers about them, and they die there, 600,000 of them. I am speaking of one thing alone, blindness; the amount of blindness that might be prevented, the amount of blindness that might be cured is colossal. No! I do not think that the Indian Government has begun to realise its medical responsibilities. Before the war Professor Krusius, from Berlin, visited my hospital without telling me why he came. He came to me, and after having seen it, he said, "Yes, this is all I have heard of it. The Berlin Government want to know whether you will take young Germans, three or four at a time, and train them here." I said I would. That was at a time when conditions were very different. At that very time I was asking the Local Government, through the Surgeon-General, with his support, to send their own medical officers from the districts down to be trained at my hospital, and they did not do so. I do not think the Government of India have begun to understand their responsibilities with regard to health.

9061. In your opinion there would be a strong case for making the head of the Indian Medical Service a member of the Governor-General's Council?—I have always said so, and the whole Service feels that.

9062. In the future, do you think that if the whole question of sanitation was a transferred service and was dealt with provincially, differently in each Province, that would be a satisfactory arrangement?—I really do not feel competent to give an opinion about that.

9063. You spoke just now, in reply to Mr. Montagu, of the manner in which Indian medical officers had administered military hospitals. Have you found Indian officers efficient with regard to sanitation?—Some of them are efficient, but I do not think they reach the same rank of efficiency that Europeans do If you take the whole lot right through, I do not think the Indian officers reached the same height of administrative capacity, of research work, of enterprise in medical work, or of enterprise in sanitary work; I do not think taking them right through they reach anything like the same average that British officers have done.

9064. Mr. Montagu suggested to you that the question of sanitation is of great interest, and he left the impression, I think, that the prevention and treatment of malaria would be popular: is that your impression?—That any widespread treatment of malaria would be popular among the masses of the people?

9065. That all the necessary precautions which should be taken in order to stop malaria would be popular?—It would provoke riots.

9066. Certain sources of water prohibited, and so on?—If you interfere with them, or if you bring on sanitation rapidly in matters of that kind without very great care, you would certainly provoke a great deal of ill-feeling.

9067. Do you anticipate that a Legislative Council in which there would be a strong popular majority would deal drastically with matters of that kind?—I should not have thought so. I am open to correction, but I should not have thought so. Perhaps I ought to say that I am not competent to speak about that. I should not have thought so.

9068. Is it your view that the experience of the past shows that without a strong infusion of the European element and a determination to face great unpopularity, the sanitary measures which ought to be taken will not be taken?—That is absolutely the case.

9069. And, whether or not this Bill goes through, you think that there ought to be a very marked movement forward as regards sanitation and other matters which which you mentioned to us a few moments ago?—I think the whole question of medical work in India requires to be looked at in a bigger, broader spirit than it has yet been. I think we are far behind what we might have done in that country, as a nation. Still, what has hitherto been done, has been done, as you said just now, very largely by the initiative of British officers.

9070. In any case you think a strong impetus would be required from the centre, the Government of India?—To get more done? I am afraid so.

Sir Henry Craik.

9071. You said that in one respect this change might influence unfavourably the position of the Indian Medical Service, and you added especially those in civil employ. Now will you explain that?—Because, as I understand it—I may be mistaken about that—the officers in military employ will not be under the Minister, they will be under the military head of the Medical Department, who again will be under the Commander-in-Chief. Their head will be a military head, not a civil Minister.

9072. How is this involved in the changes proposed in the Bill? How is that question affected?—I did not mean to imply it was. I was asked whether being put under a civil Minister would affect the whole Indian Medical Service, and, if I remember rightly, I said it would affect those in civil employ; or at all events that is what I meant, because, so far as I know, those in military employ would be responsible to the Commander-in-Chief as before, and would not be affected.

9073. Could you explain what you mean by civil employment?—When an officer goes out to India—when he goes out first of all—primarily his function is that of a military officer to be called to do military work with the troops, and to be called up in case of war emergency, even when he leaves his military work. A certain number of officers are taken from the Indian Medical Service and employed by the Local Governments, or by the Government of India in civil employ apart from their military duties altogether. As I understand it, those are the officers who are going to be placed under an Indian Minister, and the officers in military employ would not be affected thereby, as I understand it.

9074. Do you think, purely from a professional point of view, that the association of British and Indian Officers in matters of advanced scientific treatment, would have a bad effect?—I do, most unquestionably.

9075. Have you any proof to adduce of the confidence placed in a British officer?—Yes: I wish to say once again I am not speaking as representing the British Medical Association.

9076. I am not speaking of the Association at all; do not let us bring in any question of the British Medical Association?—I must bring it in to answer you. In my capacity as chairman of the British Medical Associations' Naval and Military Committee I receive a very large number of letters from medical officers, and, though I do not speak for the Association to-day, I have gained a large part of the information I give you from these medical officers; and, in addition to that, knowing I had taken a great interest in the Indian Medical Service—it has been purely altruistic work as far as I am concerned—a number of civilians and men in the Public Works, Police, and other services, have written to me and called upon me to put forward their view of the case, and this view has been put to me consistently and very strongly indeed, that this measure will be very unpopular in the Services. That has come not only from Service men but from men outside, and what has been said over and over again is: "If anything is going to occur to knock off the supply of British medical men, if these men are going to retire en bloc, as they say they are going to do, and if fresh British medical men are not coming in, we are going to get out of the Service, and we are not going to recommend any young man to go into the I.C.S., the P.W.D., or the Police, or in anything else." That is a point brought before me by a large number of men from other services than my own.

9077. I want you to look at it as an experienced medical officer, what is for the advantage of India, and setting aside all questions of popularity, can you tell me if your medical experience leads you to think that the substitution of Indian officers, to a very large extent, would mean the substitution of inferior scientific medical knowledge? Now do leave the question of popularity alone. Do you think it would?—At the present moment to substitute Indian medical officers in large numbers for British medical officers would be, to my mind, to set back the clock and to stop the progress that is being made. But it is quite another thing if you ask: ought there to be a gradual substitution of one for the other. That is an entirely different question and one on which I should have a different opinion altogether. When you ask me whether I think that it would be a bad thing to withdraw the enthusiasm, the research, the initative that the British medical officer has contributed to medicine, and to the question of sanitation in India, I say most emphatically that it is acting absolutely against the interest of India to do that at the present time or to take any step that will be calculated to make the young medical men in this country say it is not good enough to go into the Indian Medical Service.

9078. Do you think that this great knowledge of a high scientific standard which is brought in by the British would not in time be brought in by the Indian?—My point is, it will be brought in in time, but a long time.

9079. You have had experience of India. Can you say whether the Indians themselves, those in high position, and who choose their medical officers, generally resort to British medical officers or to Indians?—When I was out there they unquestionably resorted to British medical officers.

9080. You are quite sure?—Absolutely.

Sir J. D. Rees.

9081. In your answer just now you said that the British Government in India had only touched the fringe of the subject of sanitation?—And medical relief generally.

9082. Then this enthusiasm of the British officers for sanitation, to which you referred, has not yet been fruitful in its results?—It has been fruitful. A great deal has been done, but nothing like enough has been done. Everything that has been done has been due to British enthusiasm in the Indian hospitals, and the whole work of the I.M.S. has been due to British enthusiasm. But that is quite a different thing to saying whether enough has been done. Certainly not enough has been done, to my mind.

9083. You are in the Indian Medical Service?—I was.

9084. It is a military service?—Primarily, yes.

9085. But it is a military service, is it not?—It is primarily a military service.

9086. But the officers belonging to it who work as civil surgeons are liable, as you yourself just said, to be recalled if there is any war?—True.

9087. That would leave the districts denuded of civil surgeons?—It has done so during the recent war.

9088. Is it not therefore desirable to consider this problem from the point of view of making the Service popular, not only with the British officer but with the people, so as to get trained native Indian medical officers to fill it and prevent that catastrophe?—There are two or three points which I challenge in what you say. You first of all implied that the Service is not popular with the people. It is very popular with them. The Indian Medical Service officer can go anywhere and get a welcome from the people wherever he goes. His work is known everywhere.

9089. I did not assert the contrary?—I thought you implied it.

9091. Being a military Service, do you think that nevertheless there will be large resignations en bloc on account of these changes if they come into force?

Will military officers do that?—Well, my information from one Presidency alone, where friends write to me—where I have many personal friends—is that practically every senior officer in the Presidency town has signified his desire to retire from the Service at the earliest possible date. We are hoping that that will be stopped.

9092. Do you know that they have applied to retire in large numbers, or is it an impression?—They write to me and say they have applied to retire.

9093. But you have no specific knowledge?—I have very specific knowledge. My friends write to me and tell me they have applied to retire. If that is not specific knowledge I do not know what is. I would trust my friends in a matter of that kind.

9094. I do not dispute that. You said the British Medical Association would not recommend officers to go out in the P.W.D.?—I beg your pardon; I must have been misunderstood by you. I would like to say once again that I cannot speak for the British Medical Association. I have no brief for them. I did not know what questions were going to be asked me, and I came at your order simply as a retired officer to give you the experience I have got. But to think that the British Medical Association would in any way interfere with the P.W.D. would be absurd. The British Medical Association have nothing to do with other services at all. They have merely to do with their own medical men.

9095. Was I wrong in supposing that you said that they would advise officers in their Service, including the P.W.D., not to go out to India?—I have been most careful to avoid saying that the British Medical Association would take any step whatever, because I am not in a position to know what steps they would take. What I did say was that officers in the Civil Service, in the P.W.D., in the police and others, who had come home, had called upon me to say that if Europeans ceased to enter the Service they would not recommend young men to go out in the Service they had themselves served in.

9096. In reply to Lord Sinha you said that Europeans would not like serving under Indians. You served a long time in Madras, and, I think, in the Madras General Hospital?—No, I was only six months in the Madras General Hospital. I was Superintendent of the Ophthalmic Hospital a large part of my time.

9097. Is it within your knowledge that in the Madras Medical Service the appointment of a Durbar physician in Travancore is highly desired by the members of that Service and regarded as an enviable appointment?—It used to be at one time, because a very large civil practice was made there, but latterly I do not think it was much desired.

9098. Do you know the Durbar physician in Travancore is immediately under the orders of the Dewan, who is invariably an Indian gentleman?—I say I do not think it was a much desired appointment latterly at all, and very largely for that reason, and also for the reason that the civil practice in the place had fallen off very considerably.

9099. You say that the objection to serve under an Indian gentleman is not racial?—If I may be forgiven, it is one of the subjects on which I should like to say as little as I possibly can.

9100. It was merely to lead to my question. Is your position on that point that you would choose your chief amongst the Indian gentlemen—that this military service, the members of it, must choose their chief?—Military officers never choose their chief unless they are mutineers, do they?

9101. In the event of an Indian gentleman having this portfolio at headquarters would there not be an officer of the Indian Medical Service at Headquarters, an officer of high rank, immediately in charge of it?—Yes, but the Indian Minister could overrule him every time.

9102. He could do so?—He might make his recommendations, but the decision would lie with the Minister.

9104. I will not dwell upon finance. You said the sanitation now carried on by the Indian Government was unsatisfactory, and instanced the case of the blind?—I beg your pardon—not unsatisfactory? I said insufficient.

9105. May I ask you whether some of the ablest ophthalmists in Europe have not come out of the Madras General Hospital, and whether it is not an admitted matter amongst doctors that more operations for conjunctivitis have been successfully conducted in the Madras General Hospital than in any other place in the world?—I was in the Ophthalmic Hospital in Madras for eight years and I never operated for conjunctivitis. I have never heard of such an operation.

9106. What was Colonel Brockman's speciality?—Colonel Brockman operated for cataract.

9107. That may be my ignorance; perhaps I should have said cataract——

9108. You have just indicated a rather deplorable state of affairs in India owing apparently to inaction so far as the Medical Service is concerned. Whom do you regard as responsible for that state of affairs?—It is not a question of inaction; it is a question of not sufficient action.

9109. Who is responsible for the insufficiency of the action?—I think the whole ideas of the British race are. They are not sufficiently alive to sanitation; as a nation I do not think they are alive to medical progress. They do not encourage research in this country.

9110. You suggest the Government of India has been rather sadly lacking in its duty to the country as far as medical service is concerned?—I think the Government of India might have done much more if they could have woke up to what was to be done.

9111. And yet you are of opinion that so far as the Indians themselves are concerned, if they are given a larger measure of control and responsibility things are likely to go back?—I am of opinion that had the thing been in the hands of Indians, instead of British Ministers all this time, not one hundredth part would have been done of what has been done. A great deal has been done, but not nearly enough has been done

9112. May we take it that it is a fact that the whole impetus towards the establishment of hospitals and the initiative in sanitation, so far as they have gone, has come entirely from Government, and has been administered by your service?—I can think of no exception to that; I cannot think of anything that has been done that has not come from Government, and has not come through the Indian Medical Service.

9113. Has not medical research been entirely inspired, and mostly directed, by the European officers?—I should say it has been absolutely entirely inspired and mostly directed, but I think that the time will come, I think the time is coming, when Indians will take part in research.

9114. Have not all sanitary measures at times been opposed by Indian opinion?—Absolutely.

9115. Therefore, these sanitary measures, so far as they have gone, have been dependent entirely for their execution on the efforts of Government?—Yes, and there have been riots in carrying them through very often.

9116. Are you aware that in Bombay educated Indians strongly oppose the covering of their wells, after they have been proved to be the centres of malarial infection?—I do not know that, but I do know that in Madras interference with the wells was most bitterly resented, and by educated Indians too, and that there was a danger to the people who had to carry it out at one time. I cannot quote chapter and verse, but it was some years ago that it happened.

9117. Are you aware of the insanitary state of some of the temple tanks in the cities?—I am indeed.

9118. You are also aware that it would be quite impossible to try to make them healthful?—I am.

9119. Do you remember the great efforts we had to make to overcome objections to inoculation against plague?—Yes. Of course, there were very great difficulties. It is understandable.

9120. But for the efforts of the British officials, do you think that any inoculation process would ever have been carried out?—I was one of the first to inoculate in my own Presidency, and the only reason I could get the people to agree was because the British officials were inoculated in their presence first. It was the British officials who saw it through the whole time.

9121. You know the difficulties the Veterinary Department had to encounter in inoculating cattle against disease?—Yes.

9122. You have said a vast amount of medical and sanitary work remains to be done, and that the hospital and dispensary requirements are still deficient in many places. That is a grave defect, and that has been due to the non-recognition in India, as in this and other countries, of the immense importance of sanitation and of sanitary research?—Yes, certainly.

9124. That means that up to the present time they have not quite shown the qualities of the Japanese, either in surgery or in research, but you have every hope that in time to come they will show equal qualities?—The Japanese are a very extraordinary people. They have got a spirit of enterprise in many ways that we might copy. I do not think you can compare the Indians with them in enterprise at all.

9125. Do not Indians go very long distances for treatment by English doctors?—Enormous distances—perfectly enormous. They travel to the eye hospital in Madras from every part of India.

9126. Are you aware that some Indian doctors who graduate in our colleges are ready to practise either the Western or the Ayurvedic system?—I am sorry to say that some of them do, but I should hope the number is very few. I have personal knowledge that some of them do.

9127. Is there not an immense amount of suffering and mortality due to treatment by hakims and vaids, even in very simple cases?—If I may answer that by an illustration; in the big hospitals in the Madras Presidency in operating for cataract we get between 90 and 96 per cent. of good results, whereas an examination of 750 cases operated upon by the hakims showed that they got less than 30 per cent. of good results. A very large number of their patients simply had their eyes destroyed totally by the operation, owing to the filthy septic manner in which it was conducted.

9128. You know the appalling treatment of women in childbirth by the native dais?—It is dreadful.

9129. Does not that lead to a very high mortality, both of women and children?—Colonel Giffard, who had the Maternity Hospital at Madras, told me of the use of a stone roller for a woman who was in childbirth to try to help her, which simply burst her uterus. I believe the treatment of women in childbirth is too dreadful for words.

9130. Are we not making great efforts to train midwives on Western lines?—Yes. They are making efforts, undoubtedly.

9131. If there were a breakdown of the Indian Medical Service, and the transfer of medical services and sanitation under the diarchical system, would there not be a danger of a serious collapse in all health questions throughout India?—I am perfectly confident there would be.

9132. In the native States, where hospitals have been provided, are they not copied from Western models due to the Indian Medical Service?—Yes, they are, undoubtedly.

9133. May it not be fairly said that all the progress in medical science and sanitation which has been so far made in India is due to British rule and to the administration of British officers?—I should say that practically all has been. I would not like to exclude a certain number of Indian officers who have done good research work and good original work. To use the word "all" would be to exclude them, which I do not think would be fair. But, with that proviso, I would answer in the affirmative.

9134. Those Indian officers, of course, have been trained under your service?—Yes.

9135. Mr. Montagu pointed out to you that, as matters stand, the Medical Services might come under the Home Office without the operation of this Bill at all. Is not that quite a different matter to the control of all medical work by an Indian Minister in a Provincial Government?—I should have thought it would have been entirely different. In a Presidency like Madras one has so much to do with a Minister. Whenever one has any difficulties one goes to the Minister to get his assistance, and one has such a lot to do with him that I do think the substitution of an Indian Minister for a British Minister will not tend to efficiency or to popularity.

9136. When you answered Lord Sinha about the reluctance of British officers to serve under Indians I take it you did not mean that racial feeling was in the least concerned, but that the real difficulty was the reluctance of scientific men to serve under Indians who know nothing of science and may be opposed to Western medical methods?—There are so many elements in it of which that is a strong one.

9137. But you think that in time Indians will be sufficiently trained to be able to administer the Medical Services?—I think, if you are going to keep up the standard you have got, if you are going to deal with questions of medical relief for India as they should be dealt with, the substitution should be extremely gradual, and that any sudden change of that kind would be not in the interests of the people of India.

9138. In your view it is really a question of time whether this great change will be made or not?—I should think even in time it would be a good thing to have a leavening of first-class surgeons and physicians in India; but I think there will in time be a very large substitution.

Chairman.] Thank you. We are much obliged to you.

Mr. L. CURTIS is called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

9139. You have been good enough to answer the questions we put to you fully?—Yes.

The following are the questions and answers:—

Chairman—continued.

In order to save the Committee's time I will try to put everything I have to say into this statement. I am, of course, prepared to answer any further questions

tions which may be put in oral examinaton. My answers to those circulated are as follows:—

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India; and, if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"? And do you generally accept the proposition contained in the Preamble?—I accept the pronouncement of policy by the Imperial Government made on August 20, 1917, with a single qualification. The time and measure of each advance can, in the last instance be determined only on the authority of the Imperial Parliament and of no one else; and it should be so stated. The Government of India is the adviser and agent of the Imperial Government, and not, as the words of the Pronouncement suggest, a collateral authority.

By "responsible government" I mean the administration of public functions by an executive which may be dismissed from office by a vote of an electorate or of their representatives.

The only other subject dealt with in the preamble is decentralisation. On this point I hold that in India, as in all great countries, nothing should be done by the Central Government which can, with equal efficiency, be done by any more localised authority. The line between functions assigned to provincial governments and those reserved to the Central Government should be the clearest which can be drawn in practice, to the intent that the public may be able to recognise which authority is to be held responsible in each case. I think it of even greater importance that the same principle of clear demarcation should be applied to the administration of functions transferred to Ministers responsible to electorates, as distinguished from those reserved to executive councils responsible to Parliament.

By the foregoing answers I mean it to be understood that, in accepting the Pronouncement of August 20, 1917, I really look forward to a time, however remote, when Indian affairs, as distinguished from those general to the British Commonwealth as a whole, will be as fully and finally determined by Indian electorates as those of the self-governing Dominions now are by Dominion electorates. Any change in this measure suggested in this statement is conceived with an eye to the earliest possible attainment of that goal. This, to me, is the final criterion of all questions at issue before the Committee, and I ask that my evidence may be tested thereby.

It was this which Lord Carmichael evidently had in mind when he said "Care should be taken not to take away responsibility from the British Parliament. It seems to me that in that responsibility we have the surest guarantee that progress will be real (page 319, q. 17). Strongly agreeing, as I do, with Lord Carmichael on this point, I regard as of vital importance the second part of the Pronouncement, which says that "The British Government and the Government of India, on whom the responsibility lies for the welfare and advancement of the Indian peoples, must be judges of the time and measure of each advance, and they must be guided by the co-operation received from those upon whom new opportunities of service will thus be conferred and by the extent to which it is found that confidence can be reposed in their sense of responsibility."

I hope the Joint Committee will realise the danger of including only the first part of the Pronouncement in the preamble, while omitting the second.

In December, 1917, before the secession of the moderates the Indian National Congress whilst approving that part of the formula which accepted responsible government as the goal, hastened to "repudiate the claim of others to decide for India the time and measure of the stages by which it should be achieved, as a negation of the recognised principle of self-determination." We have here a direct challenge to the authority of Parliament in India, and delegates have been sent to repeat that challenge. They have repeated it to this Joint Committee—that is to say, in the ears of Parliament itself (Appendix C, page 2). Their spokesman, Mr. Patel, went on to say (q. 1739) that the "Indian National Congress does not regard those phrases as part of His Majesty's announcement." So, too, Mrs. Besant urges that "having started India on the road to Home Rule it should be left to her representative councils to regulate her advances to complete responsible government" (page 73, q. 17).

It is most unfortunate that this epoch-making pronouncement of Imperial policy should in the first instance have been made merely as an answer by the Secretary of State to a question put by a private member, and then never endorsed in terms by Parliament itself. If, as is now proposed in the preamble, Parliament affirms the first part of the Pronouncement and omits all reference to the second, it will most assuredly be argued in India that Parliament has consciously refrained from affirming the second part in deference to the views of the Indian National Congress. The emphatic contradiction given by the Chairman of this Committee to Mr. Patel will be buried in the mass of its proceedings and will scarcely penetrate to India. Or, if it does, it will be argued that the statement was supported neither by the Secretary of State nor the Committee. This attempt to represent the second half of the Pronouncement as expressing only the personal views of Mr. Montagu is a timely warning. By including in the preamble all the words of the Pronouncement which are of permanent application, Parliament can close a distracting controversy once for all. It is worth noting that an experienced official like Sir Alexander Cardew complained that the preamble differs from the Pronouncement (q. 6141). Appended to this statement is the preamble amended to a form which would remove all doubts in the matter.

Another of the claims which tend to obscure the real path to responsible government will be closed thereby. A demand is constantly made for a definite date to be fixed at which complete responsible government will be granted. This demand, as Mr. Madhav-Rao says (q. 2074) arises from distrust in our good intentions, which undoubtedly exists, though its causes cannot be here discussed. But the claim cannot be reconciled with the spirit of the Pronouncement when affirmed as a whole. India ought to have responsible government the moment she is able to assume it. It behoves Parliament not only to see that she has it as soon as she is able, but also that nothing is left undone which will help Indian electorates to develop the qualities necessary to the complete management of their own affairs. Parliament is pledged to give them the widest field for the exercise of those qualities compatible with the maintenance of order, without which the development of genuine electorates cannot begin. For the rest, the rate of progress will depend on the use made of that field by the electorates and those they elect. The Pronouncement affirms this. But the thing is true apart from the Pronouncement. It is easy enough to bring anarchy to India; but we can only bring self-government to Indians in so far as they make themselves able to accept it. Granted that Parliament is faithful to the spirit and letter of the Pronouncement, the development of conditions essential to responsible governments will depend on Indians themselves. No gift of prophecy can tell us how fast that development will be. Experience alone can determine it, and if the members assembled in Parliament to-day were to say that India will be ready for full responsible government at any given date, they would be presuming to settle a question which can by nature be settled only by those who come after them. This demand will be answered and set at rest by affirming the second part of the Pronouncement once for all.

It is worth suggesting that the fitness of India for complete responsible government is suceptible of a definite test. Mrs. Besant remarks (q. 1379) that that will be when India can assume control of home defence. To be more precise, I should say it will be whenever it is found possible to withdraw Imperial troops except those required to defend the frontiers of India, as part of the British Commonwealth, from foreign aggression. Whenever the Imperial Government has to form an opinion whether India is ripe for full responsible government, every member of it can ask himself whether he is prepared to accept the office of Governor-General subject to the condition that he, in his personal capacity, will not be able to call upon British troops to suppress such disorders as lately broke out in the Punjab.

The tendency to question or belittle the authority of Parliament is not, however, confined to extremists in India, but is present in the minds of many of our own countrymen there. It tinges even the views of the head of a province when criticising the proposal that Parliament should test the progress of India towards responsible government by periodic commissions appointed by and responsible to itself (vide Cmd. 123, p. 215, q. 9). At this parting of the ways it is of vital importance, especially to India, that Parliament should assert its paramount authority in terms which admit of no further question, whether by Indians or Europeans.

The authority of Parliament must be asserted when questioned; but authority cannot rest on assertion alone. In India its moral foundation depends on how far the word of Parliament proves to be binding on itself no less than on them. Our record in India will bear comparison with that of any other rulers similarly placed. Yet even so in the matter of pledges we are not wholly free from arrears. Hence it is that the one phrase in the Pronouncement which has captured the imagination of Indians most completely is contained in the four words "as soon as possible." Parliament, therefore, should be studious that no delay in the performance of its promises is chargeable to itself. So far as this Pronouncement is concerned there are as yet no arrears to work off. There was no delay in the Secretary of State's visit to India, in the conduct of the inquiry, nor in the production of the report. The scheme had scarcely been published a couple of months before the Imperial Government found time to despatch the Southborough Committees to complete it, and all this in the stress of war. Their work was done with the utmost expedition, and now, with the Bill, lies before Parliament and this Committee. The completion of this measure in the present session will, I believe, establish for many generations in India that faith in the pledges of Parliament which, with Lord Carmichael, I regard as most essential to its future progress in the art of controlling its own affairs. It was this, I conceive, which Sir Verney Lovett had in his mind when urging the Committee not to depart from the main outlines of the Bill in favour of the alternative proposals of some of the provincial governments (page 359, qq. 5 and 6). He did not disguise his preference for those proposals on their merits. But he takes the situation as it now is, and sees the cardinal importance not only of avoiding any reasonable charge of delay, but also of giving something which is demonstrably an instalment of genuine responsible government. I take leave to recommend this weighty warning to the special attention of the Committee, coming, as it does, from the lips of so cautious, so conservative and so experienced an official. I hope the Committee will advise certain amendments. But, none the less, I would urge them to disregard any amendment I suggest, if, in their judgment as Parliamentarians, its proposal would endanger the prospect of the measure passing into law in the course of the present session. Everything I have to say is subject to that proviso. The scheme is, in my judgment, strategically sound. If, through tactical defects, it should come to grief, those defects are capable of amendment, though, of course, at a cost. But the cost will be infinitely smaller than that involved in a measure strategically wrong; for such measures lead only to a precipice, from the brink or perhaps from the bottom of which you have to go back and begin all over again. In my opinion the Minto-Morley reforms and the alternative scheme by provincial governments belong to that category. The searching analysis to which the Committee have now submitted them proves no less.

To summarise this part of my evidence I submit that while Parliament is bound to give effect to the spirit as well as the letter of the Pronouncement, it is bound no less to exercise its own unfettered judgment as to the methods it adopts. The final decisions must be those not of the Secretary of State, nor of the Viceroy, nor of the Government of India, nor of any section of Indians, nor even of all these added together, but of Parliament itself, and if what Parliament does is, in its wisdom, calculated to accelerate the progress of India towards responsible government, there can be no question of "whittling down." My own recommendations are all such as in my opinion will hasten the advent of responsible government, and I therefore ignore that too freely repeated phrase.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the provinces involves the establishment in provincial legislatures of a substantial elected majority? (Clause 6.) 3. Do you think that the non-official members of the provincial legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the executive? Do you think they possess such power at present? 4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of government in the provinces in which at present the provincial executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes?—My answer to these questions is as follows:—

There are two principles underlying all schemes which look to the realisation of self-government in India. One is the principle embodied in the Minto-Morley reforms, the Congress League Scheme, and that of certain provincial governments. The other is the principle of dyarchy adopted in the Bill. It is highly elastic, and can be applied in many different ways.

As to the Minto-Morley principle, my views are on record in Chapters IV., V. and VI. of a book called "Letters to the People of India on Responsible Government." This book was published in India and was before the Secretary of State and Viceroy when they dealt with this subject. In words borrowed from Chapter VII. of their report, I regard this policy as "fatal to good government," "wrong in theory," "the worst possible education for responsible government," "unworkable in practice," and "the negation of responsible government." A candid examination of this policy must lead to its rejection by any body of men with actual experience of government or knowledge of history. In the light of their own analysis the authors of the report could only reject it. And so as a matter of common sense they were thrown back on the only alternative principle. They decided, therefore, that Indian ministers removable by and therefore answerable to Indian electorates and those they elect, must be made responsible to certain definite functions which may be increased or diminished as experience may warrant, the officials answerable to Parliament in England continuing to administer all other functions until such time as Indian electorates might be qualified to assume them.

From these views, with which I agree, it follows that in the Legislatures to which ministers are answerable there must be a substantial elected majority. And I go so far as to say that there should be no official voters.

In the Councils which deal with reserved subjects the non-official members should be able to exercise the utmost influence on the executive; but control, that is to say the final power of decision, must rest in fact as well as in name with the executive. Otherwise it cannot discharge the trust for which it is in the last instance answerable to Parliament, and Parliament alone.

I do not consider that most provincial executives exercise such power at present, especially in Bengal. Had they done so I do not believe that criminal conspiracy in Bengal would ever have been suffered to reach such lengths and spread until it had to be dealt with by the Indian Legislature as an all-Indian subject. The want of power in provincial governments to maintain local order without bringing such ing such questions onto the all-Indian stage and so spreading the controversy to the whole country is the prime cause of the troubles which have culminated in riots against the Rowlatt Act. Lord Carmichael hinted as much (q. 5927).

To question 4, whether I think that there are certain matters or functions of government in the provinces in which at present the provincial executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes, my answer is emphatically Yes! I do not think there is any serious dispute on the subject. Complete responsible government in the major provinces is, in my opinion, incompatible with anything but complete responsible government in the government of India. I have given my reasons elsewhere ("Letters to the People of India on Responsible Government," Chapter X.).

5. If you accept the propositions stated under questions 1 to 4 do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view? 6. If you have any other method to suggest, does it (1) provide possibilities of advance by stages and facilitate the "progressive realisation of responsible government," and, if it does, in what way? (Clause 2, 3, etc.), and (2) does it afford means of judgment, (a) to the electors, and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress, of the success or failure in results of the control exercised by the Legislature and those who represent it in the executive? 7. If you consider a dual form of government acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail the modification of which you regard as necessary? If so, what are those points, and what modifications would you suggest?—In the Joint Address signed by 64 Europeans and 90 Indians, appended to the book to which I have referred, is a scheme for applying the principle of dyarchy, which is, I think, on its merits preferable to that set forth in the Bill. A brief account of its genesis will show why I think so. In 1915 and 1916 I was associated with several friends, who had lifelong experience of Indian government, in producing a paper on the subject for circulation amongst the study groups connected with the Round Table. In the course of our discussions we were led to the conclusion that responsible government ought to be announced as the goal of our policy in India, but that no real progress towards it could be made along the lines of the Minto-Morley reforms. The method of devolving specific functions on Ministers responsible to elected bodies was then suggested as the obvious alternative. We always spoke of it as "specific devolution." With a view to considering how the idea would work as applied to Indian conditions, one member of the circle who had served in Bengal drafted a scheme in terms of that province. The draft was the basis of a series of discussions before it was put into final shape by its author. Lord Chelmsford, who had heard of these studies, asked to see the results, and copies of the draft were sent to him in India about June, 1916. On the eve of Mr. Montagu's arrival, some 15 months later, the paper was reprinted by the Government of India and circulated to Provincial Governments with other papers attached to the instructions sent them to prepare their views for submission to him. A copy of this paper is handed in herewith.

In October, 1916, I arrived in India to pursue these studies of the problem on the spot. My mind was then still open on the subject of specific devolution, but after studying Indian conditions for six months I could see no other key to the problem. So in answering a letter to my friend, Mr. Bhupendra Nath Basu, I propounded for his criticism a scheme of "dyarchy," the name which had been given to the principle by a member of the Government of India. The scheme was worked out in terms of the United Provinces, of which province I had made a particular study. I was greatly assisted in preparing it by friends in the Civil Service who, without offering any opinion on the principle itself, thought that it ought to be studied more closely. The letter was afterwards printed in interleaved copies and circulated for criticism to all those, both Indians and Europeans, who had helped me with information. A mass of valuable criticisms was sent me. I printed a selection of these, which, together with the paper to which they relate, I now hand in.

Even more valuable, however, were the criticisms I received in verbal discussions with Indians and officials who had read the pamphlet. It was in the course of these discussions that I came to believe that a province, like that dealt with in the scheme, which contains about 48,000,000 souls, was far too large for the purposes of real provincial self-government, and that India's progress towards responsible government would be gravely retarded unless or until such colossal units were sub-divided. My views as modified by these investigations were afterwards embodied in the Joint Address which, when published in November, 1917, first gave wide publicity to the principle of "dyarchy." The principle then began to be recognised as the one alternative to the Minto-Morley principle, which had been carried to its logical expression in the Congress League Scheme.

Except for the points of difference upon which I shall dwell in the course of this evidence, the scheme embodied in the Joint Report and the Bill is the same as that contained in the letter to Mr. Bhupendra Nath Basu of April 6th, 1917. With these important exceptions the investigations of the Secretary of State and Viceroy had led them to the same point to which I myself had been brought by April, 1917. But those investigations did not lead them to the conclusions I had formed six months later as the result of further inquiries. They did not adopt the view set forth in the Joint Address that Indians should be asked to make their first experiment in responsible government in areas really adapted to the task, and suited side by side with the native States, to form self-governing provinces in a future United States of India beneath the British flag. My own views on the subject are set forth at length in Chapter VIII. of "Letters to the People of India." The reasons for rejecting them are contained in para. 246 of the Joint Report. A glance at this section will show that the operative reason was unwillingness to face opposition to a scheme of partition.

That such opposition existed is true. It is no less true that opposition to the whole principle of dyarchy was equally emphatic, and very naturally so. For a year the Congress League scheme had held the field as the only concrete proposal for reforms. Its authors had every excuse for believing that it must be accepted in substance. As their own child it was naturally and properly dear to them. Under these circumstances the alternative policy embodied in the Joint Address could scarcely hope to be considered on its merits at the first blush. Naturally the authors of the Congress League scheme attacked it, and, equally naturally, they selected the point upon which attack was likely to prove most formidable in the public mind, still inflamed by memories of the Partition of Bengal.

I do not presume to say that the eminent authors of the Joint Report, weighted as they were by their heavy responsibilities, should have squarely faced this opposition. Speaking as one unhampered by official responsibility, I can only say that I think that in their position I should have done so, believing as I do that the institution of responsible government in provincial areas of appropriate size and based on racial and linguistic units will bring India nearer to the final goal by many generations. I will give my reasons for saying so. The principle of dyarchy itself was denounced, especially by many of the witnesses who have now appeared to support it before this Committee. This evidence that Indian leaders can revise their opinions, and do not shrink from admitting that they have done so, of itself augurs well for the progress of India towards self-government. In spite of all prejudices and passions, the reasons for things, if they are valid, do sink into the minds of Indians when explained in a spirit of sympathy such as that adopted in the Joint Report. But more especially is this so when they are presented sented with the high authority of men in the position of its authors. The readiness of Indians to listen to rulers whom they feel to be in sympathy with their aims is one of the great hopes of the future. It is, I may add, one of the most urgent reasons why their present rulers should be men who can sympathise with aims learned from a study of our own civilisation.

How equally potent is a lead in the wrong direction is shown by the history of reform from 1909 to the Indian National Congress of 1917. India had been started on a course which, as the authors of the Joint Report recognised, everyone must see on closer examination must lead to anarchy. They have rendered an unexampled service to India by making that examination for themselves and placing it on record in Chapter VII. of their report.

As to the areas, I think that a great opportunity was lost. But that loss is a definite fact in the situation which has to be recognised. Even if I were so fortunate as to convince the Secretary of State of my views at the eleventh hour, I would not advise him now to substitute the Joint Address for the Joint Report as the basis of the Bill; for it could not then pass in the present session, and the genuine intention of Parliament to give effect to the Pronouncement "as soon as possible" would be held in question throughout India. In my answer to Question 6 I want to be perfectly clear on this point. I do not now suggest the scheme set forth in the Joint Address as one for substitution for the scheme in the Bill.

I do think, however, there are certain flagrant cases which demand the special attention of this Committee, the cases of Sind, of Orissa, and of the two detached areas in Assam. I hope that members will consider these cases with a large map of India before them. Look at Sind. The Maratha country, the stronghold of Hinduism, is the heart of Bombay. From this country Sind is separated by native states thrust into the middle of which are certain districts inhabited by Gujeratis under British rule. Even from the northern point of these isolated districts Sind is divided by 100 miles. But from Maratha territory, which forms the heart of the Bombay Province, Sind is divided by 260 miles, including, besides the patchwork of British and native territories, Rajputana and an arm of the sea. Geographically, Sind is the estuary of the Indus, which connects it closely with the Punjab. In race and language it has no affinities with the rest of Bombay. In religion it is almost entirely Mohammedan, which counts most of all in India. That its conquest was effected from Bombay is a chronological accident, due to the fact that it took place before British rule was established in the Punjab. Napier's conquest of Sind was an act difficult to justify. Had it not been hastened by an impetuous soldier, we should have come into touch with its emirs later on by way of the Punjab down the Indus valley, and it is pardonable to hope that Sind would then have been treated on the same lines as Rajputana.

The incorporation of Finland with Prussia in one province of the German Empire would be less absurd. So long as a Government contains no real element of popular control, such forced and unnatural unions are of small account. A Director of Education who is a European by race, a Christian by religion, and an Englishman by speech is just as acceptable to Mohammedan Sindis as to the Marathas three or four hundred miles away. But the moment you substitute a minister responsible to an overwhelming majority of Hindus the case is entirely altered. Does Parliament really propose to hand over the control of education in this Moslem country to a Hindu majority living in a country hundreds of miles distant, with no more racial and linguistic affinity to Sind than Prussia has to the people of Finland?

In Appendix V., page 2, of your proceedings the statement is made that Sir Francis Younghusband urged the necessity of giving Sind an administration of its own, and I venture to suggest that his views on the subject might be elicited.

A glance at the map as re-drawn since 1911 is sufficient to establish the case for Orissa. In that year Government decided to reconstitute Bengal on racial and linguistic lines as opposed to religious divisions. In pursuance of the same policy the claims to a separate administration of the Hindu-speaking people of Behar were recognised, and a province was instituted centring on the middle plains of the Ganges Valley, with its northern boundaries resting against the Himalayan ranges of Nepal. Under the thin pretence of giving this province a seaboard, Orissa was thrown in with Behar in cynical disregard of the very principles upon which the whole rearrangement was justified. But as the map shows, the British territories of Orissa are separated from Behar by a wide and mountainous tract of native territories, at its narrowest point 60 miles wide. No attempt was made to restore the Ooriyas included in the Central Provinces and the north-eastern corner of Madras to unity with their kindsmen in Orissa. So much was done as would satisfy demands which were vocal at the moment, and no more.

The Ooriyas came to Calcutta to lay their case before the Secretary of State and the Viceroy, but the only public reference to the fact that I can find is contained in a note on page 72 of my own book. In the passage to which that note is appended I tried to show how vital to the whole policy set forth in the Pronouncement is the question of language. In India the official and political classes both incline to talk as though the progress of India towards responsible government depended on training Indians to the work of ministers, legislators and officials. From first to last I say it depends upon training electorates to a real understanding of the question at issue, and to a habit of recording conscious decisions upon them. Such training will not begin in any real sense except in so far as provincial business is transacted and discussed in a language the people at large understand. So far as I can find, the Joint Report devotes less than five lines to the whole topic (q. 246, p. 200). I venture to say that the question is of infinitely greater importance than the issue between the Brahmins and Non-Brahmins upon which pages of evidence have been given. The key to that lesser problem will in fact be found in the answer to the greater one. The only real treatment of the subject that appears in these proceedings is the able memorandum of the Andra conference contained in Appendix V. As the Committee found themselves unable to hear the spokesman of this conference in evidence, I hope they will give the closest attention to that paper. To one who has watched the recent proceedings in Paris the scanty thought bestowed on the whole question of race and language in the treatment of India is amazing and disquieting. It is vital for the Committee to remember that all the evidence they have listened to comes from witnesses who have full command of the English tongue. But the vast mass of the people to whom you are giving the vote are strangers to this tongue. That changes should be, so far as possible, gradual and tentative I recognise. But there are limits to the degree to which you can safely graduate changes, for new wine cannot always be put with safety into old skins, least of all when these vessels are a veritable patchwork full of holes and with gaping seams.

Provision for the future adjustment of areas is made in clause 12 of the Bill. The effect of a measure like this will be determined by the policy of those who administer it, and their minds will be largely influenced by the terms of the report upon which it is based, except in so far as Parliament may pronounce a definite and different opinion. So much is left to executive regulation that this cannot be done merely by amending the terms of the Bill. On matters of policy upon which Parliament after considering the advice of this Committee hold the Report to be wrong, there should I submit be specific instructions laid down. The Report, moreover, contains some equivocal phrases, seed beds of controversy, which can all be forestalled by a few words of plain definition superimposed by this Committee.

The dictum in para. 246, page 200 of the Report to the effect that redistributions of provincial areas should only be effected "by process of consent," is a case in point. From whom is consent required? The question is as vital to the whole issue as the question whether the Poles in Silesia can be reunited to their countrymen without the consent of the whole of Prussia. To bring matters to a fine point is the future claim of Sind to autonomy to depend on a vote of the Bombay Legislature in which the Marathas will have an overwhelming majority. I would earnestly recommend the Committee to advise Parliament that any clear request by the members representing a distinctive racial and linguistic territorial unit for its constitution as a sub-province may be taken as a primâ-facie case, on the strength of which the Secretary of State may appoint a commission of inquiry. Such a declaration will at once answer the queries raised by Mr. Sastri (q. 3923).

The Secretary of State, whose courtesy and patience in eliciting every point of view, including my own, I must gratefully record, will allow me to repeat a remark which I often made to him in India. Having once fixed upon the basic principle of policy, it was, I submitted, a mistake to think that it must be embodied in one hard and fast plan, applicable to all the provinces alike. One great merit of dyarchy lies in its elasticity, its capacity for adaptation to the many and different races of a vast and highly diversified country. I suggested that when you had formulated the right plan for Bengal it was likely, from the nature of the case to be the wrong plan for Bombay. I urged, moreover, that variety in the schemes applied to different provinces would furnish invaluable guidance to the Commission ten years hence. When all the resources of previous inquiry and discussion are exhausted my own opinion of any proposals, including my own, is largely held in suspense until they have been tested in practice. An ounce of actual experience is worth tons of intelligent reasoning exercised in advance. That is why I so regret that the Report and the Bill have not provided for the trial of sub-provinces, at any rate in Madras with its four distinctive races and languages, while applying the proposals of the Report to Bengal. It is too late to do that now. I would not, as I have said, attempt it at the stage things have reached, if the decision were now laid on myself. But if members will open the map of Assam opposite to page 291 of the blue book Cmd. 123, they will see that here is the case of a minor province crying out for treatment on the lines of the Joint Address. The Government has reported that the greater part of the area shown in red consists of mountainous tracts peopled by primitive tribes which ought to be reserved from the operation of the scheme. The reforms they say are at present applicable only to two valleys completely separated by a high plateau from 40 miles to over 200 miles in width. And yet it is proposed to clamp these two areas together under one system of elective government, for the sole reason that "the future constitution of Assam must follow the general lines of the Constitutions of the other seven provinces" (para. 5, page 291). I commend this sentence as an example of the tendency which ought most jealously to be watched by Parliament when inaugurating the new régime. This iron uniformity is the natural product of a highly centralised autocracy imposed on a vast country from without. It is equally natural that officers who have spent their lives in administering it should come to regard mere uniformity as an end in itself, and this in spite of the fact that they are constantly insisting on the multifarious diversity of conditions in India.

I think the Committee might well consider whether this is not a case for devolution by the Provincial Government of Assam of the transferred powers to two sub-provinces with executives and elective councils of their own. I should say that the conditions stated in para. 5, page 291, of the Chief Commissioner's report are substantially met by the kind of scheme outlined in the Joint Address.

While members of the Committee have their eyes on this map submitted by the Chief Commissioner of Assam, I would draw their attention to one question of policy which has, I feel, received no treatment in the Joint Report adequate to its future importance. I refer more especially to the narrow red strip dividing the province from the wild tribes to the north of the Indian frontier. The Report recognises the necessity of reserving the permanent control of territories bordering on the north-west frontier to the Government of India. I am sorry it did not go on to say that such territories must always remain under the control of an authority responsible to the Imperial Government itself. It is much better to say now, before any question is raised, that territories bordering on frontiers which may involve the whole British Commonwealth in war can never be ceded to a future Dominion Government in India responsible only to an Indian electorate. I will here insert what I said on page 61, the book to which I have already referred:

"India, we have said, must come to control affairs which are purely Indian. She is, however, to remain an integral part of the British Commonwealth. Her foreign affairs are those of the whole Commonwealth. She can never therefore control them apart. They form an integral part of the foreign affairs of the whole Commonwealth, in the control of which she must come to share. The Indian frontier is a large item in foreign affairs. Live wires run from it throughout the whole of Asia and Europe, the mismanagement of which at this end may involve the whole Commonwealth in war and set the whole of the world on fire. Here is the one critical frontier in any part of the British Dominions, and if India were now inhabited by a people already as fitted and practised in self-government as those of England herself, it would not be possible, so long as they remain part of the British Commonwealth, to place the Indian frontier under the control of a Government responsible only to the people of India. That frontier must remain under the sole, unfettered control of the Imperial Government charged with the conduct of foreign affairs. The principle ought to be enunciated and implemented now, and effect can only be given to it by reserving from the outset a strip, however narrow, from sea to sea, which would isolate a self-governing India from any contact with foreign frontiers. The proposal means no more than completing the policy inaugurated by Lord Curzon when he separated the North-West Frontier Province from the Punjab. That province has simply to be extended down the right bank of the Indus to the Arabian Sea, and eastwards along the foothills of the mountain barrier, taking a narrow strip not more than a few miles wide along the frontiers of Nepal, to the point where the boundaries of India and Burma meet on the confines of Tibet. The self-governing India of the future would then be as well isolated from complications with foreign powers as Australia herself. The future destination of the frontier province would be signalised by removing it to the personal control of the Viceroy from the jurisdiction of the Governor-General in Council, the members of which are destined to become hereafter the Ministers of a cabinet responsible to an Indian Parliament. This arrangement would be closely analogous to that under which the Governor-General of South Africa is, in that capacity, the legal head of the Union Government, while, as High Commissioner, he is responsible, to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, as de facto ruler of all British South African Territories not included in the Union.

"If once it were understood that India were to be separated from foreign complications by a province destined to remain subject to the Imperial Government as absolutely and as finally as Malta or Gibraltar, the whole project of developing India as a self-governing Dominion will begin to assume a different aspect. A large factor in the alarm, with which the cautious Englishman views that prospect, arises from the half-conscious dread in the back of his mind as to what would happen to the peace of the whole Commonwealth if this, its one critical frontier, were relegated to the charge of a Dominion Ministry. Such a thing would be utterly wrong in principle. Imperial control of the frontier ought to be established from the outset, and, when once that has been definitely settled, the Imperial Government can embark on steps for establishing India on the same footing as the self-governing Dominions with a lighter heart and a clearer mind."

My case is that this policy should be applied to all the northern marches of India, so that the

Imperial Government will for ever control the extremities of all the lives wires which connect Europe and Asia with these frontiers. I myself saw a house, right in the centre of these marches, at a point where an obscure trade route from Tibet debouches on the Plains, which for years was inhabited by an enemy alien with no ostensible employment, who was immediately interned at the outbreak of war. I learned from the natives that he was in constant communication with the traders who came through from Central Asia. Frontier questions, moreover, arise from matters of local police administration, which, small as grains of dust, are yet capable of developing dangerous friction wherever the surfaces of great political bodies are in contact. If this reasoning is sound, I submit that the northern strip projected by the Chief Commissioner of Assam should be drawn now as a fence along all the marches of India. It ought to be continued to separate Bhutan Sikim and Nepal from the jurisdiction of elective authorities in India, which will presently control the local police.

The case is especially strong for cutting out the mountainous tongue of Bengal in which Darjeeling lies, inhabited as it is by primitive Mongolians of the Bhuddist faith. The mountainous area of Kumaon, west of Nepal, is a single division, absolutely distinct in its geographical features and the language and race of its people from the plains which strike the mountain wall like the sands of a shore at the foot of a cliff. A strip reserved to cut off the mountain area would include Sialkot and the great British cantonments of Rawal Pindi. The thing can be done now with a stroke of the pen. A generation hence it may only be done at the cost of a violent controversy. Effect can be given to this policy by inserting in Clause 12, subsection 2, line 2, the words "or frontier" between the words "Backward" and "tract."

8. In particular, do you think—(i) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure"—i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their Department by the Governor or if they fail to retain the confidence of the Legislature? (Clause 3 (1))?—On the question whether Ministers should hold office "during pleasure," I recorded my views in a memorandum on the Report, which, about this time last year, I was invited to prepare for the Departmental Committee presided over by Mr. Charles Roberts. As I have not altered my views on this subject, I here propose to repeat what I then said:—

"The problem is to graduate the transition from pure autocracy to responsible government. Two ways of doing this, and two only, have been suggested. The one suggestion is to make executives responsible for the same things, partly to the Secretary of State and partly to electorates. The other is to create executives responsible for some things to electorates, while leaving the old executives responsible for all other things to the Secretary of State. The argument against the first principle is conclusively stated in Chapter VII. of the Report. It is there demonstrated that you cannot make one executive responsible to two authorities without destroying responsibility and bringing government to a standstill. The authors of the Report, therefore, fall back on the only alternative of dividing the functions of government and assigning them to two different executives, the one responsible to the Secretary of State, the other to electors. But in their anxiety to conciliate criticism, they try to mitigate the process by resort to the first principle. Hence the extraordinary complications of a scheme the first requirement of which was simplicity. In their anxiety to graduate the process they plead that, to begin with, Ministers, though selected from members elected to the Legislative Council, are not, for the first five years at least, to be responsible to that body. They are to be responsible to the Governor, and yet they are not to be so altogether, for they are also to be responsible to the constituencies. This duplication of responsibility is to be procured by the fact that their reappointment will depend on their re-election. When the time comes to make them responsible to the Legislative Council the change is to be effected of the simple process of transferring to the council the right to withhold their salaries, which, for the first five years, is to be included in the reserved subjects.

"To begin with, a good deal is made of the idea that Ministers are to be responsible, not to the Legislative Councils, but to their constituents. Then, by an easy, but false, transation, the Report slips into talking as though Ministers were responsible 'to the Indian electorate.'* As a matter of fact, they will only be responsible to three out of, say, thirty constituencies, or about one-tenth of the electorate. The proposal is bad in principle because it encourages Ministers from the outset to study the interests of their own constituents, instead of feeling that as Ministers they are concerned with the interests of the electorate as a whole. The evil will be aggravated where a Minister is elected by a communal electorate. A Moslem Minister may be felt to have given undue preference to his co-religionists. But he cannot be called in question at the next election, because every one of his constituents will be Moslems.

"I do not, however, lay great stress on this point, because the intentions of the Report will scarcely be realised in practice. The Report repeatedly lays stress on the fact that there must be a means of harmonising the action of Executive and Legislature. In the last resort the executive must be able to overrule the Legislature, or else the Legislature must be able to change the executive. In the latter case, this is done by a vote of want of confidence, or, in the last resort, by withdrawing supply. And the power to withhold supply for transferred services is granted. The Legislature can render the position of ministers untenable whenever the Budget comes up to be voted.

"The proposal that after five years Ministers may be rendered responsible to the Legislature by having their salaries included in the transferred subjects, surely betrays some confusion of thought. The idea is, I suspect, a false analogy from the proposal made in section 294, that the salary of the Secretary of State should in future be voted by Parliament. The object is simply to secure discussion of Indian affairs before the fag-end of the Session, when members are jaded and anxious to be off. The Secretary of State will scarcely suggest that he is not now, as a member of the Ministry, responsible to Parliament, or that the voting of his salary will make him more so. If Irish secretaries are changed more freely than those of India, it is only because Parliament is more nearly interested in Ireland. Nor am I aware that the positions of Mr. Wyndham and Mr. Birrell were rendered untenable by Parliament refusing to vote their salaries. Both resigned because the Ministries to which they belonged would have fallen if they had not.

"The real truth is that a Minister is responsible to the Ministry of which he is a member. He is only responsible to Parliament as a part of the Ministry. If he feels that his duty to his colleagues is no longer compatible with his duty to Parliament and the electorate, he must resign office. So, too, the Ministry may ask a colleague to resign because his views or conduct are not compatible with the policy for which they are answerable to the Legislature. The executive is a unit, and its existence as such is threatened by one discordant or unacceptable member. A motion to reduce a Minister's salary is a common device for raising a debate on some administrative question. Its adoption by Parliament is often the signal for a whole Ministry to resign, or dissolve, as in the famous case of the cordite vote which put the Liberal Cabinet out of office for ten years. Parliament seldom, if ever, requires to exercise its right to refuse supply. The knowledge that it can do so in the last resort is enough to force Ministers to resign the moment they see that the Legislature no longer supports them in office.

"This power the legislative Council is to have, so far as the estimates submitted by Ministers are concerned.† Now, is it intended that during the first five years Ministers should retain office if the legislative legislative Council rejects their estimates? If so, the scheme is exposed to the main objection which in Chapter VII. the Report urges with unanswerable force against the Congress-League scheme. To use their own words: 'There is in these proposals no connecting-rod between the executive and the legislative wheels of the machine which will ensure that they will work in unison.'* And again, 'If the executive attempted to overcome the Legislature there would be conflict and agitation; if it gave way, then it would become merely the agent of the Legislature and might as well be chosen from and by the Legislature at once.'† Can anyone doubt that the latter alternative would prevail? In that case the so-called transitional stage when Ministers are responsible to three of the constituencies and the Legislature cannot withhold their personal salaries, will prove an illusion.

† Report, par. 256.

"In practice, therefore, the legislative Council will from the outset of the experiment be able to make the position of all or any of the Ministers impossible by withholding supply. But what advantage is gained by encouraging the idea at any stage that Ministers are individually and not collectively responsible to the Legislature? The whole experience of the British and American Commonwealths, in every part of them, points to the prniciple of unity in the executive. The Report refers to it as one of the lessons in the past in India.‡ Why ask India, then, to learn the difficult art of self-government in a temporary machine which violates that principle? What harm is done if Indian Ministers are encouraged from the outset to realise that there must be unity in all executives to which they belong? And in this respect it matters not whether those executives are responsible to the Secretary of State or to an electorate. On the contrary, there is everything to be gained by training them in the habit of loyalty to each other, and in making each Minister feel that, so long as he remains in office, he stands or falls with his colleagues. At this juncture we are seeking to found constitutional traditions in India. It is surely, therefore, of vital importance to be studiously careful in the language used in an authoritative Report like this."

I am glad to see that in Clause 3 (1) of the Bill the confusing proposal to make Ministers responsible to electors but not to those they elect is abandoned, and that they will hold office "at pleasure" from the outset. In passing I note that Mr. Welby did not seem to have grasped this fact (p. 262, q5).

The point, however, has been taken by the Drafting Committee. But, strangely enough, while the Bill provides that Ministers should hold office during pleasure, the Governor is saddled with the duty of fixing salaries. This surely is exactly the kind of power which ought to be transferred to the Legislative Councils from the outset. Can anyone argue that public order or the interests of the depressed classes are jeopardised if Ministers are left to propose the scale of their own salaries, or if the elected Councils are left to sanction them? I submit that it is not only better for the Councils to have this duty to discharge, but that they can discharge it better than the Governor. One great difficulty in transferring authority in India from the British to Indian administrators is the financial transition. The pay necessary to enable an Englishman to live in tropical exile is of necessity far higher than that needed by the Indian administrator in his own country. I think there is a strong case for paying Indian officials who have to live in London more than their European colleagues. But is India to be saddled with the tradition that her own Ministers are always to be paid on the scale necessary for Europeans in India? If you put this responsibility on the British Governor, he can do nothing else than give European salaries to the Minister. It would be more honest to put it in the Bill straight away. The money will be deducted from the fund available for education and other transferred subjects. Then why withhold from the Legislative Councils the responsibility of deciding what this deduction for emoluments payable to their own Ministers ought to be?

Personally I do not share Sir James Meston's hope that Ministers will always be whole-time men (Q. 7219). I should be very sorry to think that a partner in Messrs. Tata's firm or the owner of a cotton mill could not become Minister of Education without retiring from business. That India has in the past been governed by professional civil servants is no reason why in the future she should be exclusively governed by professional politicians. This is one of the transitions which the institution of sub-provinces would have made much easier.

I recommend the Committee in Clause (1), line 36, to substitute the words "Legislative Council" for "Governor."

The proposal that Ministers should be responsible not to the Legislature, but only to their own constituencies, though now dropped, has left serious confusion in its train. It seems to have prevented the authors of the Report, and also the Government of India, from thinking out the all-important question of the corporate responsibility of the Ministry. Such corporate responsibility is precluded by Clause 3 (3) of the Bill. In a perfectly clear question (Q. 1331) Sir John Rees raised the point; but in his replies the witness confused the whole subject with the question whether the Executive Council and the Ministry should be jointly responsible for the acts of both bodies. Another attempt was made by Lord Sinha with a different witness in Questions 1345 and 1346 with the same result. With Mr. Aiyar, however, Lord Sinha succeeded better, and in Question 1589 that witness gave a clear and decided opinion in favour of the corporate responsibility of the Ministry.

The confusion which continues to pervade this whole subject has its source in paragraphs 216, 221, 222 and 223 of the Report. Nor do I see how it can be disentangled without first making a clear, unequivocal definition of the relations which are to exist between the Executive Council and the Ministers. Then and then only is it possible to grapple with the no less important task of defining the relation of Ministers to each other and to the Governor. I must therefore begin by repeating what I wrote to the Drafting Committee on this subject last year:—

"To entrust electorates with real powers in certain specific departments, leaving the rest to the existing administrations, is the only way out of the vicious circle, within which India now moves. It means the co-existence of two authorities in the same area, each actuated by different mainsprings, the one responsible for specific functions to Indian electorates, the other responsible to Parliament in England. . . . To men used only to a highly centralised bureaucracy, the idea of two authorities with separate mainsprings co-existing in one area seemed patently absurd. The term 'dyarchy' was applied to mark that absurdity. But the demonstration is unconvincing to those who have lived under the system and seen it in operation. The argument proves too much, for, if it is sound, then the system which actually exists in Switzerland, America, Canada, Australia, South Africa and a large number of other countries would be logically and practically impossible. In any given part of these States we know as a matter of fact that two authorities do co-exist. Each of those authorities responds to a different electorate—that is to say, a separate mainspring. Not uncommonly those two mainsprings are in actual opposition to each other. In practice the conflict is minimised by the fact that so far as is possible each authority is dealing with different subjects. That is the essence of dyarchy. The separation is always imperfect, and some friction is the natural result. I have yet to hear of a system of government whose various organs work without it. In the federal systems to which I have referred the separate mainsprings are in the last resort harmonised by the constitution, in which there exists a superior authority to which both are amenable, if once it is called into play.

"There are practical difficulties inherent in dyarchy as there are in applying all principles to practice. No skill can eliminate friction. The artificer's task is so to contrive that the heat generated will not be sufficient to melt the bearings and bring the machine to a standstill. No motor will ever be invented which will leave airmen free of anxiety. The records of any federal country will show the difficulties inherent in dyarchy. That the system will present even greater difficulties when applied to the highly centralised mechanism of India is obvious. But they have to be faced for the simple reason that we are pledged to approach responsible government by stages, and we cannot do so except by specific devolution, which means dyarchy. Dyarchy is inherent in the policy enunciated on the 20th August, 1917. The difficulties are greatest at the outset. They arise mainly from the system which treats all administrative and many judicial departments as auxiliary to one general administrative corps, which has its representative at the head of each district and division. The local officers of the Public Works, Forestry, Medical or Educational Departments may not be actually subject to the district officers. But often, if not usually, the heads of these departments are drawn from the I.C.S. In any case they all take their orders from a Government in which no officer of the technical departments ever finds a place. Members of the I.C.S. are the controlling factor in all the provincial governments. This arrangement is, I believe, on the whole the best which could have been devised for India so long as no intention existed of guiding its people towards responsible government. It is the natural development of a system in which every officer is finally responsible to an authority absolutely detached from the people he administers. But to many of these officers this system in which they have spent their whole working lives is as part of the order of nature itself. Administrative changes such as dyarchy involves appear to them almost as proposals to reverse natural laws. . . .

"To objections of this character the Report replies with unanswerable force in the following passage:—

"'No doubt we shall be told—indeed, we have often been told already—that the business of government is one and indivisible, and that the attempt to divide it into two spheres controlled by different authorities, who are inspired by different principles and amenable to different sanctions, even with the unifying provisions which we have described, is doomed to encounter such confusion and friction as will make the arrangement unworkable. We feel the force of these objections. We have considered them very anxiously, and have sought out every possible means of meeting them. But to those critics who press them to the point of condemning our scheme we would reply that we have examined many alternative plans, and found that they led either to deadlock or to more frequent or greater potentialities of friction. Such destructive arguments, as far as we can discover, are directed not so much against our particular plan, but against any plan that attempts to define the stages between the existing position and complete responsible government. The announcement of August 20th postulated that such stages could be found; indeed, unless we can find them, it is evident that there is no other course open than at some date or other to take a precipitate plunge forward from total irresponsibility to complete responsibility.'*

"As an answer to the critics of dualism these words are complete. Why, then, run away from a criticism which will not hold water, and pretend that the plan adopted does not erect two governments side by side? Why try to veil the dualism with a thin disguise which can only entangle the feet of those who wear it, and trip them up? We are told that powers are to be transferred to ministers answerable to the legislature and electorate. The rest are to be reserved to executive councils responsible to the Secretary of State. What, then, is the sense of saying that one government is not to 'be regarded as official, and one as Indian'? Why ask us to assume 'that the machine of government must, as far as possible, be single and not dual, both in its legislative and executive aspects'?* Or that 'It is highly desirable that the executive should cultivate the habit of associated deliberation and essential that it should present a united front to the outside'?† In all this there is too much faith in the power of words. The signatories of the Report tell us that 'by entrusting the transferred portfolios to the ministers we have limited responsibility to the Indian electorate to those subjects in which we desire to give responsibility first. We have done this without now or at any time depriving the Indian element in the Government of responsibility for the reserved subjects.' And presently they add, 'It is our intention that the decisions of the Government should be loyally defended by the entire Government, but that the Ministers should feel responsibility for conforming to the wishes of their constituents.' But in years to come the feelings of Ministers will be determined by the facts before them, and not by the intentions of the Secretary of State and of the Viceroy recorded in the year 1918. Suppose that the Executive Council decide that internments are necesary to 'the peace and tranquillity of the province,' we can say with certainty that in nine cases out of ten, Ministers, legislators and electorates will object. Ministers will oppose the internment in council, and is it in the nature of things that they should defend them in the Legislature and constituencies. And if they do, what then of the responsibility which they are asked to fill for conforming to the wishes of their constituents? Responsible government is not merely a question of feeling. It means that at the next election the constituents can deprive Ministers of their seats. It also means that, by withholding supply, legislators can render their tenure of office impossible. I venture to predict that the phrases of this Report will not prevail with Ministers faced by such situations. They will not defend the action of the Executive Council in the Legislature, but attack it. Why should they defend acts they have strenuously opposed in private, over which the law denies them authority?

"The position of executive councillors is equally difficult. Let us take a case which may easily and constantly occur. Suppose that the Ministry includes two Hindus and one Moslem, and the Executive Council one European and one Moslem. Let us also suppose that some Moslem master or inspector may become the target of a Press agitation, and Ministers may decide to remove him from his post. The Executive Council, believing the removal to be a grave act of injustice, may vainly endeavour to dissuade Ministers. In virtue of the powers transferred to them, Ministers persist and the man is removed. The Government is attacked in the Legislature by the Moslem minority. The Moslem who has been outvoted by his Hindu colleagues has then to decide whether to defend them or resign—a perfectly regular position—because the Hindu Ministers have to reckon with the chance of destroying their own Ministry, and take the risk. The Executive Council, however, are called upon by the standing instructions of the Secretary of State 'loyally to defend' a decision made by the votes of two Hindu Ministers, to which they object and over which they have no control. Cases will occur in which the members of the executive will feel that it is due to their own self-respect to resign, and no self-respecting successors will be found to take their place. This will be the least objectionable alternative. For if, in practice, executive councillors are found to be willing to retain office and defend in public each and every decision which Ministers may make, they will thereby destroy any efficacy the system might have as a training in responsible government. The Governor can only use his power to overrule Ministers in extreme cases; otherwise the representatives of the Secretary of State are to stand by them and justify in public every mistake and injustice against which they have vainly remonstrated in private.

"The whole object of this system should be that electors and legislators should learn to form right judgments of the acts for which Ministers are answerable to them, and that Ministers should feel that that they are called upon to justify their own acts, and so to learn the lesson which, of all others, needs to be learned in India—that of taking responsibility. This device of ordering British officials, against their reason and conscience, to defend each and every act of the Ministers, is one which undermines the Ministers' sense of responsibility and throws dust in the eyes of electors. Debate has got to be something more than the art of keeping Ministers in office by sophistries. When it loses all efficacy as a means for teaching men to discriminate between right and wrong, the spirit of freedom will perish. You will never nourish its faint beginnings into life by methods like these.

* Report, par. 241, p. 196.

"It is no defence against these criticisms to say that I have taken out and quoted together the passages which insist on the unity of the Government, without reference to qualifying phrases scattered about these paragraphs. 'It is quite true that our plan involves some weakening of the unity of the executive. . . . It would be impossible to attain our object by a composite Government so composed that all its members should be equally responsible for all subjects.' * And, again, 'We are driven . . . to devising some dualism in the executive.' † The matter is not mended by phrases like these. A circle cannot be squared by saying that we are going to make it a little rectangular. You can stand with either foot on opposite principles only while they remain on paper. The moment they are brought into operation the rider will find himself either clinging to one of them, or else on the ground. 'The principle of unity within the Indian executives,' which the authors of the Report recognised as established in 1894 ‡, is just as vital to their own proposals. As there must be unity in the executives responsible to the Secretary of State, so there must be unity in the Ministries responsible to the electorates. You cannot by any process of smudging or blurring these responsibilities create any unity worth having between the two. In so far as you divide responsibility you destroy it. The whole secret of organisation consists in making it clear what each agent is answerable for and to whom. For this reason it is of the utmost importance that the forms employed should answer to the facts. In government every act should wear a label showing by whom it is taken and in obedience to whom. The acts of the executive council should show that they are taken in obedience to the Secretary of State, and those of Ministers, that they are done in pursuance of the charge laid on them by electorates. Indian electors cannot be expected to carry the schedule of transferred powers in their heads. If the scheme is to have educational value, no pains should be spared to remind them which are the acts of Government which issue from Ministers responsible to themselves. They should issue as the acts of the Governor taken on his Ministers' advice; while those of the Executive Council should issue as the acts of the Governor-in-Council. Under this scheme, for no intelligible reason, they are all to issue as the acts of the Governor-in-Council. The form is to be used deliberately to conceal from the elector acts done by his own agent from those done by agents responsible to the Secretary of State. This expedient is calculated to defeat the main object with which the scheme is designed.

"Personally, I have no fear of its ever coming into operation. The pretence of unity between these two organs of government is too thin to deceive anyone, and I cannot believe that Executive Councillors or Ministers would be found to submit to a position so false.

"In its attempts to reconcile dualism with unity the language of the Report reminds one of the Athanasian Creed. But here we are dealing not with methaphysics but with practical affairs. The mask of unity does not hide the dualism behind. It has only prevented its artificers from seeing how the dangers of dualism could be overcome if they looked them in the face. Such dangers there are unquestionably. The authors of every federal constitution have had to face them. In such areas as New York, Ontario, Victoria or the Transvaal they have had to provide for the co-existence of separate authorities side by side. But instead of masking the dualism, they emphasised it.

‡ Report, par. 34.

Chairman—continued.

"They never pretended that two governments answerable to different authorities could be one. All their care was spent in making it clear as possible to each and all, which were the functions, resources and agents assigned to each. In a word, their systems are designed to show who is answerable for doing whatever is done, and to whom each is answerable. When the introduction of the dual language crept into the schools of Ontario, it was not possible for anyone to suggest that the federal government was in fault. The situation would have been far more dangerous if it had been. The whole responsibility clearly rested with the Government of Ontario.

"The difficulty of drawing a clear line between the spheres of the two authorities is, of course, no slight one. A perfect demarcation is impossible. The authors of the Canadian constitution were not sufficiently careful in the matter, and were satisfied to leave a certain amount of overlapping. Forty years later Canadian experience was summed up in the one word of advice tersely given by Sir Wilfred Laurier to the South African Convention: 'Beware the pitfall of concurrent jurisdiction.'"

The Feetham Committee faces this question of concurrent jurisdiction under the title of mixed subjects in par. 60, p. 36 of their Report. In that section a procedure appropriate to those subjects is carefully thought out. This procedure appears to assume that the Executive Council and the Ministers will normally deliberate apart on matters which unquestionably belong to their respective spheres. I greatly hope that this will be so, and also that their decisions when promulgated will bear distinctive marks. On this subject, Section viii., p. 4 of the Memorandum of the Secretary of State on the Bill, speaks will tantalising vagueness: "The new Provincial Governments are to be of a composite character, and to contain both an official and a non-official, or popular element. On the official side they will be modelled on the existing Governments of the Presidencies, which have 'Council Governments.' Under this system the Government is carried on by a Governor assisted by an Executive Council, and official acts are performed in the name of the 'Governor in Council.' On the popular side the new Governments will consist of the Governor and of Ministers. . . . For the purpose of allotting to each section of this dual government its own sphere of duty the work of the Provincial Government will be divided into two parts: certain subjects, to be called 'Transferred subjects,' will be administered by the Governor acting with the Ministers in charge of the subject, while other subjects, to be called 'reserved subjects,' will remain in charge of the Governor-in-Council."

The Committee will note that inverted commas are used to indicate the words "Governor-in-Council" as a formula. But when we come to the words the Governor acting with the Minister in charge of the subject no inverted commas are inserted to indicate that this phrase is to be used to distinguish acts done by Ministers under transferred powers, from those done by the Governor-in-Council. We are left to conjecture whether the dominating motive is not to be an attempt to mask the dualism inherent in the scheme, by representing the acts of Ministers under the same label as those of the executive council, thus leaving electors to think that executive councillors are responsible for acts of their own Ministers. The dominating motive should be to leave the elector in no doubt whatever as to where the separate responsibility of every separate act rests. I hope the Committee will insist that all acts done in pursuance of transferred powers will be styled, "The Governor on the advice of his Ministers."

In this context I would urge that the Legislature should sit under a different name, and, if possible, in a different building, when dealing with the two different branches. I would keep the name "legislative council" for reserved subjects and call it "the

" the provincial assembly " when dealing with transferred subjects. And I am strongly in favour of allowing the assembly to elect its own speaker. I would call him by that name. Do let us make up our minds whether we are in for dualism or not. If we are then let the forms advertise the dualism instead of being used to mask it. Throughout I am thinking how to help the electorates forward on the road to self-government.

It is only when the position of the executive council is accurately defined that we can properly consider the relations of Ministers to each other and the Governor. The untenable proposal in the Report that ministers should be treated as responsible not to the Legislature but to their several constituencies, was obviously fatal to the principle of corporate responsibility. That proposal is now dropped. But clause 3 (3) still forbids corporate responsibility in terms. This prohibition is based, I believe, on reasons which have not come before the Committee. It is held by constitutional authorities that between Crown Colony and responsible government in the Colonies, each Minister was held separately responsible to the Governor and Legislature. Therefore it is argued that India must of necessity tread the same path. But that path was a course of experiment by which men had still to discover the mechanism whereby responsible government can be worked. They had to learn by making mistakes, by testing contrivances which proved unworkable in practice. Responsible government was achieved by discarding them. What service do we render to India by forcing her by statute to make the same mistakes, to retry all the discarded contrivances, when the reasons why they failed are now so clear in the light of actual experience? We are in great danger of worshipping mere precedent, of reading the letter of history instead of understanding its spirit. Precedents are useful as a guide only in so far as we take the pains to understand the natural principles they reveal. The principle of corporate responsibility was a discovery we owe to a breakdown in practice of separate responsibility. In every executive there must be unity as the Report in its earlier and really luminous passages shows.

To this it may be answered, " You have argued that dualism is possible by the careful separation of functions allocated to two different authorities. Does not the argument also apply to the separate portfolios of the Ministers? " Now from first to last I have never minimised the difficulties of dualism. I felt those difficulties in the scheme outlined in my letter to Mr. Bhupendra Nath Basu. When I was led to the conclusion that the existing provinces were too bulky for the purpose of a United States of India, I substituted the simple and well-tried process of specific devolution by a financial Government to several authorities with small areas. But I felt it a great additional advantage that the difficulty of two parallel Governments with coincident areas was avoided thereby. But in spite of the difficulty, I felt and feel that the experiment of two Governments for one great area is not unworkable and worth trying. But to complicate the experiment of dualism by imposing quadruplicity in one area seems to me madness. For that is what it means if ministers are to have a responsibility which is not only separate from that of the executive council but separate one from the other.

I ask the Committee to consider how the plan will operate in practice. On reserved subjects the executive council are normally to deliberate together. Their decisions are those of the majority. They are jointly responsible to the Governor, and if one is overruled by the others in matters belonging to his own Department and will not submit, he must go.

But are not Ministers also normally to deliberate together? Whatever you may say in acts of Parliament you may take it that they will. I add that they ought to do so, and the result will inevitably be that, on occasion, two Ministers will differ from the view held by the third on some point strictly within the scope of his own Department. Suppose, for instance, that the Minister of Education in Madras refuses to throw open all schools to the depressed classes and his colleagues supported by a majority in the legislative council, are against him. The Governor supports the majority and the Minister resigns. His successor must be someone in harmony with the majority, and will in practice be the choice of his colleagues. Or suppose the reverse, that the Minister of Education wishes to open the schools and his colleagues supported by a majority are averse to it. If the Governor dismisses the Minister of Education his successor will be practically chosen by his colleagues. But if the Governor will not dismiss the Minister of Education and insists in accordance with Clause 3 (3) in giving effect to his views, his colleagues will both resign and the Governor will be faced with an impasse. He cannot constitute a Ministry which has the support of the Legislature. The thing will not work. It is just one of those ill-designed safeguards which gets into the wheels, breaks the machine and brings it to a standstill.

I do not see how in actual working the Governor can from the outset avoid the ordinary and well-tried practice of sending for one man and asking him to choose his colleagues. And when that man resigns the whole Ministry should be ipso facto out of office. In practice one Minister must be Premier, and I don't believe the system will work unless he has at least two colleagues. That is why I should regret to see the office of Minister made incompatible with the holder pursuing his ordinary occupation.

I recommend that in Clause 3 (3) the words " his Ministers " be substituted for the words " the Minister in charge " in line 41, and that in line 2 over the page " the Minister " be changed to " Ministers."

8 (ii.). Do you think that the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsbilities (Clause 3 (3))?—The answer to this question entirely depends upon the real nature of the responsibilities imposed on the Governor. Reserved subjects are not in question. The manner in which mixed subjects should be handled is dealt with in paragraph 60 of the Feetham Report. There are also particular points coming within the scope of transferred subjects, notably in education, in which it may be necessary to reserve to the Governor the power of overruling his Ministers (see Feetham Report, paragraph 67). Apart from these specific reservations, I hold very strongly that the Governor should not interfere with decisions of Ministers, except by dismissing the whole Ministry. In doing so he must consider whether another Government can be formed which the Legislature will support, or, if not, whether to dissolve the Legislature. And if an election returns a House pledged to support the dismissed Ministry he is then face to face with the question whether his Executive Council must resume the whole of the transferred powers together.

I am decisively against the Governor rejecting the decisions of his Ministers except on points specified in his instructions, which points are, in fact, specifically withdrawn from the final responsibility of Ministers. For transferred subjects Ministers should be held responsible from first to last so long as they are left in their hands. Otherwise the Legislature and electorate will never know where the real responsibility rests; and such knowledge is, I maintain, vital to the educational efficacy of the scheme upon which its success or failure will depend. If the Governor thinks that a majority in the Legislature is not really behind Ministers, let him dismiss the Ministers. If he thinks that Ministers and Legislature are combining to override the real wishes of the electorate, let him form a new Ministry, if necessary from leaders outside the Legislature, and then test the matter by a dissolution. His function qua constitutional Governor is to hold a final power of attorney for the electorate, which enables him to refer matters to their decision in the last resort.

I go so far as to say that I would not treat questions of law and order as removing transferred subjects to the category of mixed subjects. If the Governor believes that some policy upon which Ministers are resolved will lead to civil disorders, let him record a solemn warning to the effect that, if his fears are justified, the Executive Council will have to resume the entire administration. Whenever such resumption takes place, let the Secretary of State appoint a Commission of Inquiry to advise whether it was justified and how long it should be continued. Let the Governor advise his Ministers, and in serious matters let him record his advice. But so far as final decisions are concerned I am altogether against any interference with the exercise by Ministers of transferred powers. But I say this assuming that Parliament means, if these powers are so exercised as to bring about a deadlock or civil disorder, that the power of recall is to be used without hesitation. I say this because I know that official circles in India cannot really conceive its use. The Civil Service contains men with more than the average strength of character. Their training is such as to develop that strength, so far at any rate as the details of administration are concerned. But collectively they are amazingly weak. The greatest danger to India and the most formidable obstacle in the path to responsible government is the inherent weakness of the government it now has. And this is simply because the weakest form of government is one which, however autocratic its powers on paper, has not behind it the will of an electorate regularly ascertained. The Civil Service do not believe in the possibility of resuming powers once transferred, because they do not believe that Parliament really believes in it. I am weighing my words when I say that many of them do not believe that Parliament really means to see them through in the discharge of the grave responsibilities which it leaves on their shoulders. I think they are wrong, but, if I am correct, it is of vital importance that Parliament should leave its agents in no doubt on the matter, and that is why I venture to say this.

The Nationalists genuinely believe that, if the power of recall is felt to be real, reactionary officials will create deadlocks and even disorders to bring it about. I am sure that they are wrong. But that is why I advise that any case of resumption of powers by the Governor should at once be made the subject of inquiry by a Commission appointed by the Secretary of State, the chairman of which should always be someone taken from outside India. If such a Commission should find that any official has been guilty of such conduct as the Nationalists fear, the offence should be visited by summary dismissal. That man will have been unfaithful to the best traditions of his Service.

I would make it clear that a Governor will be recalled if he is found to have abused his powers of resumption, or to have failed in anything which might have avoided their use. But I hope that the Committee will be just as emphatic in pronouncing that a Governor ought to be recalled who has shrunk from using those powers where they were necessary. Government is the indispensable basis of self-government. You will never found it on anything else.

I am against interference with the administration of transferred powers, because it blurs the responsibility. I am all in favour of making these powers as wide as possible, and therefore I rejoice to see that Mr. Feetham's Committee has advised the transfer of Higher Education.

I am in favour of making the power of recall a reality, because if Parliament is prepared to recall, where failure to the trust is proved, Parliament will also be much more ready to transfer further powers on the least sign that such transfer is justified. The belief that recall will be really used will beget a far deeper sense of responsibility in Ministers from the outset. They will think twice before they embark on courses which may lead to either deadlock or disorder. The principle goes right down to the root of these proposals, which rest on the well-tried method of experiment, upon which the constitutional achievements of the British Commonwealth are all based. Experiment means that where failure is proved you are prepared to go back and begin over again, as you are now doing with the Minto-Morley reforms. Unless the authors of this measure really intend that, it is throwing dust in the eyes of the public to profess that they mean to be guided by experience.

In question 1338, at the bottom of the second column on page 74, Mrs. Besant quotes Mr. Montagu as having said: "So far as transferred subjects are concerned, we shall have parted with our trusteeship and surrendered it to the representatives of the people of India." The words will be quoted as proving that Parliament has renounced its powers of recall. I think, therefore, that the matter should be settled by a definite pronouncement from this Committee. It is vital that India should not be allowed to think that promises have been made, which have not in fact been made. In all pronouncements on Indian policy it is of crucial importance to avoid language which admits of subtle inferences. The Pronouncement made by the Secretary of State on August 20, 1917, is a model to be imitated.

8. (iii). Do you think that the executive council should in all provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian?—I think that every Executive Council should contain at least one official European and one non-official Indian. I think that there should be a majority of European votes including the Governor's casting vote. Beyond this I have no opinion worth offering.

8. (iv). Do you think that the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council?—My answer is, Yes.

9. Referring back to questions 2, 3 and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the Legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed generally by clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and legislative powers as (i) suitable, or as (ii) unnecessarily severe, or as (iii) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament (clause 9)? 10. In particular, (i) do you think that the Legislature should have power with whatever limitations to vote supplies (clause 9 (2)). (ii) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—Sir Harry Stephen found himself unable to distinguish between influence and control (q. 5327). I ask the Committee to recognise the reality of the distinction and also of its practical importance. At this moment the Imperial Government is consciously exposing itself to the influence brought to bear on it through this Committee by spokesmen of the various Indian sections. The minds of Ministers and Members will be affected by that influence. Can any Member who has sat on this Committee after hearing all these witnesses from India doubt that he can now handle it with much greater knowledge? But you are not sharing with these witnesses the faculty of decision. That rests with Parliament and with no one else, and with it the final responsibility undivided and undiminished. It is just failure to recognise and implement the vital importance of this distinction which has thrown the whole course of Indian reform awry since 1909. That is why, as the earlier chapters of the Joint Report demonstrate, you cannot now build on the foundations then laid.

Now, personally, I want to see Ministers and elected members exposed at every point to the advice —that is to say, the influence—of the Governor and of his official advisers. But having experienced the effect of that influence, I want Ministers and the Legislature to feel that the final decision is theirs without reserve, and the final responsibility for its results theirs without qualification. Accordingly, their power of making such decisions must be put as much beyond question as is the power of a provincial government in Canada. The powers of Ministers and of the Legislature to which they are answerable must be fully commensurate to the functions imposed on them them. And my ultimate reason for all this is that the electorate may know for what they are responsible, and also for what they are not. It is only so that electorates can be strengthened for the bearing of heavier burdens.

The reason why I think that to begin with certain, and indeed most, functions should be reserved to the existing Government, is that if all these functions were at once imposed on electorates too small and too unexercised in the practice of self-government, the burden would break them down, chaos would ensue and the realisation of responsible government would be postponed. Therefore I urged so long ago as 1917 that all functions not specifically transferred should remain in the hands of officials responsible for discharging them to Parliament through the Secretary of State. I urged that in their exercise officials ought to be exposed as far as possible to the influence of Indian opinion. By that I mean that the system should be so devised as to ensure that officials before making decisions should have to hear the opinions of every section of Indians affected thereby. But having weighed those opinions, I mean that the final decision on matters for which officials are held responsible to Parliament must be made by those officials subject to Parliament and its mouthpiece, the Secretary of State; and therefore their power to make those decisions must lie beyond question. It is not merely that Parliament cannot hold them responsible unless the powers it confers are commensurate to the duties it imposes. It is also that the electorates must know what are the matters for which their own representatives are not responsible. Otherwise, as Colonel Pugh pointed out, with true political insight, Ministers will be judged, called to office and dismissed from office by reason of their conduct in respect of reserved powers, which involve questions even more contentious than those involved in the powers transferred. They will not be judged, as they should be, solely by reason of their conduct in respect of the powers transferred to their control (q. 6194).

It is necessary to speak plainly. The source of all this controversy lies in the fact that the Joint Report speaks with two voices on the main issue at stake. I will here repeat what I wrote on the subject to the Drafting Committee last year:—

"Parliament is responsible from first to last for the government of India in all its aspects. The Pronouncement of the 20th August affirms this principle, and the Report, by a series of illuminating quotations, (*) shows how careful the Supreme Government has been to assert it, whenever the Government of India or any provincial government, has attempted to call it in question. The details of legislation were, for the most part, left to legislatures constituted for this purpose in India. But till 1909 it was made clear that these legislatures must, in the last resort, accept the instructions of the Indian Executives, which were in turn bound by those of the Secretary of State as the agent and mouthpiece of Parliament. As a further consequence, it was laid down that no member of an executive might publicly question these restrictions. "The policy adopted is the policy of the Government as a whole, and as such must be accepted and promoted by all who decide to remain members of that Government." In these words "the principle of unity within the Indian Executives" was asserted. The authors of the Report endorse these views. They assert that "the official Government which is still responsible to Parliament" must be able to discharge its responsibility properly. (†) To that end provision must be made, if a provincial executive is to be held responsible for the government of the province. (‡) It must be able to get through its legislation on reserved subjects. (§) The Provincial Legislature must, in the last resort, have the means of passing whatever laws or voting whatever supplies they deem to be necessary for discharging the duties imposed upon them by Parliament. No less is implied in the quotations made in paragraphs 34, 67 and 68. The argument of Chapter VII. against the Congress League scheme involves that conclusion . . .

"In paragraph 34 the Report quotes from a despatch written to Lord Mayo from the Secretary of State in Mr. Gladstone's Government the following passage:—

"'The Imperial Government cannot, indeed, insist on all the members of the Governor-General's Council, when assembled for legislative purposes, voting for any measure which may be proposed, because on such occasions some members are present who are not members of the Government and not official servants of the Crown. But the Act which added these members to the Council for a particular purpose made no change in the relations which subsist between the Imperial Government and its own executive officers. That Government must hold in its hands the ultimate power of requiring the Governor-General to introduce a measure, and of requiring also all the members of his Government to vote for it.'

"In these words is affirmed the self-evident proposition that no Executive can continue to discharge its functions unless it can in the last instance secure the legislation without which such functions cannot be discharged. In sections 67 and 68 we are told that the same truth was recognised by Lord Dufferin's Committee. 'No matter to what degree the liberalisation of the Councils may now take place, it will be necessary to leave in the hands of each Provincial Government the ultimate decision upon all important questions and the paramount control of its own policy.'

"The authors of the Report frankly endorse these conclusions:—

"'Upon this point we defer to the experience of history, and we draw from it the plain conclusion that if the Government is to be carried on, Legislature and Executive must in essentials be in harmony. Legislation is a necessary attribute of government, because it is the means by which Government secures fresh powers when it feels the need of them for attaining its end. But in the hands of the Assembly it may become a weapon to paralyse the Government. Whenever the Legislature distrusts the Executive it can always restrain or control its activities by specific provisions inserted in an Act. There is no clear line between administrative and executive functions, and it would be perfectly open to an Assembly which distrusted its Executive practically to assume charge of the Administration, and, as Lord Bryce says, to reduce its Government to the position of a bank staff vis-a-vis the directors. That is a position into which no Parliamentary Government ever allows itself to be forced; and it would be an impossible position for a nominated Government in India. An Executive which is independent of its Legislature, as the Indian Executive have hitherto been, can carry on the Government in virtue of authority derived from without; a party Executive can govern because it interprets the will of the people as represented by the Assembly; but wherever, as in Canada or Malta, attempts have been made to set up an irremovable Executive and a popular Assembly, acute conflict has ensued and has resulted in either an advance to popular government or a return to autocracy. Parliamentary government avoids deadlocks by making the Executive responsible to the Legislature. Presidential government limits deadlocks because all the organs of the State must ultimately submit League scheme in their earlier chapters, are nailed But a Legislature elected by the people, coupled with a Governor appointed by a distant power, is a contrivance of fomenting dissensions and making them perpetual. We believe that in India, where the two sides are divided by race and also by differences of standpoint, the discord would be much more serious than it has ever been in the Empire's history. (Report, par. 167, pp. 138-9.)

"Again and again this position is reaffirmed:—

"'If responsible government cannot be conceded at once, as, indeed, the scheme implies, and if some measure of responsibility is yet to be given, then means must be found of dividing the sphere of administration into two portions, and for each of these there must be a part of the Executive which can in the last resort secure its way from a legislative

lative organ which is in harmony with it; and there must also be means of securing that both halves of the machine work together.' (Report, par. 174, p. 144.)

"'Our aim must be to secure to the official Executive the power of protecting effectually whatever functions are still reserved to it and to the Government of India, of intervening in all cases in which the action of the non-official Executive or Council affects them to their serious prejudice. For otherwise the official Government which is still responsible to Parliament may be unable to discharge its responsibility properly.' (Report, par. 240, p. 195.)

"'We now turn to a consideration of the work of the Legislative Councils. Assuming that they have been reconstituted with elective majorities, and that the reserved and transferred subjects have been demarcated in the way suggested, let us consider how the Executive Government is to be enabled to secure the passing of such legislation or such supplies as it considers absolutely necessary in respect of the reserved services. For we must make some such provision if we are going to hold it responsible for the government of the province.' (Report, par. 247, pp. 200-1.)

"With such statements of principle before him, the reader naturally looks with some confidence to the practical proposals of the authors for giving effect to them. But what do we find? The Executive's ultimate power to pass the legislation it requires depends upon a Committee upon which the Governor is 'to nominate a bare majority exclusive of himself.'(*) This can only mean majority of one, exclusive of the Governor's casting vote, in any case a desperately narrow margin of safety considering the vicissitudes of health in India. I have seen a Provincial Government beaten on a motion owing to the illness of one official. But the Governor is bound by further restrictions. 'Of the members so nominated no more than two-thirds should be officials.' In plain words, a clear majority on the Committee are to be members in no way amenable to the Governor's authority. A Bill may present a number of contentious points all vital to the Government's position.

"We must hold in mind that the measures to which the procedure applies are such as the Governor has certified as 'essential to the discharge of his responsibility for the peace or tranquillity of the province or of any part thereof, or for the discharge of his responsibility for the reserved subjects.' The measure is first discussed by the Legislative Council. The discussion may make it clear either that a majority or else that the whole of the Indian members are opposed to the measure. It is then to be referred to the Grand Committee, which is not a Standing Committee, but a body chosen ad hoc. The Report mentions a Committee of 40. Its composition would then be as follows:—

19 members elected by the elected members by proportional representation.
6 non-officials nominated by the Governor.
1 the Governor himself.

It is, in plain words, to be a body packed by the Governor from the minority to overrule the opinion of the majority on the Legislative Council. Where opinion is divided amongst the elected members of the Legislative Council, the Governor can nominate unofficial members rom the minority with some hope of their support. The transferable vote may operate further to strengthen his minority on the Grand Committee. But even so it is hard to conceive a procedure likely to prove more exasperating in practice.

"There are, however, plenty of cases on record in which every Indian member has voted against the Government. In these cases (and they are certain to recur), where is the Governor to find the six unofficial members required to pass his measure? It is not, moreover, as though the passage of a Bill depended on a single division. Dozens of amendments can be introduced, any one of which may destroy the utility of the measure. The absence or defection of one or two unofficial nominees at any one of a number of divisons may lead to a breakdown. The authors of the Report are themselves driven to admit the weakness of their own proposal:—

* Report, par. 252.

"'It may be objected that such a Grand Committee so composed offers the official Executive no absolute guarantee that its measure will get through. We agree that this is the case; but there is no such guarantee at present. In a Grand Committee of 40 members there could be 14 officials, and we consider that no great harm will ensue if Government defers legislative projects which are opposed by the whole elected element and for which it cannot secure the support of six out of the seven members whom the Governor has it in his power to select from the whole body of the non-official members of the Council.' (Report, par. 252, p. 204.)

"A lamer conclusion I have never read. We are told again and again in emphatic language that every executive must in the last resort be able to secure the legislation it requires. In the face of all this, we are now told 'that no great harm will ensue if Government defers legislative projects,' when the opposition of the legislators they do not control is too strong for them. And why speak of deferring these projects? Another election is scarcely likely to weaken the Legislative Council's opposition, and then no remedy remains but an ordinance by the Government of India, or else an act of the Imperial Government. Meanwhile, the Governor must continue to govern without powers which he solemnly certified to be 'essential to the discharge of his responsibility.' He will forfeit his own self-respect and deserve to lose that of the public unless he resigns.

"In Section 277 we are told that in provincial matters the affirmative power of the Executive can be less decisively used than in Indian matters, and the reason given is that provincial matters are less important and the Government's responsibility to Parliament not so close. I venture to question both these statements. During the period of transition the Governor is to remain responsible for order. That responsibility is second in importance to no other, and therefore, in terms of the Report, it is to be reserved to the Governor. Whenever it can be transferred to Ministers, the province will be ripe for full responsible Government. So long as it is reserved, the Governor is responsible to Parliament for maintaining order. The fact that he takes instructions from the Viceroy and the Secretary of State, and not from the Cabinet or Parliament direct, does not affect the position. He is responsible to the British Government for the maintenance of internal order in his province. For the discharge of that all-important function laid upon him, he needs powers no less decisive than those vested in the Government of India for the powers reserved to them."

The opening chapters of this Report in their fearless analysis of history and principle deserve to stand with those of Durham. But, unlike Durham and his great executant Elgin, the authors shrink from the application of their own principles to practice. They follow the argument of Durham and also Professor Lowell in his masterly verification of Durham's teaching from subsequent experience. The principles of the Minto-Morley reform, as carried to their logical conclusion in the Congress League scheme in their earlier chapters, is nailed to the counter for all time. Then, breaking new ground of their own, they elect for the principle of specific devolution. Scheduled powers are to be transferred to Ministers responsible to elected councils and their electors. All other powers are to be reserved to the official Governments responsible to the Secretary of State. But when the highly elaborated mechanism through which these powers are to be exercised, with its wheels turning this way, and its wheels turning that way, comes to be examined it proves to be nothing but an ingenious contrivance for re-introducing in the sphere of reserved subjects the whole principle underlying the Minto-Morley and Congress League schemes. Behind a screen of Grand Committees and a Council of State the the clear principles enunciated in the earlier chapters of the Report are quietly jettisoned.

The whole answer to these questions you have put to me depends upon whether you really mean to give your agents the power of decision upon matters in which you make them responsible to yourselves. I speak to the Committee as the mouthpiece and ear of Parliament in this matter. In reserved subjects where do you mean the power of decision to lie? Do you, in the words of the Joint Report, "consider that no great harm will ensue if Government defers legislative projects which are opposed by the whole elected element," when upon such projects may depend the peace of a province and therefore the peace of India? Why, then, did the Secretary of State and the Viceroy carry their measures the other day in the teeth of every elected member? They cannot plead that the attitude of those members would have differed if they had represented the full franchise projected by the Southborough Committee. The answer is that they believed that they could not discharge the trust laid on them by Parliament unless the elected members were overruled. Why ask, then, that future Governors should be placed in a position which they themselves are not willing to accept? It is not proposed that elected members should be asked to take on themselves the responsibilities of the Governor when they deny him the power to govern. This contrivance means that the power of final decision is to rest nowhere, and that government is in the last analysis to cease. Nor does it help matters to say that in the last instance you have to fall back upon the Governor-General's power to enact an ordinance. When the friction of deadlock has raised public feeling to the flash-point, the exercise of the Viceroy's last residuary powers is simply equivalent to proclaiming a state of siege, to suspension of the constitution itself, because your constitution has broken down. It is a plain admission that revolution is afoot and can only be met by martial law. The functions of the Viceroy are merged thereby into those of the Commander-in-Chief. I am asking you to give India a constitution which will not break down, because it is one through which Government can govern without resort to arms. I urge it because any resort to arms in India disturbs for the time being and for long afterwards the atmosphere in which alone the delicate plant of self-government can grow. You have the warning of Ireland at your doors.

The issue has been put squarely in the evidence before you. Lord Islington asked Mr. Banerjea: "I suppose you would qualify the word 'bare' by making it an effective majority?" (q. 1175). The answer was "No. That is to say, it ought not to be such a majority as would in any case give the Governor a majority. It would be a bare majority which would enable the Governor to pass only such measures as were acceptable." Then on page 234, column 1, Mr. Sastri remarks: "In the Grand Committee under the Joint Report the elected members and the nominated non-official members together would still be in a very considerable majority over the official members, and, therefore, there is preserved this right—it may be academic to a large extent—but a legal right of refusing Government measures as presented to us in the Grand Committee." But whether this legal right is really academic may be judged from the answer given by Mr. Samarth to Mr. Bennett (q. 2596): "Is it still the case in India that legislators who have been nominated by the Government are under the impression, many of them, that it is their duty to go with the Government always and vote with them?" Mr. Samarth's answer was "No."

I leave aside the opinion of British officials on this subject and turn to the evidence of Lord Carmichael, the most popular Governor who has ever ruled an Indian Province. When Mr. Montagu asked him (q. 5795): "Do you think that in a province it is wise or necessary to give to the Governor an absolute right to pass a law, which not even one of the non-official members of his Legislative Council will support?" Lord Carmichael replied:

"Yes, I think it is, because if he is a man who would do it wrongly, he ought not to be there."

Here Lord Carmichael touches on a point which deserves the careful attention of this Committee. In another part of his evidence he argues that all Governors of major provinces should be brought from outside. I agree with him. I also agree with him in thinking that the success or failure of this great experiment will largely depend upon the quality of the Governors who can be found to serve. To me it seems that a man so qualified would have the political insight to say to a Secretary of State: "If you ask me to make myself responsible to you for the reserved functions, I must be the final judge, until you recall me, of the legislation required to give me the power to discharge them." I think he would say with Lord Carmichael: "If you do not think me a fit judge of those powers don't appoint me. At any rate, I will not accept the appointment without them." On similar grounds Cornwallis refused the appintment of Governor-General in 1786, and Parliament had to give him the necessary powers before he would accept office. He had the insight to see that the root of Hastings' trouble was not an excess of power, but the fact that he was driven to intrigue by division of authority. As Lord Carmichael says of the Grand Committee: "I do not like it altogether, and one of the reasons why I do not like it is that I think it will help to increase the risk of political intrigue" (q. 5921).

The one clear solution of the whole difficulty is clearly indicated in the able evidence given by Mr. Aiyar. Independent testimony coming from this quarter is so important that I propose to quote it at length. On page 88, col. 1, in answer to question 10, Mr. Aiyar says:—

"I would oppose the institution of Grand Committees, especially in view of the suggestions made by the Government of India, which proceed on the erroneous basis of the absence of independent political thought, and on the assumption that every elected member must vote against the Government. The disadvantage of the official bloc has been perpetuated, and smaller bodies than even the present Councils are brought into existence. It has been argued that the Grand Committee affords scope for persuasion on the part of the elected member, but this process can take place in the Council itself without a reduplication of machinery. The Grand Committee may be abolished, and the Governor may assume responsibility for cases needing affirmative legislation, subject to sanction on the part of the Government of India or of the Secretary of State, and the inevitable review of policy by the Select Committee and Commission."

The Committee will note that Mr. Aiyar was speaking as Vice-President of the All-India Home Rule League and that he says this in his written answer to replies. In oral examination he steadily and repeatedly reinforced this view. On page 91, cols. 1 and 2, he says:—

"If the Governor has made up his mind that a particular course is possible, there is no necessity for creating a chamber which is merely bringing into operation what his idea is, and it seems to me that the only argument which was advanced in regard to this matter—namely, the utility of a full discussion before the Council, would apply equally well when I say that the conditions of the case may be met by the discussion in the Legislative Council and the Governor taking action after such discussion. Why import a second chamber, especially of the composition suggested by the Government of India, if all that it means is that the Government must have its way? Let the Governor say so and have done with it."

When Mr. Bennett asked him (q. 1554): "Would a Grand Committee reduce the disfavour with which the action of the Government was received?" Mr. Aiyar replied: "I am afraid not, as it is sought to be constituted. On the other hand, it will give rise to factious spirits in the Council tending to create two sets of people, one of whom would be termed the favoured of the Government, who are in favour of its policy, and the other being the constituent opponents."

Tackled once more on the subject next day by Lord Sinha and Lord Midleton, he resolutely maintained his position. Mr. Banerjea also says that if Indian members are not given the power to control legislation on reserved subjects he would prefer the responsibility to rest with the Governor outright (q. 1105-6). In para. 34 of his minute of dissent, dated March 5, 1919, Sir Sankaran Nair endorses the spirit of this view.

The views of Mr. Aiyar are confirmed by the great authority of Lord Carmichael. In question 5689, the Chairman said to him: "I think this is a most important point. With your experience will you tell us how you see the position of the Governor under the proposed scheme?"

To which Lord Carmichael replied:—

"I think it would be a much more difficult position, I admit, and I think he would have to exercise his own responsibility more than he does at present. He would not rely as much on his advisers, because after all the Governor has very great powers at the present time if necessary, and I think he would have to exercise his powers more in future than he does at present. I am not at all enamoured of the system as proposed of the Grand Committee; I am inclined to think that, if not at once, very soon, Indians will begin to think they see through it. It is rather taking a responsibility off the Governor and putting it on other people, who are not perhaps as fitted to take the responsibility as the Governor is. I do think that in India—and, mind you, I have been a Governor in Australia also—though you may say the things are perfectly different—I do think that in India, just because the Indians have not had so much responsibility themselves, they are prepared to see a Governor doing what they do not like and to think that very likely he is right to an extent which certainly the Australians would not be."

Of the Grand Committee he says (q. 5692) that "the Governor is not the least certain of the nominated members. It seems to me it is just on the most dangerous occasions when the Governor would be in his weakest position there." In reply to the Chairman he goes on to say that in the position of the Governor he would not feel himself sufficiently equipped for the fulfilment, in every case, of the responsibility which Parliament continues to lay upon him. It should be left to the Governor to discharge that responsibility. "Let him do it off his own bat." The plan of the scheme he feels is to conceal the responsibility, not to give him full power to exercise it. "I do not think we should conceal the responsibility" (q. 5698). It is needless to quote further the evidence in which this important witness continues to enforce his position.

Whenever one broaches these views, as I have done many a time in India, to my official friends, they always replied: "Do you mean we should revert to government by ordinance?" And they seemed to think that I had gone out of my mind. I cannot recall a single official who thought such a thing could be faced. The Government of India see clearly enough that the Grand Committees as at present designed will lead to a deadlock. But they cling to the idea of having enough officials subject to secret orders to vote the Indian members down. So long ago as 1841 Sir George Cornwall Lewis uttered a prophetic warning against the danger of mocking a dependency with the semblance of parliaments, when responsibility cannot be conceded. But after-generations, deaf to this warning, created Legislatures which they dared not trust with the power of decision, securing the Executive by a troop of official members voting under its secret orders. We talk of our influence on the East: but one sometimes wonders whether the East has not a profounder influence on us. Our system in India is overgrown with a tangle of make-believe, and I hope Parliament will tear it down. If, as Englishmen believe, they are of all men the simplest and most honest, then let them realise that the true gifts they have for India are those drawn from their own store. Mr. Aiyar tells you that so long as you retain an element of autocracy in your government of India, she prefers that element to appear as such. It is the only government she has ever known. Do not cover it with a veneer of popular institutions too thin to deceive a child. If you want to make men in India give them verities and not shams.

Lord Carmichael refused to be scared by this terrible word "ordinance" (q. 5785). Now why is this word so useful as a weapon against the advocates of direct methods? The real reason is that "ordinance" has so far stood for decrees suddenly imposed without previous discussion in detail. Mr. Montagu asked Sir William Meyer (q. 6902): "What about an ordinance as contrasted with that form of legislation?" Sir William replied: "There is all the difference in the world; an ordinance is an autocratic Act of the Government. There is no necessary discussion on it, whereas in the Council of State a Bill will be put forward, there will be a Select Committee, there will be discussion and debate and amendments, and very often, as happens at present, the Government may find that it is advisable to accept some of the amendments. That would not arise at all in the case of ordinances." As the Joint Report itself says (q. 276) the power of ordinance "merely provides a means of issuing decrees after private discussion in the Executive Council, and without opportunities for public debate or criticism." Exactly. The odium raised by the word is mainly due to a very national distrust of edicts issued without any previous discussion in public. It was Lord Dalhousie who saw the mischief of such a practice and put an end to it except for rare and pressing occasions. Let us think for a moment what happens at present when Government has to pass unpopular measures. Officials may neither speak nor vote except in accordance with the Government orders, but when the Governor has made up his mind that a Bill must be carried or that some amendment designed to emasculate it must be rejected, secret orders, which are no secret, are given by him to official members to vote it down. It is a humiliating sight to see the mechanical way in which the hands of the officials go up, when the division is called, and the solemn parade which is made of counting them. The Governor might just as well count his own fingers, if it were not for the hazards of fever and dysentery. In the plan before you in the Bill your margin of safety in matters affecting the peace of India will often depend on the reading of a clinical thermometer.

There are times when one knows, and the Indian members know, that Government divisions would not be won if officials were free to speak and vote. What firm foundation can any system of government find in a hollow pretence like this? To an outsider the thing is a degradation of highly intelligent officials in the presence of their Indian colleagues. But this prostitution of popular government has one really poisonous effect. Year after year British officials are paraded in public as a political party in opposition to Indian Nationalism. The bitter antagonism developed between the British Services and educated Indians in the last decade, is, I believe, as much due to this cause as to any other. Those who grow up with a sham and get used to it become blind to the mischief it works. How the authors of the Joint Report could have written sections 86 and 87 and then advocate a continuance of this practice on the Grand Committees and the Council of State passes my understanding.

The point is that the Governor now gets his way, and, under the Bill, is to get his way when he can, only by secret orders given to official voters. If Parliament decides that there are matters in which he as their agent must get his way, why should he not do it as Mr. Aiyar and Lord Carmichael suggest, by issuing his orders openly and directly? The principle is perfectly plain and easy of application in practical procedure. When a Bill is moved, let a motion that it be not read a second time be prefaced by the words, "That the Governor be requested." Let all amendments be prefaced by the same words. Then when the Governor has made up his mind that he must carry his measure or that he cannot accept an amendment which has been voted by the Council, let him say outright that he cannot accept the request, and put his reasons on record.

It

It must be realised that the system here advocated as applicable to legislation on reserved subjects is simply that which already obtains on supply, and which, under the Bill, is still to be applied to votes in the estimates on reserved subjects. I am entirely in favour of the system under which the vote of the Legislative Council is to be taken on the Estimates, and the Governor is to take the responsibility of saying whether he accepts the vote or not. The principle is just the same whether it is applied to money Bills or to ordinary legislative measures. The whole situation is cleared by this honest procedure. In the first place, the Indian members are not forced into artificial solidarity by the presence of a phalanx of European voters. Genuine divisions of opinoin have a far better chance of coming to the surface and of being heard. The Governor has therefore a far better means of knowing what genuine Indian opinion is before he makes up his mind. The procedure meets the objections which the word "ordinance" is used to raise. Legislation will be discussed as fully and in as much detail as at present, and with greater freedom.

In the second place, the opinion of the Indian majority comes upon record. Their responsibility for seeing that it is placed before Government is properly discharged; thirdly, the Governor's responsibility for final decision is plainly shown and made to rest where it ought to rest. By the Governor I do not here mean the Governor in Council. I agree with Lord Carmichael that under the new scheme his personal authority should be much more marked. After listening to his official advisers the final responsibility of legislative decisions should rest upon him. He can be recalled. You cannot easily dismiss a whole Executive Council.

Fourthly, you get rid of the official phalanx of voters once for all. At the same time, the Government is left with perfect elasticity as to official speakers. It can call to the Council the officials best qualified to enlighten it on the measure before it. The saving of the time of busy British officials is itself an important economy. Moreover, when officials are publicly attacked, it would often be much more satisfactory to everyone if they came to the Council to defend themselves.

Finally, by this straightforward method you avoid all the ingenious complications of the Grand Committee with its phalanx of official voters, and the atmosphere of intrigue in which the Governor will be involved when he is endeavouring to pack it with Indian members who can be trusted, as he hopes, to save his face.

The Committee will now readily understand why I endorse the view advanced by nearly all witnesses from India, that in all the larger provinces the Governors should be taken from outside the Service. India is full of historical survivals which are mere anacronisms. I fail to see any practical reason for maintaining the present contrast between the simplicity of government establishments in the United Provinces and the Punjab and the semi-viceregal pomp with which they are surrounded in Bengal, Madras and Bombay. I should like to see some mean found between the two, but to have them all put on exactly the same footing in respect of emoluments, ceremony and everything else. After all, the Governor of the United Provinces rules more than twice as many people as the Governor of Bombay. But an end should be put once for all to an idea which undoubtedly exists that Governors are occasionally chosen, not for their fitness to rule an Indian province, but because they are not wanted in England. Such appointments, if made, are nothing more nor less than subordination of Indian to British interests on the part of the Government which makes them. India should not be the lumber-room of English political society.

I should very much like to see experienced Dominion statesmen included in these appointments, for they have what British politicians have not—experience of provincial self-government.

I am not shutting my eyes to the effect on the Service of depriving its members of the principal prizes to which they have looked. I think it may have a most serious effect on recruitment if great conspicuous figures like Sir Bartle Frere, Sir Alfred

Lyall and Sir Anthony Macdonnell are a thing of the past. The Commonwealth cannot moreover afford to place men of this calibre on the shelf at 50. I am strongly of opinion that the Dominion Governments in Imperial Conference should be asked to approve of the principle of opening existing Governorships to them. And when an Indian civilian has served a successful term as the Constitutional Governor of New Zealand or of an Australian State, I should like to see him regarded as eligible for an Indian Governorship. Such an experience will make a great difference in the outlook of an Indian civilian, and with it I should say he would make an Indian Governor of the most valuable type. He will certainly be more useful on the Government of India.

Certain details of procedure remain to be sketched. I have already suggested that the body of legislators when dealing with reserved subjects should be called the Legislative Council, and when dealing with transferred subjects the Provincial Assembly. I have also said that I should like to see the Assembly elect its own Speaker. I should like it to frame its own standing orders, subject to the Governor's approval. I do not think the Governor should enter it except to open it and on special occasions. Members of the Executive Council might have the right to call officials into its councils at their own discretion.

I should like to see the Governor nominate the fittest person he can find, whether inside or outside the Legislative Council, to preside over it. He himself should have a seat apart, from which he can constantly watch the proceedings, as a rule taking the chair only to announce when he cannot accept a resolution. He would thus be kept so far as possible outside the area of controversy, entering the scene only in a rather solemn way to discharge his responsibility of final decison against the opinion of the majority. Measures within the scope of reserved or mixed subjects should begin with the words "Be it enacted by the Governor," those on transferred subjects "Be it enacted by the Governor by and with the advice of the Provincial Assembly." Indians will thus know whose fiat they are obeying in each case.

On the kindred matter of the joint or separate purse, I will here quote what I wrote to the Drafting Committee:—

"Nowhere is this maxim (beware the pitfall of concurrent jurisdiction) more important than in the sphere of revenue, for defects of government have a way of revealing themselves in terms of finance. Where you have two collateral authorities it is vital to define their several responsibilities, and it is largely by distinguishing their respective resources that this definition is achieved. If limited functions are assigned to an authority with a separate mainspring, it is of vital importance to see that the resources upon which that authority can draw are limited with equal or even with greater accuracy. And this is of cardinal importance where the mainspring is electoral, and especially when, as in this case, the authority to which all other powers and resources are reserved is not also responsible to an electorate. The whole art of responsible government is achieved by the hard process of learning that you cannot have the moon by crying for it, that the ends you desire must be accommodated to your means. Nowhere can this hard lesson be learned so pointedly or so quickly as in the field of finance. What would happen indeed if no definite resources were assigned to Municipal or District Councils, and if they and their electorates were left to feel that their annual programme was only limited by what they could squeeze out of the general Government? The main value of the system, as a school of responsible government, lies in its efficacy in making the municipal electorates see that their programme of public services must depend on the sacrifice they are prepared to make in their private resources.

"In passing, it is worthy of remark that those who denounce dyarchy as impossible usually advise as an alternative the complete responsibility of Municipal and District Councils. They overlook the fact that this is itself an example of the dyarchy on a smaller scale. In the case of Municipal and District Councils the problem has been solved by a method well well known in India as settlement, an example of which will be found in the so-called contracts made in 1914 between those bodies and the Government of the United Provinces. The term and the method by which they are made are alike drawn from the experience gained in distinguishing the resources assigned to the provinces on the one hand and to the Government of India on the other. The origin and evolution of these quasi-permanent settlements between the India and Provincial Governments is described in the fifth chapter of the Report. Up to 1861 all revenues whatsoever were credited to the Government of India. That Government doled out what it chose to the provinces. The provinces wrung what they could from the Government of India. We are told on the contemporary authority of Sir Richard Stracey that "the distribution of the public income degenerated into something like a scramble in which the most violent had the advantage, with very little attention to reason. As local economy brought no local advantage, the stimulus to avoid waste was reduced to a minimum."(*) The officers who scrambled and showed violent unreason and so little zeal to avoid waste when placed in this position were all the highly trained and educated British subordinates to the Secretary of State. Yet that is the very position in which the Report now proposes to place the Executive Councillors and Ministries, the one mainly European and responsible to the Secretary of State, and the other Indian amateurs in government responsible to an Indian electorate. The rich experience of India in the need for and methods of making such quasi-permanent settlements is set aside. The functions assigned to the Ministries are to be determined on the advice of Commissions directly responsible to Parliament, and to be revised from time to time by the same machinery. But not so the resources to be assigned to them. Those are to be left to an annual scramble between the Executive Council and the Ministers which must develop into an open conflict between the Legislative Council, a conflict which can only be resolved by the personal fiat of the Governor. But the Governor will already be identified with the apportionment framed by the Executive Council. It is no rash prediction that under this system every Governor will have every year to use his extraordinary powers to overrule not only the Ministers but also the Legislative Council. He is placed in the cruel position of having to decide once a year an issue to which he is a party, in a manner which touches popular feeling at its most delicate point. Every year his justice will be impugned. He will be made the target of public execration in the Legislature, on the platform and in the Press. This does not matter to a periodic Commission appointed by the Secretary of State. They have no personal interest in the division of the revenues, and no permanent authority to be weakened by personal attacks.

"A more potent device for embroiling the two authorities with each other, or for antagonising the British Government and the Indian electorate, can scarcely be imagined. But an even worse feature of the system is its tendency to distract Ministers, legislators and the electorate from the business of self-taxation. Their energies will be directed to squeezing the Governor and his Executive Council. The proposal is one which puts a premium on leaders with a genius for baiting the officials. I have said elsewhere, and I take this opportunity of affirming, that Indian electorates, legislators and Ministers will not begin to learn the elements of responsible government until they have acquired the habit of taxing themselves.

"The arguments in paragraph 256 against the obvious expedient of periodic settlements framed by an authority independent of both parties are perhaps the least convincing in the whole Report. Strangely enough, it admits that "the transferred services are generally those which stand in greater need of development."() The converse must therefore be true, that it is much easier to say from experience what proportion of the existing revenue should be allocated to the reserved subjects. The problem presents no greater difficulties than those which had to be faced in framing the existing quasi-permanent settlements between the provinces and the Government of India. To effect a final and complete separation between Indian and provincial finance as proposed in the Report is a far more formidable task than to make periodic divisions of revenue correlative to the reserved and transferred powers. In section 210 it is contemplated that certain sources of new taxation must be appropriated to the provinces. These should, of course, be divided between the Executive Council and the Ministry. Both Executives should be made to feel that they cannot exceed their fixed assignments without having to face the ordeal of proposing new taxation.

"For reasons which are not touched upon in this Report, the want of elasticity in provincial revenue in regions where the permanent settlement does not obtain is, I believe, greatly exaggerated. In 1812 90 per cent. of the unearned increment accrued to the State. In the course of the last century the proportion of the unearned increment collected by the State has been steadily reduced until it is now less than 50 per cent.

"But this is not all. Where the produce of the land has increased since the last settlement by more than a certain percentage, the Settlement Officers are instructed by the Revenue Department of the Government of India to cut their assessment down to a certain figure. I was assured by one Settlement Officer that, acting under the orders of this Department, he was obliged to sacrifice lakhs of revenue which would have accrued to the State had he been free to place a full and fair valuation on the land.

The amount of revenue which would otherwise have accrued to the State has thus been reduced by the Revenue Department of the Government of India in two ways. In the first place, the proportion of the net assets collected has been reduced from time to time from 90 per cent. to less than 50 per cent. In the second place, where the increase in value has been exceptionally rapid it has been written down in the books of the Government. The annual loss to the public revenues must have amounted to very many crores of rupees. I doubt whether the benefit has in any sensible degree accrued to the classes who actually cultivate the land. Broadly speaking, it has gone to swell the rentier class of non-producers. In the ryotwari districts the produce of the land is in theory divided between the cultivator and the State. The reduction in the proportion of revenue taken by the State has been so great that the former ryot has in many cases been able to sublet his holding to another cultivator, the rent sufficing to support him in idleness after he has paid the amount due to the Treasury. In Madras I am told these ryotwari tenures are freely purchased as investments by Vakils, Banias and men of means who have no idea of cultivating the land themselves. They freely change hands in the property market. In so far as this happens, the intention of the ryotwari system, as devised by Munro, is defeated. Through the steady and progressive reduction in the proportion of revenue collected by the State, a middleman, revenue collector, or landlord, indistinguishable in practice from the Zemindar, has slipped in between the cultivator and the Treasury. The system of ryotwari is, in fact, degenerating into that of Zemindari.

"In reading the minutes of the Revenue Department of the Government of India, one gets the impression that its chief concern is to keep down the revenue. The reason lies in the consciousness on the part of alian rules of their own weakness in governing a people even so submissive as those of India. As Lord Cromer said, such a system can only maintain itself at all by providing government on the cheapest possible terms. Hence the policy of keeping down the revenue collected from land to the lowest possible limits has become the fixed tradition of the Revenue Department.

"These vast remissions of revenue have not been made by Parliament. It would be interesting to know know whether the successive reductions were actually ordered by the Secretary of State or after full consideration in Executive Council by the Government of India. One would scarcely be surprised to find that the pressure on settlement officers to keep down the valuations originated only in minutes from the Revenue Department. But certain it is that they have not been made by any Legislature, nor as the result of any discussion in open debate. In this matter the Government of India, with or without direct orders of the Secretary of State, has acted in its capacity as the ultimate landlord of all British India which is not permanently settled, and also as a landlord of the most indulgent kind. These vast remissions of revenue have been made by virtue of orders issued in the privacy of the Revenue Department of the Central Government.

"The signatories to the Report advise that the whole proceeds of the land revenue should now be transferred to the Provincial Governments. In examining the arguments against this course, they say: We are told that in the days of dawning popular government in the provinces, it would be well that the Provincial Government should be able to fall back on the support of the Government of India (as, if the heads were still divided, it would be able to do) when its land revenue policy was attacked. But it is just because divided heads are not regarded as merely a financial expedient, but are, and so long as they survive, will be, viewed as a means of going behind the Provincial Government to the Government of India, that we feel sure that they should be abolished. We propose therefore to make land revenue, together with irrigation, wholely provincial receipts. (*).

"From these words their intention must be understood to be that in future the Revenue Department of the Government of India, which has hitherto dictated the land-revenue policy of the provinces, will, in future, have nothing to say to it. With this conclusion I broadly agree, but the treatment of the problem is scarcely equal to its gravity. There is vastly more in the land-revenue policy of India than the mere collection of money, and one cannot but feel that the main issues involved should have been set out. It is the standing defect of official papers in India that they are written by experts for experts, who are presumed by the writers to be fully cognisant of the system as a whole, with all its implications. They resemble financial disquisitions written for bankers by bankers. The great merit in this Report is that so little previous knowledge is required in the readers. But the passage under discussion is an exception, and I do not feel sure that its authors quite faced the issues for themselves. I propose therefore to raise a few questions which suggest themselves to one with a cursory knowledge of this most technical subject.

"To begin with, are there no limits to the devolution of authority which can be delegated to Provincial Governments in the matter of land revenue? The devolution proposed is, of course, to the Governor-in-Council of the province, and not to the new popular governments, and the control of the land revenues is presumably one of the last functions which would be transferred to elective authorities. But is the Governor-in-Council to have power to commit this province to the permanent settlement? We have only to look at Bengal to see how disastrous the step would be, not merely on financial grounds, but still more to the social condition of India. But no step would appear to be more popular, for the reason that those who would profit by it are so large a part of the relatively small class who have formed and can express a public opinion. And let it be realised that to decide this question now is to take the decision for ever out of the hands of electorates large enough to speak for the people as a whole, such as it is hoped will in time be brought into existence. Essentially the question of the permanent settlement is one not to be touched until India is ripe for full responsible government.

"There are limits, therefore, to the freedom in the land question which can be afforded to Provincial Governments at this juncture. If, however, the quota due to the Government of India be made a first charge on provincial revenues, the limits may be wide. But in what form are the Provincial Governments' orders to the officers assessing and collecting the revenue to be put? In a pure bureaucracy it is a national characteristic that many matters of high policy should be settled by executive minutes, which in self-governing countries no one would think of settling except in an Act of the Legislature. In India, for instance, there are no Education Acts. These delicate issues are all decided in executive resolutions. The substitution of laws passed by the Legislature for minutes passed by executives is one of the changes which will mark the progress of India from pure autocracy to responsible government. And this must surely begin in the realm of finance, even in matters reserved to Executive Councils. I have urged the unwisdom of leaving the division of revenues between the Executive Council and Ministries to an annual wrangle, and have argued for settlements made by a Commission independent of both. But the settlement can only be periodic, because further functions are to be transferred from time to time. The share of funds available for transfer will largely depend upon the yield of the land revenue. There is every reason, therefore, in favour of encouraging the Legislative Councils to discuss the instructions to be given to settlement officers upon which the growth of the main item in the public revenues depends. Such discussions will soon teach the councils and electorates that there are two sides to the question, and that further alienation of the public rights in favour of private landowners can only take place at the expense of the interest they represent. Here is an excellent example of the real process by which India can be prepared for responsible government. I would urge, therefore, that in future the land-revenue policy of the Provincial Government should be expressed in legislative form."

In a study of the land-revenue system which I hand in to the Committee, I have produced evidence which suggests that in comparison to its wealth, no other great country is so cheaply governed as India. Personally I think India has seriously suffered from this over-cheapness, more especially in the sphere of education. I am convinced that no economies which can be effected in reserved subjects will supply a fraction of the fund necessary to educate India. The steady reduction in the percentage of increment taken by Government from the land proves that the fund is there. But it will never be really tapped except by self-imposed taxation, and this is one reason why I feel no time is too soon to place the whole burden of education frankly in the hands of governments responsible to electorates.

The Committee will note that I am merely endorsing the view expressed by Mr. Aiyar (p. 90, col. 1.).

I well know the dread with which Indian Nationalists regard the prospect of having themselves to impose taxation. It appears in every line of the 8th and 9th sections of Sir Sankaran Nair's minute of April 16th, 1919 (176). The Sanjiwani in Calcutta cried out against the Joint Address on its first appearacne that "This plan of leaving to Provincial (State) Governments certain specific powers of taxation would make such Governments unpopular." I know it, and my Indian friends will bear with me if I repeat what I have said to them from the outset, that the first green blade of responsible government will be seen rooted in Indian soil when an Indian ministry is found to face this unpopularity. Such men may fall. They will fall to rise again. But it is well-nigh impossible for ministers to come to this point so long as you enable taxpayers to say that had Ministers done their duty they would have wrung it out of the reserved estimates.

I happen to be able to bring a little first-hand experience to bear on this question. When I first took charge of the department which dealt with local authorities under the Crown Colony Government of the Transvaal I found they were mainly dependent on Government grants. Their whole energies seemed directed, not to administration, but to clamouring at the the doors of the Department. Their total demands added together would soon have reduced the Government to bankruptcy. They seemed to have no kind of interest in economy or self-help. I persuaded the Government to fix their grants on definite principles and give them a system of local taxation. The change which occurred when they recognised that this was final was remarkable. Instead of holding out their hands to the Government in every little difficulty they turned-to to set matters right for themselves. But what was even more striking was the improvement which took place in their relations with Government. The moment their resources were defined they ceased to spend their breath on execrating government, and mutual relations became as amicable as they ever are between a government and local authorities.

* Report, par. 203.

I entirely agree with Sir Stanley Reed and Sir Frank Sly that the Executive Council and Ministers must be each responsible for raising additional revenues required for their own schemes, and that each must have powers of taxation of its own (q. 5225-30, 2232-3, 2327 and 2332). I also agree with Sir James Meston's view (p. 392, col. 2) that the effect of the joint purse will be "that into the hands of the popular half of the Government there is placed, through their handling of the purse-strings, a very large measure of control over the policy in regard to subjects which are not under their administrative control, and consequently for which they are not responsible. Now that seems to me the bare, naked issue which has to be settled." The justice of this remark will be seen by reference to Mrs. Besant's words (p. 74, col. 2): "The Budget should be presented as a whole to the Legislature, whose resolutions, as said, should be binding." This is but another illustration of my general criticism of the Joint Report that the principles of the Congress League scheme, that of giving to popular legislatures control without responsibility, is reintroduced by a number of side tracks into the handling of reserved powers, despite the unqualified condemnation it received in the earlier chapters of the Report.

I hope the Committee will at any rate insist on the proposal mooted by Lord Sinha (q. 283), by Mr. Montagu (q. 404) and supported by Sir William Meyer (q. 6884) and by Mr. Feetham (q. 2370) "to provide machinery whereby a separate purse could be adopted in any province on the initiative of the Governor." I have no doubt whatever what the result will be. I would strongly urge that that machinery should consist of a commission appointed by the Secretary of State such as that over which Lord Southborough presided. Behind this recommendation is a question of policy. You do not, in my opinion, help the Indian Civil Service in their difficult work by imposing on them the task of shaping the final decisions which have to be taken by the Secretary of State or Parliament on constitutional questions. I feel that on the whole question of reform it would be better for the Cabinet to look to the Viceroy as their adviser, not the Governor-General in Council, leaving him to place before them the views of his Council together with those of Provincial Governments. In the Pronouncement of August 20, 1917, this was done. Had a final responsibility for reporting on reform from 1908 onwards been concentrated on the Viceroy personally, as it was on Lord Durham, I do not believe matters would ever have got into the tangle which needed a visit by the Secretary of State to India to unravel them.

The same principle applies to the shaping of constitutional settlements for ratification by the Secretary of State. The Committee will see my meaning if they will consider how little suspicion has been provoked or friction raised by the Southborough Committees. Contrast this with what would have happened if Parliament had left the Local Governments to shape franchises and lists of transferred subjects for their final approval. The state of suspicion and unreason aroused thereby would have aggravated the difficulties which the Local Governments have to face, and have prejudiced the prospect of the reforms. The distinction I am trying to draw between the functions of the Governments in India and that of the Home Authorities is closely analogous to that between the officers of the Navy and the naval architects. The officers ought to be consulted on every detail of the ships they will have to work. They ought not to be asked to draw the actual plans upon which the Sea Lords will have to decide. That is why I think it so important that periodic settlements of revenue when asked for by Governors should be examined by Committees like those of Lord Southborough, before ratification by the Secretary of State. The Executive Council and Ministers can both state their case to such committees, and when the settlement is made I do not hesitate to predict a marked improvement in their mutual relations.

My own view is that no real education in responsible government will begin until definite resources as well as definite functions are transferred. I therefore recommend the Committee to provide for a Committee to complete the work of the Feetham Commission after the first two or three years' experience has been gained. But the Governor's position will be rendered impossible unless he can obtain such a Commission on requisition.

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part ii) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of Control over the Central Government as that given to provincial Legislative Councils over provincial governments? 12. Do you agree that it is advisable none the less to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature? (Clause 16.) 13. Do you accept the plan of a bicameral legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential? (Clauses 14, 15 and 16.) 14. Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature? (Clause 20 (3) and (4).) Or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities?—I think the working of dyarchy should be thoroughly tested in the Provincial Governments before any attempt is made to apply it to the Government of India. I approve therefore of this feature in the Bill, that all the functions of the Government of India are to remain for the present of the nature of "reserved subjects" upon which the Government has unquestionable power to pass the necessary legislation and obtain the necessary votes in supply. But before exercising these powers it should be exposed to the influence of representatives of all sections of Indians affected, and be able to listen to their views publicly expressed. British India contains upwards of 200,000,000 inhabitants, divided up into a large variety of sections, many of which can find no spokesmen in an assembly limited to about 94 Indian members at most.

All the objections urged against the use of the official bloc to force legislation through the Legislative Councils apply to the Council of State, and one of them with greater force. If elected members in the Assembly are to be overruled by Government, let its orders be issued openly and operate directly. I cannot conceive a more exasperating way of overruling the assembly than to do it by a secret whip issued to officials in another body. Continuous reliance on this mischievous expedient is a fatal hindrance to the enlargement of the Indian Legislature to a size needed to make it an effective organ of Indian opinion. By keeping down the number of members the difficulties of direct election are enhanced. Until the main body of the Indian Legislature is directly elected it is impossible to contemplate the transfer of any subjects to its control. Apart from its serious complications the Council of State involves using up a number of legislators whose seats added to the other body would provide more room for elected members. To continue indirect election is to foster the growth of corruption both in the Indian and Provincial assemblies. There is far more temptation to corrupt twelve electors than 12,000.

Another serious objection to indirect election by the Provincial assemblies is that as they always tend to elect from their own members, an election to the Indian Assembly precipitates a crop of bye-elections all over India. This did not matter under the old system. It may matter a great deal when Ministers' tenure of office depends on a balance of parties.

These complicated proposals suffer from the same defect as the Minto-Morley reforms, because they are based on the same principle. They are utterly inelastic. There is in them no capacity for development in the direction of responsible government. The moment you adopt the simple straightforward method of legislation whereby motions which the Viceroy cannot accept are rendered inoperative by his simple refusal, all these difficulties either vanish or are greatly diminished. The numbers can be fixed solely with an eye to enabling Government to hear the views of all representative sections in India. The constituencies can be proportionately reduced in size. In this context, however, I wish to say that it seems to me that far too much importance is attached to constituencies small enough to enable candidates to come into personal contact with the electors. That is scarcely a good argument for giving voters no representation at all, for half a loaf is better tha nno bread. And is it altogether a disadvantage that electors should have to judge less by the ingratiating manners of the candidates than by the issues they represent? Direct elections cannot be more unreal than these hole-and-corner elections of handfuls of legislators. The ungenuine character of these elections and their tendency to corruption have not, I feel, been weighed as against the difficulties of real representation. I see no insuperable obstacle in grouping the constituencies delimited for the Provincial Councils and taking as the franchise electors on the roll above the age of 30.

Judging from the evidence the Council of State has few real friends. Even the merit of popularity cannot be claimed for it. As an organ to register the Government's will I have already discussed it. As a revising chamber, Mrs. Besant was against it, on the ground that what India needs is quickening rather than retarding influences (p. 73, q. 13). The fate which has met the efforts of Indian social reformers in the Viceroy's Legislative Council fully justifies that remark. I see no case for introducing this highly artificial arrangement at a stage in reform when simplicity is itself a ruling consideration—the simplicity which alone will enable simple minds to see how the machinery is operating.

15. Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council? If not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest?—In the light of experience thrown by the conduct of this war, in the making of peace, and from all that I saw in India, I am convinced that final and supreme decisions of Government should never be left to professional officials. The system under which a Viceroy can be overruled by his officials is a survival of conditions in company days, now long obsolete. I should like to see the provision changed whereby the Viceroy can be overruled by a majority of his Executive Council. I think that the final decisions whether to accept or reject motions carried in the Assembly should rest with the Viceroy personally. As to the exact number of official advisers he should have under these conditions I have no opinion to offer

16. Do you think that the development of Provincial autonomy on the one hand, and self-government in the Provinces on the other, involves any modification of the provisions of Section 2, 33 and 45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23)?—This is a technical point upon which my opinion is valueless.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress, by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examination?—Yes. My reasons are given above, when explaining why I think that the revenues, as well as the functions of the Executive Council and Ministers respectively should be assigned by a committee like the South-borough Committees appointed by the Secretary of State.

I earnestly hope that Parliament will permit no further transfer of powers except on its own authority signified in the report of a Commission appointed ten years hence under Clause 28. The attention of India will not be concentrated on administrative work so long as the door is kept open to constitutional agitation. If the success of such agitation depends on the Government of India, the relation of Indians with the Government are certain to be embittered. The provision by which electorates and their representatives are given ten years in which to try their hand at responsible government within a limited sphere, and that the results of their work are to be judged by Parliament itself before making any further extension is in accordance with the terms of the Pronouncement of 20th August. It is eminently calculated in my opinion to accelerate the progress of India towards responsible government.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—I think there are several matters such as those involved in instructions to Governors which cannot properly be embodied in the Bill, upon which Parliament should pronounce in the form of resolutions drafted by this Committee. This is especially so where the Committee find reason to differ from the policy outlined in the Joint Report.

19. Have you any observations to offer on the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of India Affairs?—I have already recorded my opinion against continuing the system of indirect election for the Indian Legislature, and shown that it is not necessary if control of Indian legislation by the Government of India is based on straightforward methods.

The reasons of the Functions Committee for the transfer of higher education seem to me conclusive.

I agree with the Majority Report of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs, that the responsibility now vested in the Secretary of State in Council should be vested in the Secretary of State individually, and that he should have an Advisory Committee.

I cannot understand the objections to recruiting the staff of the India Office in future from the I.C.S. It seems to me an enormous advantage to the Indian civilian to be brought home for say five years, and an equally great advantage for the office to be staffed by men who know India and will return there. I think the change would go far to assist recruitment to the I.C.S. It would also help to neutralise the undoubted effect of a life spent in India to unfit able men for any other spheres of public service when they retire at fifty. It also makes it far easier to introduce to the India Office Civil Servants who are natives of India.

On fiscal matters I think it is of vital importance that Parliament should declare in terms that the Government of India is to frame the fiscal policy of India as it would if India were already a self-governing Dominion, and as though it were responsible to an assembly representing all classes of consumers in India. I do not mean that it should be bound by an assembly which cannot as yet fulfil that condition.

I can see no possible reason why the cost of the India Office should be saddled on the British taxpayer, except on the principle that India is to be governed for the benefit of the British taxpayer. On the same principle I consider that the cost of that part of the Colonial Office which is charged with administering the Crown Colonies should be distributed amongst those Colonies. The British Commonwealth is a world State, and the principle of locating on the British taxpayer every charge which anyone can find an excuse to evade must stop some time, or the whole system will collapse through bankruptcy at the centre,

SCHEDULE OF RECOMMENDATIONS.

A.—SUGGESTIONS IN MR. CURTIS'S STATEMENT, EFFECT TO WHICH MIGHT BE GIVEN BY AMENDMENTS TO THE BILL.

(1) In the preamble, omit all words down to and including the word "such" in line 6 and substitute the following words: "Whereas with a view to increasing the association of Indians in every branch of Indian Administration and the gradual development of self-governing institutions with a view to the progressive realisation of responsible government in India as an integral part of the British Empire, it is expedient that substantial steps in this direction should be taken, and whereas progress in this direction can only be achieved by successive stages;

"And whereas the time and measure of each advance can alone be determined subject to the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal and Commons in Parliament assembled, on whom the responsibility lies for the welfare and advancement of the Indian peoples;

"And whereas such advice and consent must be guided by the co-operation received from those upon whom new opportunities of service will thus be conferred, and by the extent to which it is found that confidence can be reposed in their sense of responsibility;

"And whereas concurrently with the gradual development of self-governing, etc.

(2) That the Bill be amended in such manner as to admit of the constitution of two sub-provinces in Assam.

(3) That approval be signified to the principle of reserving permanently to Imperial control a tract separating the northern frontiers of British India from foreign and native States by inserting the words "or frontier" between the words "backward" and "tract" in Section 12 (2), line 12.

(4) That approval be signified to the principle that salaries of Ministers should be fixed by the Legislative Council by substituting the words "Legislative Council" for the word "Governor" in Clause 3 (1), line 36.

(5) That with a view to helping electorates to recognise the difference between reserved and transferred subjects and to know where responsibility of executive and legislative acts lies the Bill be amended in such manner—

I. (a) That acts done by the Executive Council may be expressed as acts done by "the Governor in Council."

(b) That acts done by the Ministers may be expressed as acts done by "the Governor on the advice of his Ministers."

II. (a) That measures passed under reserved subjects begin with the words "Be it enacted by the Governor."

(b) That measures passed under transferred subjects begin with the words "Be it enacted by the Governor by and with the advice of the Provincial Assembly."

III. That the Legislature when dealing with the reserved subjects be styled "the Legislative Council," and when dealing with transferred subjects "the Provincial Assembly."

IV. That the Provincial Assembly be empowered to elect its own Speaker and frame its own Standing Orders subject to the Governor's approval.

V. That with a view to recognising the corporate responsibility of Ministers the words "the Minister in charge" in Clause 3 (3), line 42, be changed to "his Ministers," and in line 2, page 4, the words "the Minister" to "Ministers."

VI. That with a view to providing that in transferred subjects a Governor shall not depart from the advice of his Ministers, unless he is prepared to contemplate the resumption of transferred subjects to the category of reserved subjects, the words "owing to a vacancy there is no Minister in charge of the subject" be omitted from Clause 3 (4), lines 7 and 8.

(6) That the principle be recognised that as the Governor is finally responsible to the Secretary of State for all reserved subjects, his power of determining what legislation is necessary for the discharge of those functions must also be final, subject only to the Secretary of State, and that to give effect thereto the Bill be so amended as to provide that motions of any kind passed in the Legislative Council shall not take effect if the Governor announces that he cannot accept them; and, consequential thereto, that officials may sit but not vote on the Legislative Council.

(7) That provision be made in the Bill that after two years a Commission shall be appointed to separate the revenues and powers of taxation to be allocated to the Executive Council and Ministers for their respective functions, such settlement to be revised periodically by the Commissions appointed under Clause 28, or alternately.

That the Governor be empowered to demand the appointment of such a Commission after two years.

(8) (a) That in all India legislation the Governor-General be given the same powers as those recommended in (6) for the Governors.

(b) That the Council of State be not created.

(c) That a number of elected members at least equal to the Council of State and the official members in the present proposals be added to the Legislative Assembly.

(d) That the Secretary of State be empowered to make regulations to give effect to these changes, and for the direct elections of all elected members.

(9) That section 41 of the Government of India Act, 1915-16, be amended in such manner as to provide that the Governor-General is not bound by the opinion or decision of a majority of his Council in any matter whatsoever; subject, however, to the existing provision of sub-section (3) that any two members may require that their dissent from the Governor-General's decision may be reported to the Secretary of State, together with copies of any minutes which the members of Council have recorded on the subject.

(10) That no charge be made in the allocation of the charges for the Secretary of State for India and his office, but that the Indian Budget be discussed at an earlier stage of the session than is now the practice.

B.—SUGGESTIONS IN MR. CURTIS'S STATEMENT, EFFECT TO WHICH MIGHT BE GIVEN BY RESOLUTIONS OF PARLIAMENT.

(1) That any clear request by a majority of members of a Provincial Legislature representing a distinctive racial and linguistic territorial unit for its constitution under Clause 12 of the Bill as a sub-province may be taken as prima facie case, on the strength of which the Secretary of State may appoint a Commission of Inquiry.

(2) That whenever a Governor has exercised his power to resume direct control of transferred subjects a Commission of Inquiry be appointed by the Secretary of State to inquire and report whether such resumption was necessary, and if so, for how long it should be continued.

(3) That members of the Indian Civil Service should not be ordinarily appointed as Governors of scheduled provinces other than Assam, unless for a period of three years they have held high office in or served in the Legislature of some self-governing part of the British Commonwealth.

(4) That the Governorships of all these provinces should be approximately assimilated in respect of emoluments, status and dignities.

(5) That the staff of the India Office be in future recruited from the Indian Services.

(6) That the Government of India be instructed to regulate the fiscal policy of India on lines such as they conceive would be followed by a Dominion Government responsible to all classes of producers and consumers in India.

9140. Would you explain to the Committee the circumstances under which you went to India and made a study of these questions, and of the opportunities you had of study?—Before I answer that question may I mention one correction? Owing to the strike, and one matter and another, I had to finish this rather hurriedly and was not able to see all the proofs. I have sent the clerk a correct edition of the two schedules of recommendations, but he tells me that he will not be able to circulate it till to-morrow. I would like to ask the Committee to disregard the one circulated and attend only to the one in print. I allude in the course of my statement to the circumstances which which took me to India. It was my business to study, for the sake of the round table groups in various parts of the Empire, the relations of India to the various self-governing dominions and this country, and knowing nothing about India at first hand I asked a number of friends, half a dozen or so who had life-long experience of India, to meet me once a fortnight and answer my questions. It was in the course of those discussions that I came to the conclusion that the course which reform had taken since 1909 was not one which was capable of further development, that, in other words, we had got on the wrong track. Then I felt, and my friends felt, that it was impossible to produce any studies of the subject which deserved the consideration of these groups scattered all over the Empire unless one examined the problem on the spot, and it was for that reason that I went out to India at the end of 1916.

9141. When in India you had an almost unlimited opportunity of discussing these questions with members of the Civil Service, with Europeans engaged in other work in India, and with Indian gentlemen?—I had every opportunity which a man who does not speak the vernaculars could have.

Lord Sydenham.

9142. I think you have said in your book that we have got to learn to look on while Indian electorates hurt themselves?—Yes.

9143. Do you really think that that is possible, so long as we have any responsibility for the welfare of the masses of India?—Yes, provided that the process is kept within limits compatible with the stability of the whole political structure.

9144. To take a case of which we have heard, if it was found that the hereditary lands of the cultivators were passing rapidly into the hands of moneylenders and townspeople, could we in a case like that look on and do nothing?—That is surely a hypothetical case. It is not proposed under this Bill to transfer that subject to the control of the elected bodies. At least if it is proposed to transfer it to the control of the elected Legislatures, I personally, should be against it at this stage. But as I understand it the Bill does not propose that.

9145. I put only a hypothetical case. Is it not quite possible under the system which is proposed in the Bill that measures might be taken which in British opinion would be hurtful to the masses in such cases? Do you think we can look on?—It is undoubtedly possible, that measures may be taken which will be hurtful to the masses, and unless within limits we are prepared to look on, I think we had better withdraw the pronouncement of the 20th August, 1917.

9146. What is going to be the view of the masses who may feel what you admit is possible, if they see us looking on and doing nothing to help them?—My hope and belief is that they will come to help themselves.

9147. But I think you will admit that that must take a considerable amount of time and a considerable amount of education?—It has in this country

9148. Now, have you ever been in a position in which you were responsible for the welfare of a large number of people?—I have been permanent head of a department in a Crown Colony and for a short time acted as the political head

9149. Then perhaps this kind of responsibility, to which I have referred, has not yet been brought home to you as it has to some of us?—I cannot answer that question.

9150. In your scheme originally you devised a diarchical system which was based on subjects transferred to subordinate Provincial Governments?—Yes.

9151. And the transferred subjects, as proposed by the Subjects Committee, were largely those that you transferred to those subordinate bodies?—I think so.

9152. Could you say what would be the relations between those subordinate bodies administering these transferred subjects and the Provincial Governments themselves?—I think the relations in the proposals put forward in what is known as the Joint Address would be very closely analogous to the relations which might exist if in this country it were proposed to devolve a number of powers from the Central Government and Parliament on subordinate Governments for England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland.

9153. Then I take it that your proposal was different entirely in principle and in operation from creating a diarchy in the Provincial Government itself?—Yes and no. As I have explained in my statement, the first form in which I circulated these proposals for criticism was very closely comparable to the proposals contained in the Joint Report. They were circulated in a letter which I addressed to my friend Mr. Bhupendra Nath. Basu.

9154. Are you now in favour of making this division at the head centre of the Government of every Province?—I have said in that statement that if I were in the position of the Secretary of State now, considering the position created by this Bill which has been placed before Parliament, I should not myself go back at this stage to the proposals I made in the Joint Address. I should have substantial alterations to make in the Bill as it stands.

9156. You do see that it is this dual system alone which threatens the existence and the efficiency of all the great public services of India?—No, I do not think so.

Sir Henry Craik.

9157. Could you explain what you mean by saying you think eventually you will come back to the system of the Joint Address in time from the dual system? I think you said that?—Yes. My own forecast is that in many parts of India the moment people get a system of responsible government——

9158. A dual system?—Yes. The moment they get the system under this Bill, and appreciate what responsible government means, you will have growing up a demand from racial and linguistic areas, such as you have got especially in Madras, for a sub-division, so that they can have Legislatures in which they can to a much greater extent conduct their public business in their own vernacular. I may be wrong, but that is my forecast, and I do not hesitate to put it on record.

9159. Supposing the system of relations between reserved and transferred subjects went on a certain number of years, in which there was great responsibility and independence in regard to transferred subjects, how are you to change that into this system of smaller divisions? Are they still to have transferred and reserved subjects, or are they to be entirely transferred in those small divisions?—There is a clause in the Bill which contemplates it.

9160. And you think that that will be the historical direction?—Yes, and that is why in my statement I have laid so much stress on the matter, as I see it, of this Committee laying it down that when an area like Sind demands separation, that is a prima facie case, and that you have not got to wait for a majority of the Bombay Legislature to demand the separation of Sind in order to have a prima facie case.

9161. In your opening statement you say that you do not think that the Government of India at present should be submitted to this change, this dual system?—I do not think for the first ten years experiments with dyarchy should be tried in the sphere of the Government of India.

9162. You say that that can only come when the Indian people are ready to take up home defence?—No, not at the beginning. I say complete responsibility can only come when the people of India are ready to take up their defence.

9163. But then you contemplate ultimately—I have read your statement carefully—that the defence of the frontiers should be in the hands of the British, that there should be a line, however narrow, a strip of land from one end to the other across from west to east, and that that should be in the hands of the British?—It should be in the hands of the Imperial Government; but my view is that Lord Curzon's policy, which was initiated in the creation of the north-western frontier Province, ought to be continued eastwards right across, and that it should be permanently recognised that the frontier of India is not merely an Indian frontier, but is an Imperial frontier.

9164. Is not that the defence of India?—Yes, but it is also the defence of the whole British Empire.

9165. Are they taking up the burden of their own defence if the defence is to be entirely in the hands of the British Government?—Then I have expressed myself badly. My intention was that the burden of defence ought to be contributed to by every part of the Empire, notably including India.

9166. With regard to the dual system, I think your opinion is that the dual system almost necessarily leads to a separate purse?—I think so, yes.

9167. You contemplate that there should be not so much unity in the Government, but you think the dual system will lead to two parallel lines of government, responsible each in their own sphere?—I think so.

9168. And that that responsibility should not be cloaked or camouflaged?—Yes.

9169. That is the spirit of your criticism?—Yes.

9170. And you think it involves further, as a part of its system, a separate purse?—I think so.

9171. You think that separate responsibility is not consistent with a joint purse?—That is my view.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

9172. As I read your paper, your view of establishing diarchy was based rather on the idea that there would be a fairly rapid further transfer of subjects to popular control?—I cannot penetrate the future. I hope so.

9173. Supposing you had been considering the matter from the point of view that any transfer made is experimental, would you have been satisfied to retain the present form of government for a large number of subjects and to transfer certain others as an experiment?—But I understand that is what the Bill proposes.

9174. Have you looked upon these subjects transferred as only forerunners of many others? You have adopted diarchy?—Yes.

9175. Would you have done so equally if you did not think they were going to be the forerunners of the transfer of others?—No, because I have no use for a scheme which does not visibly lead to the goal pointed out in the pronouncement of the 20th August.

9176. All your papers seem to me to regard your own proposals as being experimental. Let us put one test. You are in favour, I think, of transferring sanitation and education to the popular body?—Yes, I am in favour of it, because a Committee appointed specially for that purpose, after taking exhaustive evidence, has gone into it and recorded that as their opinion. That, in my view, is a very much better opinion than any I could offer.

9177. You think the most important thing is to educate the electorate?—Yes.

9178. You say a most important point in the education of the electorate is their becoming responsible for raising revenue?—Yes.

9179. Do you think that a popular body would be willing to raise the enormous additional revenue necessary, say, for compulsory education?—Certainly not to begin with.

9180. We have just heard evidence that a very large amount is required to be done for sanitation. Do you think a popular body would be ready to raise a large additional revenue for sanitation?—I think that the lesson which I hope and believe will be learned will be learned much more quickly over education, because India, as I judge it, is much more greedy of education than of sanitation; and the lesson which I hope and believe the electorates will learn within a measurable time will be that if you wish for education you must find the revenue to pay for it.

9182. You are willing to face going back for the advantage of educating the electorate in self-government?—Provided always that if the retrogression is such as to endanger public order, or the whole polity in India, the Imperial Government means to resume a trust which has not been justified.

9183. Then you would realise, with that proviso, that you must keep all powers connected with public order in the hands of the Governor and the Governor-General?—Of course, the ultimate responsibility for order rests in the hands of the Governor-General, but it is as a matter of fact delegated to the Provincial Governments.

9184. I think you used the word "resume." It is very difficult to resume powers which you have given up, is it not? It is easier to retain powers and to delegate them when you have got greater certainty?—Yes, it is; but if you do not mean to do that I should not go on with this Bill.

Chairman.

9185. Lord Midleton is asking you about law and order?—Yes, because the administration of education might easily involve the whole question of law and order. If the Provincial Ministry, after forewarning by the Governor, insisted on a measure which led to a complete breakdown of law and order in that province, then I say you have no choice but to resume the administration of education and wait for a considerable period before you can try the experiment again.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

9186. Would not a half-way house be for the Governor to exercise his veto over an extreme provision for education which he anticipates will break down law and order in the Provinces?—Personally my own view is one which will probably be thought by this Committee to be a very rash one. I should be against that, simply for the reason that it blurs responsibility. The more I see of government the more am I convinced that the most important of all principles in government is to know where responsibility rests. My view is that if the Governor confines himself to warning as to what he thinks will happen, coupled with a warning that in the event of that happening there will be a resumption, you are much less likely to get a breakdown of law and order.

9187. Under those circumstances, in the original consideration of what Bills Ministers should bring forward, you would confine yourself in the Cabinet discussion to warning Ministers, but you would not allow the members of the Executive Council who would sit with the Ministers presumably to over-rule them?—Exactly.

9188. You would give the Ministers full responsibility?—Yes.

9189. On the other hand, although I suppose reserved subjects, if the division is made in that way, would be similarly in some cases discussed in the Cabinet, the Ministers might give an opinion, but they would have no power of regulating them?—You have exactly stated my position.

9190. Does the result of all your experience in India make you think that, apart from putting on new taxes, the old taxes would be more rigidly enforced? You have pointed out the very interesting fact that the land revenue has been dealt with in the very gentlest manner. Do you think that the Councils would be inclined to be more severe?—I do not think so at first, but I think that in course of time they cannot do otherwise than discover that if you are to have universal education in India the only source from which it can be adequately defrayed is by taxation on the primary industry of the country, which is agriculture.

9191. If there is any danger of the Councils being largely representative of the towns, would there be any attempt on the part of urban members rather to overtax land revenues—to tax the rural members more?—I do not think my opinion on the point is very valuable, but I have noticed that a very large number of the class who are styled politicians, who are very largely barristers, lawyers, and so on, themselves have large land holdings.

9192. Do you think the country, the rural districts, will be better represented by following the system which Lord Southborough has laid down, or, where the question arises, by a larger communal representation?—Personally, if you are asking me a question on communal representation, I am against it on principle, ciple, for reasons which I have given in the little book I published; but I think my opinion on the question of franchise dealt with by Lord Southborough is quite valueless. I have not got sufficient knowledge of the stratification of Indian society.

9193. But you would be in favour, as far as possible, of procedure rather on Eastern than on Western lines in the franchise?—I think that communal representation is disastrous. I am sorry it was ever conceded. I think the best we can do now is to put a time limit and to make it clear that the whole question will be reconsidered by the Periodic Commission.

9195. Is not the first thing you require for self-government to get the electorate really in touch with the member?—It is only one of many things. You may do it by means which are fatal to other aspects of self-government.

9196. Do you think that you are going to obliterate all racial difficulties and caste feelings by merely taking a district and saying that district must send a member?—I think that until you can do that you are a very long way from responsible government in India.

9197. There are two other little points I should like to ask upon. You have quite made up your mind, I gather, and you would rather that the Governor or the Governor-General, as the case may be, came directly with his veto, where he has to do so, on the Legislative Council, rather than have any intervening body which has to thresh the matter out a second time. You do not very much favour the Council of State and you are against the Grand Committee, I think?—Yes. I do not like the word "veto." I merely want to make the system which now exists what I call straightforward. What happens now is that the Governor or Lieutenant-Governor instructs his officials to vote down whatever motion is in front of the Council if he does not wish it carried, or to vote through whatever motion he does wish carried. All I contend for is that, instead of that if the Governor cannot accept a motion, including motions to negative business which he has submitted to the Council, the responsibility of saying so shall rest directly on him and be operative, without going through what I call this degrading farce of sending in British officials under secret orders to vote it down.

9199. With regard to the review of anything which may be done now, you lay down one point very clearly, that ten years ought to be the shortest time, so that people should address themselves to administration rather than to the consideration of new functions. You also say that you think there ought to be a second Feetham Committee in two or three years from now at the latest. Would not that defeat the very object you have in view in putting off the consideration? If the functions had to be reconsidered in two or three years would not that defeat the object you had in view in the other recommendation?—I think you have misunderstood me about the Feetham Committee. I should like to have seen Mr. Feetham's Sub-Committee entrusted with the duty not only of deciding upon what functions were to be transferred, but also on the duty of deciding what revenues were to be transferred. I think it was a pity that that was not done, and I think you will have to do it. Therefore I hope that a Committee will be appointed in two or three years time, when the position has been cleared up by some actual experience, to effect a division of revenues corresponding to the division of functions which has been made by the previous Committee.

9200. But at the time the Feetham Committee was appointed the Government of India had not suggested two separate purses?—No. I think that is the answer.

9201. Consequently the question had not arisen?—No.

9202. But, subject to that, you would deprecate any disturbance of whatever is arrived at now for a fair period of years, so as to give it the chance of working?—Yes, I think ten years is a good period. I should be sorry to see the plant pulled up for the roots to be looked at in five.

9203. As a general question you would rather have a complete control by the popular Assembly of certain matters than that they should have a partial share in all matters?—Yes, certainly.

9204. Did your study in India lead you to form any opinion as to the method of levying enhancements of land revenue?—I am not quite sure what you mean by enhancements of land revenue, or exactly what the methods are which you refer to. The view I did form was this: The value of land, generally speaking throughout the world, is steadily and constantly increasing. From time immemorial the public revenues have been a first charge on the yield of the land. Our re-assessment is made in those parts of India where the permanent settlement does not exist—I think three times a century, every thirty-three years—and the results of that re-assessment, I believe, are always to show that the value of the land has risen. The consequence of that is that the amount which the landholder is called upon to pay the Government is suddenly raised. The conditions are, of course, extremely various; but if the value of the land and the rental, or of the revenue which the landholder is expected to pay to Government is raised, I presume that it is done because the officer who is making the assessment finds that that landholder is able to let, or is letting, his land for much higher rentals to the actual cultivators. Now when we began this system a Zemindar was then looked upon as a tax farmer; he was entitled to 10 per cent. of the revenue which he collected and handed over to the Government. He therefore handed over to the Government 90 per cent. We have drifted more and more into regarding him as a landholder, and in the course of a succession of years I understand that what was originally his commission of 10 per cent. has now been increased to 50 per cent., and in a great many parts of India, particularly in Oudh, to a great deal more, and that Government now certainly does not collect from those revenues more than 50 per cent. of what are called the net assets, which, as I understand it, you may roughly call the rental. Now by what order has that great reduction in the amount of revenue collected been made? As far as I can make out it was done by departmental orders from the Revenue Department of the Government of India. I have never seen the principles or the reasons for doing the thing submitted to any public discussion in any Legislature. I think that time for that has gone. I think that the time is coming, especially with all the demands which education is going to make on these revenues, when you have got to discuss publicly the reasons why you maintain or reduce the proportion of rental which you are going to pay to the State. I may say in my evidence I have put in a paper which I wrote in India on the subject.

9205. It is not a matter of very great importance, but I should be very glad to give you an opportunity of correcting an answer which you gave to Lord Midleton about the action of Lieutenant-Governors in instructing their officials to carry or to defeat a motion or resolution in the Legislative Council. You did not mean that to apply to Lieutenant-Governors, but only to the Governor-General, did you not?—Oh, no. As I saw business conducted in the Provincial Legislatures, when the Government did not wish to accept a motion or wished, against the elected members, to carry a motion, orders were issued to the officials to cast the necessary votes.

9206. Yes, but it requires qualification. There is the fact which has often been brought to you that in Provincial Councils there is not an official majority?—That is perfectly true, and I think the Government were often put to great straits, and I should say a very dangerous condition was produced, by their not having that majority.

9207. That is all I wanted. Now I want to ask you one question about diarchy in the Government of India.

As

Mr. Montagu—continued.

As I understand it, in your view the justification for diarchy in a Province is that it is contended on the one hand that the people of the Province are not sufficiently trained in electoral practice, habits, and institutions to make it safe to give them complete responsible government, and, on the other hand, that they will never become so except by a gradual transfer of responsibility. That is roughly it?—Yes.

9208. Now if you do not give any diarchy in the Government of India to-day, by the time that you begin to give it you will have had Provincial populations who have at least had some experience of the working of electoral machinery?—Yes.

9209. And, therefore, it is perfectly possible—I do not put it higher than that—that in your view diarchy, which you regard as necessary in the Provinces, may never be an intermediate step in the Government of India?—I suppose it is possible; I hardly think it is probable.

9210. Is it your view that the functions remaining to the Government of India, as opposed to the functions of the Provincial Government under Mr. Feetham's scheme, will remain roughly as he proposes for ever, or is it your view that they will diminish or increase?—I remember the view I came to on examining all the functions which were discharged by the Government of India on the one hand and the Provinces on the other was this, that by the time you came to complete responsible government you would have devolved a great number of matters on to the Provinces from the Central Government; but I remember distinctly I also formed a view that there were certain matters which were now transacted by the Province which would have to be directly transacted by the Government of India.

9211. Could you give me an instance?—Well, I think I am right in saying that the Customs, till lately anyhow, were collected by the Provincial Governments. Remember, when I was discussing this question I was contemplating smaller areas, and I foresaw that these smaller areas might cut through the middle of great irrigation schemes. Those irrigation schemes would then ultimately, if the old Province disappeared, have to go to the Government of India.

9212. Coming to your smaller areas scheme, if I recollect rightly, your sub-Provinces were to disappear when all the reserved subjects were transferred?—The very opposite—the existing Provinces were to disappear.

9213. Your sub-Provinces were to become Provinces?—Yes, certainly.

9214. Therefore, in amplification of your answer to Lord Midleton, would it not be fair to say that you might have your sub-Provinces formed, as you anticipate will happen, during the transitional period, or they might come into existence only when reserved subjects cease to exist?—Yes, it is possible. I doubt whether, when the last reserved subject is handed over, that at that particular juncture it is likely that the Government of that day would be able to undertake a general redistribution of Provincial areas.

9215. I have one last question to ask you, and I do it by way of making a statement, upon which I shall be very grateful if you will comment. Reading your Memorandum and your other books, and the Joint Report, I should be inclined to say that your opinion might be summed up in this way, that the Viceroy and I had got hold of a principle which you think is a good one, but had damaged it by modifying it out of deference to what we conceive to be public opinion and the opinion of people concerned in India, and that you would prefer to have little or no regard to what people say they want or think if it jeopardised the application of the principle, which you regard as a good one. Is that a fair statement?—Not quite. I should not quite accept your last words. It is a matter of degree.

9216. It is a matter of degree?—Yes.

(After a short adjournment.)

Lord Islington.

9217. Mr. Curtis, you have answered several questions already with regard to your proposal for sub-provinces. Now as regards the two you mentioned especially, Sind and Behar and Orissa, do you give those as illustrations, or do you give them because you regard them as the most conspicuous cases that should be dealt with?—As the most conspicuous cases and also the easiest, and I say the most conspicuous cases and also the easiest because I have in mind the conditions of Madras, where, as I understand, you have got four perfectly distinct languages and races territorially grouped, but I do not think them so easy to deal with at the present stage as Sind and Orissa. You have got the actual physical separation of Sindh from Bombay and Orissa from Behar

9218. I was not quite able to gather from the questions put to you whether you would make Sind a separate and distinct Province or whether it would be a subordinate Province with its own Government, subordinate in the main to Bombay?—Yes, I should make it simply a sub-Province with an administration of its own dealing with transferred powers.

9219. Would that form of administration you would propose as a sub-Province be a Government subordinate to the Central Government in Bombay, or would it have powers independent of the Central Government?—I hope the transferred powers would be independent, subject always to recall in case of abuse.

9220. Would you in the case of Sind put all the functions on the transferred side and make it a purely constitutional form of Government?—Certainly not; I think Sind is probably a backward part of India. I should leave the Governor in Council at Bombay as at present administering all the reserved powers in Sind, and simply hand over education, public works and agriculture to the local Government for Sind, which I submit is the natural and obvious thing to do if you look at the map.

9221. As regards Orissa, would you couple it with any of its adjacent areas or make it a separate sub-Province of Bengal?—I should certainly include in Orissa those fragments of the Ooriyas, say, in Madras and the Central Provinces.

9222. I meant in the case of Behar, but you are dealing with Orissa?—I should first of all remodel Orissa, because you have got a great many of the Ooriya-speaking people under other Provincial Governments. Having done that, very probably I should imagine the best plan was to leave things as they are and to leave the administration of the reserved powers in the hands of the existing Province of Behar and Orissa, unless you found it more convenient to hand them over to Madras or the Central Provinces.

9223. Handing over Behar on the other side to Bengal?—No, leaving Behar as it is, certainly not handing it over to Bengal.

9224. Leaving it as a separate Province of its own?—Yes.

Mr. Montagu.

9225. Just in order to make this quite clear, if I may interrupt Lord Islington, the Government would remain at Behar to administer the reserved subjects for Orissa, would it not?—Yes, as it does now.

9226. That is your scheme?—Yes.

Lord Islington.

9227. You put it in that way?—Yes.

9228. I gather from your note that in the case of Orissa you would incorporate a portion of Madras and the Ooriya territory and make that a separate province of its own?—I do not think it is big enough.

9229. Or else a subordinate province of Madras?—No.

9230. I just want to get clear the process you would go through. You lay stress with force in your note that if those matters are left to the Legislative Council as constituted the probabilities are, being constituted as it is, nothing in this direction would ever come about. Therefore am I right in saying that your process would be that an appeal should come from the district concerned, and upon that appeal the Governor would submit the case to the Secretary of State, who, in his turn, would send out a Commission to investigate the whole matter and report?—Yes, I should expect the appeal to come from the members of the Provincial Legislature, not from the area affected. In the case of Sind I have very little doubt, sooner or later, that the great majority, if not all, the members members for Sind would say: "We should like a separate sub-Province, and I think whenever they say so that should be a proper case in which the Secretary of State could act.

9231. His form of acting would be to send out a Commission to investigate and report, and if the report were in favour of this new demarcation it would be left to the sole discretion of the Secretary of State to decide whether we should give effect to it or not?—I think so.— If it was thought better to reserve it for Imperial Legislation that is possible, but, personally, I think it a matter which should be left to the Secretary of State on the advice of the Commission.

9232. Anyway the discretion would be at home here?—Certainly.

9233. One question as to your proposal of taking over this fringe for the protection of India: you only suggest a quite thin fringe?—Quite a thin fringe, except where you have got a district of British territory like Kuman. Of course a great part of the Himalayas are independent territory, like Nepal, or native territory like Kashmir. Where that occurs I think a thin fringe is sufficient. Sometimes you have got territory like Kuman, where you have already your barrier, and I do not think that territory ought to be handed over. It is perfectly primitive territory.

9234. But you include in this thin fringe of territory such places as Darjeeling, Rawal Pindi, and Sialkot?—Yes, for different reasons. In the case of Darjeeling you have very strong racial reasons. You begin with a totally different population and with a totally different life—the hill life as opposed to the plain life—and with a totally different religion—Buddhism as opposed to Hinduism and Mohammedanism. Your strip would naturally include Sialkot and Rawal Pindi, which has the enormous advantage that you keep your cantonments under Imperial control where they always ought to remain, my point, of course, being that the command of troops, whether British, Indian, or Dominion, along the frontiers of India should from first to last remain in the hands of the Imperial Government.

9235. It is a purely Imperial duty?—It is.

9236. How would you recruit your army for that fringe? You would have to encroach over the line, would you not, into British India?—Certainly. I should prefer to cross bridges when we reach them. There is no question at present of transferring the Army to the control of India, but what I am saying is that you can do with a stroke of the pen now, by reserving this area all along the frontier, what it will be very difficult for you to do ten, twenty, or fifty years hence. It is very easy at this juncture for Parliament to do it.

9237. You suggest really leaving an option to Parliament at some time in the future to do this, but not to give effect to it now?—No, I recommend that a strip of territory separating British India from Central Asia, from the frontiers of Burmah—which I do not regard as British India—to the west coast be reserved now and permanently, like the North-West Province. I merely suggest that the policy which is foreshadowed in the Report as applied to the North-West Frontier Provinces should be applied to a strip along the whole frontier.

9238. Involving, as it would I suppose, a new military organisation for the line to meet the demands?—Not until the distant date arrives when you place India on the same footing as Canada.

9239. The North-West Frontier, which is your example for this, does not pay its way, does it—the expenses attached to it?—I should think not.

9240. The military expenditure on the North-West Frontier far exceeding any revenues which are obtained from that Province?—Of course.

9241. And, of course, to a still greater degree you would have that difficulty along this thin fringe?—Yes.

9242. You spoke of the distant days of the future when India would be in possession of a responsible system of government?—Yes, I think there is to be some reconstruction which it is unnecessary——

Chairman.

9243. Just to make that quite plain, this would be an executive act. Should you suggest that this Committee should add the necessary words in this Bill that would give them the power to do so?—Not being a draughtsman, I take it the two words "or frontier" inserted at the proper place would imply an instruction given by Parliament to the Secretary of State to make this reserve. It is an executive Act. You ought to include that long strip in the schedule of reserved areas.

Chairman—continued.

9244. Can you suggest that that amendment of the Bill should be drafted in such fashion that it would commit the Imperial Government to that line of policy?—Yes.

9245. Just one or two questions as regards your interpretation of diarchy. You desire to see diarchy in a more emphatic form than that which is proposed in the Bill?—Yes, that is the whole tenor of my evidence.

9246. By diarchy you mean definite decision, do you not, on the part of the two branches of the Government?—Yes.

9247. Left exclusively to themselves?—My point throughout is instead of blurring to emphasise the responsibility of each branch.

9248. Would you under your scheme support the distinction, as you emphasise it, of a definite and distinct decision, along with the complete unity of deliberation prior to that decision?—Certainly. I want to see the Executive Council exposed to the utmost to the influence of the Ministers. I want the Ministers exposed to the utmost to the influence of the Governor and the Executive Council. That process having been gone through, I then want it to be emphatically clear that the decisions on the reserved subjects are those of the Governor and the Executive Council, and that the decisions on the transferred subjects are those of the Governor and the Ministers.

9249. Therefore, in regard to all the processes that take place up to that decision you would have unity of government as regards speaking and deliberating and discussing?—Yes, but I should imagine that very often in the last instance the Executive Council on the one hand and the Ministers on the other, would want to deliberate apart before making up their minds what their final decision was to be. I am perfectly sure they will do it in any case—you cannot prevent them.

9250. In an informal sense?—Yes, it will grow up. The Cabinet itself is informal; it has grown up in that kind of way.

9251. And you would desire it to be laid down as a practical convention that all matters which are of such a character that they are to be decided by deliberation as distinguished from merely departmental questions, should come before and be discussed by both branches of the Government sitting as a Cabinet?—Yes, I would wish that.

9252. Now you are very anxious to give, as regards transferred subjects, full control to the Ministers and the Legislature, and you go so far as to say that even if there were a danger of disturbance as the result of the policy or the carrying of it out, you would let that possibly proceed only with a warning on the part of the Governor as to what the result might be?—After the fullest warning and for the reason I have given; I think in practice you would have less chance of disturbance if it was understood that that was going to be the procedure; I think it would beget a sense of responsibility much more quickly in the Ministers than you would get under the other system.

9253. I take it you put that forward as a more effective preventive operation than the power of the veto on behalf of the Governor?—Yes, I think it is likely to be more effective in fostering the sense of responsibility, but I also think it is less likely to lead to disorder in practice.

9254. You think it more likely if such a procedure was put into force that the Minister and Legislative Council would restrain their hand on the warning and not carry it out?—I think it is more likely.

9255. It would be more likely to effect that purpose without friction than merely the cold veto on the part of the Governor; is that your purpose?—Yes, I think there would be less friction.

9256. You are running a greater risk, are you not?—I think you are on the surface, but my own view is that you are not running so great a risk for the reasons I have given, that I think that if Ministers really understood understood that if they produced widespread riots—let us say of the Mohammedans against the Hindoos—the Governor then would say, "You have had your warning. You have disregarded it. You have plunged the whole Province into disorder. You are not fit to be trusted with these duties and I resume them." I think if they knew that was going to be the procedure they are much less likely——

9257. They would restrain their hand?—Yes.

9258. What would be the result if they did not restrain their hand and that took place? Do you think you would find a happy atmosphere for resumption?—No, you would never have a happy atmosphere after disorder, but you would have a salutary warning to the other Provinces.

9259. The form of the procedure by which resumption would take place would be that Parliament should be invoked. That is your proposal, is it not?—Supposing disorder breaks out—I would like to trace the procedure in detail—I think the Governor must have the authority to resume all powers as a matter of emergency. I think he must then make up his mind to recommend the Secretary of State whether the power should continue to be resumed or whether it should be re-transferred at once, and I think that wherever a case of resumption occurs the Secretary of State should appoint a Commission of the kind which is now being sent out to the Punjab to inquire and report upon the case before he makes a decision.

9260. Supposing some disturbance took place on a very important subject, such as education, which might easily occur, resulting in grave disturbance, resulting also in the process you have just described, with an instructon for resumption, would not that lead to great difficulties in India, if education was taken out of the hands of the people administering it? However much on the merits it might be the case that it would be to the general advantage, would it not be very difficult to do it, and would it not cause still further disturbance?—It might.

9261. You are running a great risk there, are you not?—I think you are running a greater risk unless you are prepared to resume. I think the worst risk you are running is that you will advance too slowly unless you are also prepared to go back.

9262. You have another method, have you not, by giving power to the Governor to anticipate those difficulties and to insist upon a more moderate form of policy, which might avert them so that they should never occur?—My view is that by doing so you are greatly retarding the educational efficacy of the delegation of responsibility.

9263. If it comes to a question of resumption, do you think on the recommendation of the Governor Parliament would be likely to assent to resumption? You give the analogy of the Dominions, do you not?—I have not suggested——

9264. You have great experience of the Dominions, but there are not many instances, are there, where the Governor refers a decision which he has made against his Legislature in a Dominion home where the Home Government upholds the Governor as against the Dominion Legislature?—I think we are both talking of a case where actual disorder has occurred, rioting and bloodshed and collapse of society generally. Under those conditions there is no other alternative but for the Governor to resume temporarily. Then I am proposing that before the resumption is prolonged or cancelled Parliament and the Secretary of State should have the advantage of the report of an independant Commission going into both sides of the question. My point is that I do not want them to act merely on the report either of the Governor or of the Government of India. I want Parliament to have its own independent eye on the matter besides the Secretary of State.

9265. After an independent inquiry?—Yes.

9266. You think that would have a more satisfying effect on public opinion in India?—I think if such a Commission reported that the Governor had been justified, and if the question at issue was that responsible administration of education was in that Province incompatible for the time being with public order, Parliament would have no other choice than to say that the Governor must continue to administer education. I do not think that unless Parliament is prepared to do that you will succeed in the policy to which you have committed yourselves for India.

9267. With regard to your financial proposals, I think you say in your note that Land Revenue is a subject which would have to remain a reserved subject right to the end?—I do not think I go so far as that, but I say upon the question of permanent settlement that I think it would be a political crime of the first order until India has got an electorate which is competent for responsible government in the fullest sense of the word to pre-judge that question of the permanent settlement.

9268. You think it would be a political crime of the first order to hand over Land Revenue until the permanent settlement had been dealt with?—No, I think in this very complicated subject there are aspects of Land Revenue which must be handed over—for instance, supposing it is proposed further to reduce the proportion of net assets which is taken by the Government I think that will have to be discussed by the Legislatures, and I think before long you might let the Legislatures, on the recommendation of the Ministers, decide that subject in so far as the transferred powers are concerned, but that is a very different thing from saying that while you have got electorates which still represent only a fraction of the whole population of India you are going to give your Legislatures the power the power to hand over the public property of the Indian people to a very limited number of individuals. That is what the extension of the permanent settlement means.

9269. You do not feel that a permanent settlement can ever be effectively dealt with until it can be dealt with by a thoroughly representative Legislative Council?—I do not think we are entitled to extend the permanent settlement. I go so far as to say that I do not think the question of the extension of the permanent settlement should be transferred to Indian electorates until there is full responsible government in India.

9270. You would like to see the separate purse as proposed by the Government of India?—I think it is essential; I always did.

9271. Your proposal, I understand (I merely ask for correction), is not that it should be laid down in the Bill, but that it should be left to the respective Governments to ask for a Commission to go out and investigate it and report. Is not that your proposal?—I have alternative proposals. My own proposal is——

9272. I am merely now trying to interpret the proposal as I read it in your Note here?—My own proposal is that it should be laid down in the Bill that within two or three years a Commission should be sent out to establish the separate purse. If the Committee does not accept that, alternatively I should like to support the proposal which was mooted by Mr. Montagu and Lord Sinha in cross-examination, and was put forward in more definite form by Mr. Feetham in his examination, that the Governor in any Province should be entitled to demand such a Commission for the establishment of a separate purse. If, as I hope, you put that in I have very little doubt what will happen.

9273. Directly the Bill becomes an Act?—After two or three years' experience.

9274. You would have two or three years' experience of the joint purse first to see how it works?—Yes, in any case I think you had better have that.

9275. You would give it a run first for two or three years?—I think you had better.

Chairman.

9276. I want to ask a question upon that, because I do not quite understand it. If you have this view so definitely why wait two or three years? Why not send out the great financial authorities to do it at once?—I am afarid it would mean delaying the Bill. You would not wait for the Bill to do it?

9277. How long would a man like Sir Robert Chalmers take to do it?—I think there is something to be said for allowing them to work out the arrangement for a year or two if only to give data to such a Commission. I feel very strongly upon principle that the thing ought to be done. I feel in practice it will not not work unless it is done, but I am old enough to distrust all my own views until I have seen them tried out in practice. I feel so strongly about this that I am perfectly prepared to see it tried out for two or three years.

Lord Islington.

9278. It would be rather a protracted business, would it not, because the Commission would have to go very closely into an examination of each Province in India, each being separate and different?—Yes, I do not want anything to be done which will delay bringing this scheme into operation, and I am rather afraid that if you laid it down that this had to be done before the scheme started you would delay it. I think on a balance of considerations the wise thing to do now would be to say: Go on with the joint purse for two or three years and then separate, and, in any case, you must give the Governor the right to demand a separation. I do not believe his life will be worth living if you do not.

9279. So that you do not see such a serious vice in the joint purse that you are not prepared to give it a run for two or three years?—I do not think the thing is going to lead to positive disaster within two or three years; I think if you let it run for ten years it will ruin the whole experiment.

9280. In being so very convinced as regards the separate purse you have gone very closely into it, and are quite satisfied that it can be worked out on practical economic lines?—My experience is that when you have made up your mind that certain principles are essential they can always be worked out in practice.

9281. Whether they are sound in economics or not?—I saw it in South Africa; there were people who said that this or that was impossible owing to South African conditions. But when the public had made up their minds it had got to be done it was done.

9282. Your proposal of the Separate Purse is one which has been put before us, not only that there should be a separate branch of revenue for the transferred subjects and a separate branch for the reserved subjects—that is to say, a separate purse and taxation for each, but also separate revenues for the respective subjects within those branches?—I do not see that that is at all necessary. It seems to me you will get your consolidated revenue as at present. Give the Ministers a share of that revenue and a generous share corresponding with the powers transferred to them. It does not matter your earmarking this particular item of existing revenue to particular subjects—give them a share of the consolidated revenues corresponding to their functions. In addition to that schedule certain appropriate matters upon which they may raise increased taxation. One of them I should schedule would be the land, and I would allow them to put additional cesses on the land.

9283. Why cannot you come to an equally effective result to that which you have just described with the joint purse?—You tried the joint purse half a century ago, between India and the provinces, and the verdict on what happened is recorded in the Report itself, and I have quoted it.

9284. It is hardly a fair analogy?—I think it is a very close analogy. There were officials on both sides, and you had extravagance, waste, and bad blood between the Government of India and the Provincial Governments—all factors which are likely to be increased where the two Governments in question are the one British and the other Indian.

9285. It is a question of analogy; it is on the same lines as the analogy you give here in one of your arguments for diarchy in connection with, for instance, the Province of Ontario and the Federal Government of Canada, and the same in South Africa and Australia, but that is hardly a fair analogy, is it, as between the reserved and transferred subjects within a Province. Would it not be a fair analogy to this you mention in your note on the Central Government of India and the Provincial Governments? You can hardly call those you have mentioned a fair analogy to the reserved and transferred subjects within a Province, can you?—I think, if you look at the spirit and not the letter of the thing, it is not a question of analogy. It is the same case. It seems to me an axiom of local government that if you delegate duties to local governments you must give them specific revenues of their own. I know they tried the joint purse with the provinces in South Africa for a short period at the beginning of the Union, and the results were exactly those which I saw myself when the Crown Colony Government tried it with the local authorities. It is an impossible system.

9286. Is it not one thing to give a specific revenue to a Province and quite another thing to give specific revenues to subjects within that Province? They are two totally different things?—The real reason why you do not provide the revenues of County Councils out of the Consolidated Fund is that if you did you would cut at the root of their local responsibility to their local electorate. At present, when a County Council in England comes forward and proposes certain ambitious schemes, it has to face its own constituents with a demand for them to find the money, and that represents the best check and the only effective check The principle is exactly the same when you hand over certain functions to Ministers responsible to a Provincial electorate, and not to the Secretary of State. They are responsible to a different authority, and you have no real check upon them unless you give them perfectly definite revenues and also their own sources of taxation.

9287. How are you going to administer finance under this scheme of the separate purse? Are you to have two Finance Ministers?—I think so.

9288. Two separate Finance Ministers?—Certainly; they are separate Governments, and every Government must have its own Finance Minister. He may combine it with another portfolio.

9289. Supposing, as you mention in your note in the case of education, there is a very strong demand for a great development of education entailing a very large expenditure to a Province, an expenditure far in excess of the revenues you have allocated to the transferred subjects, how are you going to meet that?—That is my whole point; the Ministers, if they bring forward an ambitious programme, must then ask the Legislature to vote the necessary money, and, as I have said, I think it ought to come out of the land revenue.

9290. I think the Government's proposal in that case is that you should borrow from the reserve side, that where there is a deficit on one side you should go cap in hand to the other and find the balance?—I hardly think so.

9291. I think that is so; that is what I understood?—I cannot give evidence as to what the Government of India has said. If so, I do not think their experiment in responsible Government will go very far.

9292. I think education is itself a very important subject, and it is one which everybody wants to be greatly developed in India. If it is found that the proper and sufficient development which is required of education in India cannot be undertaken because there are not enough funds in the one bank that is allocated to transferred subjects, then education has got to wait until there is a balance in that bank, although probably——?—I think that will be a very serious position.

9293. Although probably in the other bank there are ample funds?—The matter would, of course, be put right on the next periodic revision. It has never been found possible up to the present date in India to make your Provincial settlements final. They have had to be revised periodically, and so settlements as between the reserved and transferred subjects will undoubtedly have to be revised periodically. The revision will come.

9294. And the reforms have got to wait for it?—Yes.

Lord Sinha.

9295. With regard to this question of the separate purse, I have not heard what you have said before I came in, but I understood you to say that the separate purse is absolutely essential in the system of diarchy that you yourself advocate?—I consider it so.

9296. The allocation of revenues without separating the sources of revenue might serve to some purpose, might it not?—Certainly.

9297. And that allocation might be made in order to prevent friction for a period of years, could it not?—Yes.

9298. That would still further minimise friction?—I think so; all that is certainly compatible with the separate purse.

9299. My point is that without specifying distinct sources of revenue for the distinct sections of the Government you might allocate portions of the revenue, taking it as a whole, to one section and to the other? I think you not only might, but you ought.

9300. Therefore your separate purse does not mean that you allocate separate heads of revenue to each section of the Government?—It does not. May I just add one point to that? You must divide not only the revenue, but the growth of the revenue.

9301. Quite. Let me put it to you in this way: Supposing we take the whole of the revenue of a Province to be A, and you take the average of three years and you find two-thirds allocated to what we shall call the reserved subjects and one-third to the transferred subjects, and then for the dual government we say that will be the arrangement, that two-thirds of the whole revenue will be given to the reserved section of the Government for the reserved departments and one-third of the whole revenue will be given to the transferred section; that will satisfy the separate purse system that you advocate?—Yes, but I think I might very often have a corollary to that which would be this: If I were the Commission I might say that the requirements of the transferred subjects, including education, were likely to grow much faster than the requirements of the reserved subjects, so while I might say, "I give you now one-third of the consolidated revenue," I might also say that more than one-third, or possibly the whole of the growth of revenue should go to the transferred purse. That would depend on the conditions I found in each Province.

9302. And with regard to the growth in revenue, you would leave that to be apportioned in the same way, would you not, by an independent authority?—Yes, but as I have just said, it does not follow that because you divided the existing revenue into two and one you would not give a larger share of the growing revenue to the transferred purse.

9303. If there was any friction with regard to the allocation that would be mitigated, if not absolutely neutralised, by leaving the decision to an independent tribunal?—I think that is essential.

9304. Therefore your system of a separate purse is not that advocated by the Government of India?—I am sorry to say that my memory will not sufficiently carry the details of the Government of India's suggestion, but you have rightly described what I propose.

9305. You have seen the list of transferred and reserved subjects, have you not, put forward by the informal committee in revision of Mr. Feetham's list which Mr. Feetham put in as an appendix to his evidence?—Yes.

9306. Do you generally agree with the division?—Yes, I agree for the reason I have given, Lord Sinha, that on a matter like that I trust the judgment of such a Commission much more than I trust my own.

9307. There is one other question only I want you to answer, so far as I am concerned: Do you consider that the association of the two sections of Government for purposes of deliberation would be for the benefit of both?—Yes.

Duke of Northumberland.

9308. With regard to this strip along the frontier which you propose to reserve, your object is to make the Imperial Government responsible for all time for the defence of the Northern and North-Western Frontiers of India?—Yes.

9309. Do you accomplish that object by merely reserving a strip of territory, because if the Imperial Government is to defend the Indian frontier and to conduct active operations on the frontier it will have to control not only the territory on which the troops are stationed in peace time, but also the railways and the bases of supply, and so on, would it not?—I say cross bridges when you come to them; but I urge this now because this is a condition precedent when you do come to the bridges, to Imperial control of what is not merely an Indian but an Imperial frontier. It is not merely the business of India to protect that frontier, but the business of the whole of the British Empire.

9310. In answer to Question No. 1, you say that you are impressed with the necessity of making the Imperial Government responsible for any advance that there may be in this field of self-government. Do you mean to suggest that that ought to be put in the Bill, because surely it is implied, is it not?—I suggest that the whole pronouncement of the 20th August, 1917, should go into the Bill, and I have roughly drafted what I think the Preamble should be in these recommendations.

9311. In answer to a question of Lord Midleton, I think when you were speaking about the powers of the Governor or the Lieutenant-Governors, did I understand you to mean that you were in favour of the power of veto of the Governor or Lieutenant-Governor being done away with altogether?—No. What I am in favour of is this: That when the Governor has made up his mind that in order to discharge the duties laid on him in connection with the reserved powers he has to carry certain legislation, or else has to refuse to allow certain legislation to be carried, he ought to be able to make his decision effective by means which are direct, not as he does at present, by ordering officials and trying to muster enough members to pass the necessary votes. Instead of that procedure I should substitute what I call a straightforward procedure, that when he had made up his mind that he had to refuse a motion on the reserved subjects which the Legislature wanted to pass, he should let them pass it, but that it should not become operative if the Governor said he was unable to accept it. I should lay the whole responsibility on him, as Lord Carmichael recommended.

9312. I am still puzzled a little about the question of the divided or united purse, because, of course, our system in England is so different. The Minister there says, and gets his colleagues to agree, what sum will be necessary to administer the services for which he is responsible, and then they discuss ways and means of raising the necessary sum. I gather you admit that principle will be inevitable to some extent, because I think you said that with regard to land revenues it would be necessary that both sides should dip into the same pocket; the land revenue is such a large proportion of the total revenue that both the reserved and transferred services would have to have some income from that source of revenue?—What I want to do is to establish the English system. Let us suppose that a Province has a revenue estimated in pounds of £3,000,000, and let us suppose that the Commission entrusted with the division says that to begin with £2,000,000 shall be dedicated to the reserved purse and £1,000,000 shall be dedicated to the transferred purse, and that the whole of any future growth shall also go to the transferred purse. I think that the Ministers must include a Minister of Finance, and that Minister at the beginning of any financial year will know accurately what funds are coming into his treasury. Then if the Minister of Education comes forward with an ambitious scheme on education, costing more than the funds available for the transferred subjects all told, the responsible Minister of Finance, responsible to the Legislature, will then have to tell his colleagues that in order to carry out that scheme they will have to put on some form of new taxation. That is the situation I want to see established.

9313. Yes, but both sides will have to draw on a certain joint source of revenue: is not that so? You cannot absolutely differentiate certain sources of revenue, and say that everything that comes from so and so will go to the transferred subjects and everything which comes from so and so shall go to the reserved subjects?—I do not see why you should; it is all a matter of book-keeping. If the total revenue was £3,000,000 I should not go into the sources of revenue.

9314. Does it not come very nearly to being a joint purse if you do not go into the sources of revenue, and if you give each an equal chance of calling on the whole?—I do not give them a chance of calling on the whole.

9315. Without knowing what the needs of the reserved services are, in the illustration you gave you said that the reserved services were to get £2,000,000 and the transferred subjects £1,000,000, and that any increase in revenue was to go to the transferred subjects also, which means that if that is stuck to the reserved subjects were only to be allowed a gross grant of £2,000,000: is not that a very autocratic way for the Finance Minister to be able to act?—I was only taking a hypothetical case.

9316. Is not that your hypothesis, that the way to do what you want is to have, without Parliament, a limitation as to what one or the other group of services might cost; is not that very undesirable, and must not you allow for elasticity on both sides and entitle both sides to draw on the same revenues in proportion to the general taxable capacity of the country?—I am afraid I do not follow you.

9317. At any rate, you admit that so far as I have grasped your illustration, it would mean that the reserved services would have to be in the possession of unexpanding revenue, because you said definitely it would be laid down in advance that all the increase should go to the transferred subjects?—I said that was a hypothetical case, and you might find a case in which you would do that. I think, probably, in most cases, you would say that one-third of the revenue will go to the transferred purse, and two-thirds of the revenue, on its present basis, will go to the reserved purse; but we anticipate an increment. The Executive Council will need some increment in order to develop forests and irrigation, we will say, but they will not need so much increment as the Ministers will need for the development of education. Therefore, if I divide the revenue as it now is——

9318. How can you tell that in advance?—You have to estimate many things; you do it every year with your Budget.

9319. But you do not do it many years ahead?—You have done it in India with the settlements.

9320. Any elastic financial system does not say that a certain class of expenditure will require less expansion than any other class of expenditure?—Do you realise the extent to which it has been done in India?

9321. I should have thought if you wanted an elastic financial system you ought to try to get away from that?—I am not sure that you want an elastic system in that sense; my criticism of the joint purse is that it is too elastic, that instead of throwing the Ministers and the elected Legislature on their own resources and taxing themselves, it encourages them to make the electorate think what is not true, that the whole additional revenue they need for the proper service of education can be got by robbing the reserved services, and the result of robbing the reserved services will be the collapse of society in some other direction.

9322. You do not think in the Provinces, at present, India is ready for a scheme of allocation of the necessary expenditure for a year, simply according to the general taxable capacity of the Province without regard to anything else, without regard to the source of revenue which goes to meet the special expenditure?—I think, if you have a standing Commission, the Commission may do it every year; if you do not have a standing Commission your Ministers and Executive Council will be eternally at each others throats.

9323. You said you thought education was a thing which general opinion was very keen on developing, even more than sanitation; has that led you to form any opinion as to the advisability of transferring the whole of education as a transferred subject at once?—I regard the final Report of the Feetham Sub-Committee on that point as absolutely conclusive, and I am very glad of it. I think the whole onus probandi should be on the man who wants to reserve.

9324. You said, and, if I may say so, I very much agree, that the chief movement which would be necessary in the next few years, perhaps many years, is more education of the electorate than education of Ministers. I mean that the real thing is to try that?—Yes, the real thing.

9325. A witness the other day suggested that far more use should be made of congresses and conferences and general freedom of public discussion, and that even Civil Servants should be encouraged much more than at present to discuss and explain exactly the reason for the policy adopted, and so on, rather than relying simply on what happens in the Legislative Council. You would agree that that is one of the important ways in which education of the electorate could proceed?—I should. I think political intercourse between the Civil Servants and the educated classes in India should be far more encouraged than it is..

9326. And even between the Civil Servants and the uneducated classes, so that the reason for things might be explained to them?—Yes, but I think a great deal more intercourse goes on between the Civil Servant and the uneducated classes. My criticism of the situation is that there is far too little intercourse between Civil Servants and the educated classes.

9327. Only one more point. I think you may have obtained experience in India which would enable you to give a useful opinion on a matter which was brought to our attention the other day at Question 8092, where it was said that there had been a perfectly definite deterioration of the standard of the Civil Service during the last—I forget the exact period—ten or fifteen years. Is that borne out by your experience or any knowledge you have?—I do not think my experience on that point is nearly so valuable as that of the Public Service Commission of 1915. and I am very glad to be given this opportunity of pointing out to this Committee that that Commission, consisting largely of perfectly impartial people like my friend Sir Valentine Chirol, went into that question specifically and pronounced upon it, and I submit that they are in a far more impartial position than a man who belongs to one generation is in to compare himself with the succeeding generation. I should like to read to the Committee the three lines in which they recorded their verdict: "But apart from this we are fortified in our conclusion to leave well alone by the feeling which is borne out by evidence given both in England and in India that, taken as a whole, the personnel now recruited has not in any way deteriorated, and that India has been obtaining men who are keeping up the high level and the best traditions of the Service."

Major Ormsby-Gore.

9328. On this question of the joint or separate purse are you aware that we have had no Indian witness who has had anything to say for the separate purse proposal?—I am.

9329. Do you think that is due to the fact that the separate purse proposal has been presented in the form of the separation of sources of revenue?—May I take back that answer? I think there was one Indian witness who said the separation of revenues was essential. I cannot say—no, I honestly think, and I always think it better to say what you believe, that the real reason why so much stress is laid on the joint purse is that through the joint purse the Indian Nationalist hopes that the elective Legislature will control the reserved subjects. I quite understand his wish. I do not agree with it. I think with the joint purse he will be able to control them.

9330. I gather you are opposed to the idea that the separate purse system should be worked, if it is adopted, by allocation of sources of revenue?—Yes, I am opposed to it. I think it a perfectly unnecessary complication.

9331. And as it is before us now it would practically mean, would it not, that Excise was the only transferred source of revenue which the Ministers would be able to increase or reduce?—Yes.

9332. And that would be difficult to work, particularly in Assam, where there is a very strong feeling as to the opium Excise and things of that kind?—Yes.

9333. What do you gather would be the relation of the Legislative Council under your scheme of the separate purse to the reserve Budget—that is to say, to any proposal which the Governor and Executive Council would bring forward to increased taxation for increasing the revenues available for reserved subjects?—I should imagine that the elective Legislative Council would normally oppose it, but it is a curious feature of Indian provincial governments that they seem to have stabilised their expenditure. I understand that increased taxation in the Provinces is extremely rare.

9334. Did you not hear while in India the statement that the police are underpaid?—Certainly.

9335. So that probably when this Bill passes the local reserved Governments will take the increased revenue in order to pay the police properly?—I take it that is quite possible and ought to be faced.

9336. To end a possible opposition you attach great importance to giving the Governor power to carry taxation measures, even in the Provinces, against the wishes of the Legislative Council for reserved subjects?—Yes, I think any taxation measure of that sort is bound to have the approval of the Government of India first, but if you have made up your mind that you cannot do justice to the reserved subjects without it you must do it, otherwise there is no meaning in reserving the subject.

9337. In the manner it is done in order to take a certain amount of things off the shoulders of the individual Governor, do you think it would help him if he was to get the support and the agreement of the Secretary of State here at home? Would that help him in India?—When he was proposing additional taxation?

9338. Yes?—I should imagine it would.

9339. I gather you take the view generally that the Grand Committee proposal is not satisfactory?—I do.

9340. And would you like to see us make some attempt at a second chamber system within the Provinces?—No, I am all against complication at this stage; it seems a primary condition at this stage that anything you do should be based on simplicity. That is why I am against the Grand Committee. I should say, simplify all through, wherever you can. Another reason is, I think, the reason given by Mrs. Besant—I do not often agree with Mrs. Besant but I do there—that what you want in the Provincial Legislatures is not a retarding element but an accelerating element.

9341. Now, on the question of Provinces and sub-Province, you took as a signal example Behar and Orissa, and I gather you suggest that that there should be a Governor and Executive Council for Behar and Orissa as at present, and two sets of Ministers?—Yes.

9342. Would it not be practically imposible to get that joint deliberation which you think so important between Ministers and Executive Councils in both sections of the Province?—Undoubtedly you have got to modify your system, but I do not think any evil is so great as leaving a detached area, speaking a different language like Orissa and a detached one speaking a different language like Sind to be administered by an electorate, which, in the case of Sind, is hundreds of miles away. It is bound to break down.

9343. Are not your arguments really false if you examine it practically? Taking this Bill as we have it at present, there is the creation of Sind as a separate Province or putting it into the Punjab?—I think you very likely will put it under the Punjab and put it under a Commissioner. You have got to modify your system, no doubt, to meet the conditions. You would put it under a Commissioner who would be discharging the reserved powers and would deliberate with the Ministers, both on reserved and transferred powers.

9344. In connection with these Provinces, you alluded to Burmah just now; what are your views about Burmah? We have been asked by a deputation to include Burmah practically in the Bill. What is your view upon that?—I should like to ask whom the deputation represents before I answer.

9345. It was some Burmese?—I think if you are really setting out to make an Indian nationality, as you ought to do, you are dangerously complicating your chance of doing so, and certainly postponing the time when you will succeed, if you are going to bring into India communities which are perfectly obviously non-Indian. So long as we kept the old regime we could go on adding territories to India just as territories were added to Russia up to the Pacific, but when the moment comes that you introduce electoral Government, and make the Government responsible for the electorates, you alter the whole system.

9346. Therefore you say that the tendency should be to separate Burmah from India even more than at present?—Certainly. Burmah is not part of India. Supposing that Siam were annexed, would you go on to include Siam? Where are you going to stop? Why I met quite a number of people in India who seemed to assume that Mesopotamia was to be treated as an Indian province.

9347. I personally quite agree, I only wanted your views. With regard to what you have said about this frontier, have you had any preliminary support for your proposals? Have you discussed it a good deal with the military authorities in India?—Yes, and I discussed it still more with the political officers, the men on the spot, which was what made me put it forward.

9348. Was the view they put forward that really the North Eastern Frontier of India is not anything like the same—that is it not so open as the North-Western Frontier, and that the possibility of an invasion of India by the Chinese or Russian across Tibet is so unlikely that to make that complicated administration system down the hill foot of the Himalayas is not an urgent, practical problem?—It obviously is not so important, but you can never tell what will happen, and I do not think it is a complicated system, reserving a narrow strip below the foothills under the Provincial Government, and ultimately under the Imperial Government.

9349. You want a narrow strip for lateral communication, I presume?—Not necessarily; it is for the administration.

9350. Take the northern part of the United Provinces. Would you not have to take a considerable area there of the foothills?—Certainly not, because you have got Kumaon I should reserve Kumaon there.

9351. Who do you think should be the real authority to decide on a possible re-arrangement of the frontier boundaries? Do you think the Legislative Assembly and the Government of India together ought to be the authority that should deal with the re-allocation of boundaries, or would you leave the initiative to the Provinces?—Do you mean the boundaries between Provinces?

9352. Yes, and the re-arrangement of Provinces like Behar and Orissa, or the frontier between Bengal and Assam—all those questions of the re-arrangements of Provincial areas?—I think it is of vital importance that you should interpret what the Secretary of State has said—that those things should be done by consent. My question is: Whose consent? If the members representing Sind demand a sub-Province for Sind I think that should be a prima-facie case upon which the Secretary of State should institute an inquiry. I think such an inquiry should not be barred because the majority of the Bombay Legislature objected to the separation of Sind.

9353. But would you give the Legislative Assembly of India—that is my point—a voice in the matter?—I do not see why you should. It seems to me where it is obviously a suitable area and that area asks for autonomy, all I say is that there is a prima-facie case which ought not to be blocked by any larger community any more than the whole of Prussia ought to be able to block the Poles of Silesia from going in with the Poles.

9354. I wondered which should be the proper constitutional authority for carrying out any of these Provincial arrangements, as one does not want to have the experience of Bengal over again?—I should say the Secretary of State, subject to the authority of Parliament.

9355. That is to say, it should be done by Parliament?—Yes, by the Secretary of State, subject to the authority of Parliament, whatever the procedure is, but by the highest authority.

9356. By rules laid on the table of Parliament?—Yes.

9357. You have said nothing in your evidence to-day as to your views on the Report of the Crewe Committee on Home Administration of Indian Affairs. Is there any particular point you wish to urge before us upon that?—No, I do not think so. I wrote some paragraphs in my Statement, and in the proof crossed them out, because I found I had not had time to consider the subject sufficiently, and consequently I struck out recommendations on the subject which I put in the first edition of the Schedule. I do not think I have any valuable opinion.

9358. On the Council of India?—On the Council of India, except the one I have left in—that I think that the Council of India should be purely advisory. I agree with the Crewe Committee on that

9359. You mentioned Sind several times in your evidence. Have you made a tour of Sind, and studied the rather peculiar conditions of that Province on the spot?—No.

9360. You have not convinced yourself that there are the materials there for creating an independent Legislature and Executive. One other question: I think you said, in answer to Lord Islington, that it was necessary to discriminate between decisions made by the Governor and the Executive and the Governor and Ministers. You do not mean to say that the Governor should be involved in the responsibility for a decision of which he may wholly disapprove?—Certainly not.

9361. Therefore, that would not be the distinction; the distinction would be the Governor and Executive on the one hand and the Ministers—not the Governor, as you said—on the other?—The form you have got right through the British Empire, where you have a full responsible government established, is "the Governor in Council" just as you have the King in Council in England. It is thoroughly understood that the Governor is not personally responsible any more than the King is. So in India we should say "the Governor on the advice of his Ministers" when we wish it to be understood their act is done on the responsibility of ministers. We should say "the Governor in Council" when the Act is one responsibility for which is reserved to the Governor and his Executive Council

9362. You do not think the Governor would resent violently the idea of any responsibility being connected with his name, by connecting his name with any decision from which he dissented? Do you think any Governor would stand that?—I think he would know very little of constitutional usage if he did not

9363. There are one or two very important things I want to make sure I understand, and first about that strip along the frontier. I understand you when you say that the defence of the frontiers of India from the east to the north-west should be wholly a matter of Imperial concern, but do I understand you to mean that that involves that in the strip of territority any functions should be taken over, and that the education, local government and the sanitation and all those functions should be discharged there by the Imperial Government, or what do you mean the separation to be actually?—When the times comes you might have to face those functions; you have to face them in Gibraltar and Malta.

9364. Why is it exactly—I do not express any opinion, but I merely want to find out—that you think upon this particular frontier it is necessary to take over these functions? How will it jeopardise the responsibility of the Imperial Government for the frontier to leave education and sanitation and other purely Provincial matters there in the hands of the Local Governments?—It is very likely that the Government ultimately responsible for, let us say, the North-West Frontier Province, might arrange with a neighbouring Province to carry out the services for it, but I cannot foresee the time, if the British Empire is to remain together, when you would be justified in handing over the North-West Frontier Province to a Dominion Government of India, and I should say exactly the same if India was peopled with Englishmen; I should say it would be wrong in principle.

9365. I see that?—You would much better affirm that principle now.

9366. Is it not quite possible to affirm the principle that you are going to defend for ever the frontiers of India without having the actual day-to-day administration of the strip put into your own hands? That is the point I want to get at?—If you reserve them you can very likely with advantage arrange for things like education to be administered by a neighbouring province, but I think it would be very unwise to let that area be policed except by yourselves.

9367. The next question is this: answering Major Ormsby-Gore, am I quite clear in gathering that you would allow the Governor of the Province to tax for reserved subjects by ordinance; is that your proposal?—Well I always have those words "By ordinance" brandished at me, I would allow him to tax by the procedure which I have described in front of this Committee, certainly.

9368. If it is not by ordinance it is by fiat?—As I have said in my Statement, both in your report and in Sir William Meyer's evidence the word "ordinance," implies a law passed without discussion; I do not mean that. I mean every law without exception, including those under the reserved powers, should be subjected to the fullest discussion in detail with amendments moved.

9369. And afterwards if——?—Afterwards, if the Governor cannot accept an amendment instead of packing a Grand Committee or instead of collecting your officials to vote the amendment down, he should allow the Legislative Council to record their opinion. In doing so they discharge their responsibility to their electorate for advising the Government. Having allowed them to record their opinion, then the Governor says, "Gentlemen, I am very sorry, I cannot accept it," and it does not take effect. That is what I call honest procedure.

9370. By that honest procedure I want to get it clear that I am right in saying that a tax is to be imposed on the people of the Province on the ultimate responsibility of the Governor alone?—Yes. I do not see why you should run away from it. You will have to do it.

9371. I am not arguing against it. I only want to understand?—Certainly.

9372. My last question, now that I have got those two points is this: You said also in answer to Major Ormsby-Gore that under the Bill as it stands it is within the power of Ministers to starve the reserved services or to try to rob the reserved services?—Yes. I do not know whether it is in their power to rob the reserved services, but I think that the effort which will be needed on the part of the Governor and Executive Council to prevent their being robbed will be destructive of all good relations between him and his Ministers.

Lord Sinha.

9373. I just want to ask two or three questions. I understand from your written note that you are in favour of the particular amendment which I have always advocated, namely that Ministers, if there is more than one, should be a corporate entity like the Executive Council itself is?—I am heartily in favour of that; I think it must be so.

9374. There is just one other question I want to ask now, following up what Mr. Montagu asked you about the taxation proposals. Supposing the Government had to carry a proposal for taxation in reference to the reserved subjects in the way you suggest, it would first of all have to be with the prior sanction of the Secretary of State, and in any case it would always be subject to appeal to Parliament?—Everything is subject to appeal to Parliament.

9375. And so would this taxation be, which was contrary to the wishes of the Legislature?—Do you mean it should be made specifically subject to an appeal to Parliament?

9376. No; I mean it would in fact and in law be subject?—Certainly.

9377. And before such taxation was imposed it would be necessary for the Governor to obtain the sanction of the Secretary of State?—Certainly, and Parliament might dismiss the Secretary of State if he gave the sanction wrongly.

Chairman.

9378. There are only two questions I want to ask you—one on your conception of the way the separate purse would work. You have told us that if Ministers required money to carry out their schemes which the funds placed at their disposal by allocation did not otherwise permit they would have to impose taxation?—Yes.

9379. Objection has been made to that, that it would be rather hard to ask them to impose fresh taxation at a moment when possibly there was a balance or surplus in the hands of the Governor in Council in respect of reserved subjects?—Yes, I should imagine under those circumstances a wise Governor would wish to hand that money over, and should have power to do it.

9380. The Governor would have power to hand certain money over, and you wish that the Minister should be in

in a position to pull the Governor up if he considers it inconsistent with his duty?—The question is a little complicated by the fact, which is so strange to English minds, that the Provincial Governments always have balances in hand. Whether that is to be continued or not I do not know.

9381. Yes, and we will assume that the balance will be divided between the reserved and transferred subjects like the revenue, and before imposing fresh taxation the Ministers will use up their side of the balance?—There we have difficulty. I do not think Ministers should be entitled, having swallowed their own reserves, then to proceed to swallow the reserves of the Executive Council which they had been obliged to keep by the Government of India.

9382. You would give the Governor full power to put at the disposal of the Ministers any portion of his reserve he thought he could part with?—With the sanction of the Government of India. The Government of India is the guardian of these reserves, and therefore I do not see how the Governor, with the best will in the world, could hand them over without the sanction of the Government of India, although I do want to see the sanctions required by the Government of India reduced to the lowest possible point.

9383. You said that there should be a Minister of Finance?—Yes.

9384. You used the word "Minister" advisedly?—Yes.

9385. Would he be a Minister for reserved finance as well as for transferred finance?—Certainly not; there should be a finance member of the Executive Council.

9386. That would be a Finance Minister and a finance member?—Yes.

9387. There would be a Finance Department of the whole Government?—I do not think I can usefully go into those details, but I am perfectly clear that a system can be worked out, and the only system which will work so far as I can see would be one in which each Government (because I regard them as two Governments) has its own financial member.

9388. You have explained that you do not want any Grand Committee?—That is so.

9389. And you would reduce, I understand, as far as possible the number of nominated members in the Legislative Council?—I would eliminate them altogether as voters. I have worked on that system myself, I was a member of the Upper House in the Transvaal, in which Ministers were members without votes, and there was no difficulty whatever. I would make the members of the Executive Council members without votes, and I would leave it perfectly open for them to introduce any other officials whose advice would be helpful at any moment to the Councils, but always without votes.

9390. You do not mean you would eliminate members nominated especially to represent special classes like the oppressed classes?—No, I am talking of officials.

9391. You are talking of the official bloc, composed partly of officials and partly of non-officials?—Yes.

9392. I want you to tell me exactly in one respect how a Legislative body like that would work. The Ministers proposed some scheme, it does not matter on what subject, which is adopted in the full Council, the Governor, Ministers and members of the Executive Council, and I will assume that the Governor and the members of the Executive Council all advise Ministers against this scheme. The Ministers withdraw, and on their own responsibility they decide to go on with the scheme. The Governor says what you have suggested, "I think you are wrong, gentlemen, but the responsibility is yours, go ahead." Now there is a case against that scheme and it is very important that the Legislative Council should know what that case is before it comes to its decision: who is going to make the case?—I think the Governor might well insist upon the discussion of such a matter in the Legislative Council, in which case the members of the Executive Council will be there, and will be able to make the case.

9393. You do not shrink from the idea of the members of the Executive Council opposing and speaking against the Ministers in the Legislative Council, or vice versa?—They do not vote, so it is hardly opposition, and they have no phalanx behind them to vote, but I do not think I do shrink from it. It carries right through the principle I have suggested that before the Ministers and the Legislative Council decide on transferred subjects they should be exposed to the fullest possible degree to the influence of the Governor and the Executive Council.

9394. If the members of the Executive Council can speak against Ministers in the Legislative Council, must not the Ministers be free to speak against members of the Executive Council opposing reserved subjects?—Most certainly; I see no objection; I think that the whole unity figured in the Report is unreal.

9395. You have stated also that you are opposed to the Council of State as proposed in the Bill?—Yes.

9396. Would you have no Second Chamber at all?—Not at present.

9397. Not even in the Government of India?—No; I would hope that the Prince's Council, in future, would develop into a Second Chamber, because I am looking forward to a united India.

9398. I have only one last question to ask you in relation to this question of land revenue to which you have given very close attention, and in respect of which you have circulated to the Committee a pamphlet. I want to draw your attention to statements made before this Committee by Mrs. Besant at questions 1433 and 1434. This is Major Ormsby Gore's question, No. 1433: "One question on your evidence this morning. You said you were anxious to see transferred at once in the province the three subjects of land revenue, irrigation, and famine relief, which are now reserved. Will you give me your argument in support of the proposal to transfer those three subjects?" And this is Mrs. Besant's answer: "It is one of the greatest grievances at present in India that the Legislative Council have no power at all with regard to the periodical re-assessment of the land. The land tax is one which, of course, represents the old land tax, but is very much larger." This is Major Ormsby Gore's question, No. 1434: "Not larger than in the Mongol times?" And Mrs. Besant's answer is: "Much larger than then, because in many provinces it goes to 50 per cent., whereas Akbar took one-fourth or one-sixth. Other Mongols only took one-fourth or one-twelfth, and most Hindoo sovereigns varied from one-fourth to one-sixth or one-tenth. It is enormously larger." In your opinion, is that a correct statement of the fact?—I do not know what sources of information, of course, Mrs. Besant was speaking from, but I have studied the question, and I shall give my own source of information. As I understand, mainly relying on the "Gazetteer," what Akbar did was to take up to one-fourth of the gross produce of land. Now, as I read Mrs. Besant's statement, it is that the British Government takes twice as much. If the Committee will refer to the "Imperial Gazetteer," volume 4 page 216, they will find the following statement: that in 1907 it was calculated that throughout British India the Government was taking not more than 50 per cent. of the net assets, or 5½ per cent. of the gross produce. Now, if Mrs. Besant stated that the British Government was taking 50 per cent. of the gross produce, she is in conflict with the "Imperial Gazetteer," which states that in 1907 it was taking not 50 per cent., but 5½ per cent. of the gross produce. My reference can be verified.

Sir J. D. Rees.

9399. May I ask, Mr. Curtis, one question? Upon the question of the size of the provincial administrative units, you say on page 9 of your Memorandum, "No attempt was made to restore the Ooriyas included in the Central Provinces and the north-eastern corner of Madras, to unity with their kinsman in Orissa," is that illustration founded upon the past history of those tracts, or is it solely of an academic character? Do you think those tracts have suffered at all by being severed from other Ooriya-speaking tracts?—I only judge from the deputation of Ooriyas who came to see the Secretary of State and the Viceroy at Calcutta, and then, for some reason best known to themselves, they called on me, and I found that they deplored the separation from their own Province of the Ooriyas, who were merged in Madras and in the Central Provinces, and wanted them re-united.

9400. Were those Madras Ooriyas who petitioned?—No, they were Ooriyas from Orissa.

9401. As far as you know the Ooriyas of Madras have had no cause to complain of their administration by the Madras Government?—It is not a question exactly of cause to complain of the administration.

9402. That is what I am asking exactly. I am not raising any point of principle which you have sufficiently covered, but I was on this specific point: it is not because of any maladministration of the Ooriyas, but you simply illustrate your thesis by quoting their case as a divided community you would like to see gathered together in one?—I gathered that they would like to see it, and as far as my observation goes where there are people of a common race and common language all over the world they like to be under one political system.

9403. Are you aware that the administration of these particular Ooriyas is not that of the ordinary collector, magistrate or Commissioner administration, but that the local representative of the Madras Government qua agent of the Governor administers them as a backward tract and non-regulation Province, and also their needs are particularly met by this particular form of administration?—I did not know that, but it does not alter my view.

9404. No, it would not, but I am anxious that there should be no misunderstanding on this point. As one reads this one might think that the Ooriyas in general, including those in Madras, objected to their present position, and therefore led you to give them as an illustration of your general academic point?—The complaint was not one of maladministration of these people at all. If government is to be transferred from us on to their own shoulders the Ooriya people will want to be gathered in one community with their own language and their own kinship.

Sir JAMES MESTON, K.C.S.I. is called in; and further Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

9405. I think the Government of India have instructed you to put forward some more evidence?—Yes, the Government of India instructed me to ask your lordships' Committee if it might represent its views upon certain points which have arisen in the course of the evidence you have heard. I think the Government of India have seen most, if not all, of the recorded evidence that was taken before the vacation. They are very careful to say that they do not pretend to claim anything in the way of a right of reply to the evidence, but there clearly were points with regard to which there was some danger that their views had not been clearly understood by some of the witnesses, or probably not even perfectly clearly put forward by myself; and also, in the light of the further ventilation that has taken place here, there are some modifications in their proposals which they think might be helpful to the Committee in the course of its deliberations, and they have asked me to put those before you. Beginning at the top, they wished to put forward certain views with regard to the proposals for the control of the Secretary of State over the Government of India. They are greatly apprehensive of the consequences of the important principle which seems to underlie the proposals of the Committee over which Lord Crewe presided—namely, the principle that an agreement between the Government of India and the Indian Legislature on any point, however important, ipso facto renders the Secretary of State's sanction superfluous. Their argument is this: The Government of India is not an autocratic body; it must derive its authority either from the British Parliament through the Secretary of State, or from the will of the Indian people through the Indian Legislature, and to the extent to which the Secretary of State abandons his authority, except, of course, in so far as he delegates it to the Government of India, the Indian Legislature must be expected to take up the ground. That seems patent. But what they fear in the present proposal is the suggestion that the Government of India should be in some way free, or should be driven, to choose between two agencies of control. In other words, they are afraid of this: That if they or their successors cannot woo their own Legislature, induce their own Legislature, to take the point of view to which they attach importance, they would have to appeal to the Secretary of State. On the other hand, if they expected differences with the Secretary of State they would set to work and persuade their Legislature to champion their cause. They apprehend this to be a very dangerous doctrine, and for the present they would prefer that the Secretary of State should retain unquestioned control, subject always to whatever measure of generous delegation he might consent to. Where the Executive Government in India finds itself strongly supported by the Legislature, that fact would unquestionably be a factor, and a very considerable one, with the Secretary of State in considering whether to sanction or disallow the policy in question; and, as I ventured to say when I was before the Committee last, a convention undoubtedly would grow up by which the Indian Legislature, in regard to certain matters, would not be interfered with by the Secretary of State. On similar reasoning, the Government of India are anxious that the Secretary of State should give his prior sanction to all Bills for the introduction of which permission is asked in the Indian Legislature. If that is considered too great a measure of interference with the Legislature they would suggest that Section 65 of the Government of India Act, sub-section (3), might be enlarged—that is the powers of the Indian Legislature—so as to specify, on the analogy of Section 79, the class of legislation, which may not be undertaken without previous sanction by the Secretary of State.

Chairman—continued.

9406. But that proviso about receiving the previous sanction should not be changed. Do I understand that?—That is the proposal. Speaking quite generally on the whole subject they feel that what is desired in this case is that the establishment, if I may call it so, of a more national Government, a Government with more sympathy with national aspirations, should be left to the spirit of the time and the growth of practice and precedent than be incorporated in any rigid provisions in the Bill or rules under it. That is the first large issue I was asked to mention. The second refers to the proposal that there should be some form of diarchy in the Central Government. The Government of India are not very clear naturally, because they have not heard the whole discussion, what form of diarchy is definitely proposed. It seems to them that some of those who have pressed for the measure speak as if they wanted a Minister attached to the Government of India, a member of the Government of India whose duty it would be specially to supervise the development of transferred subjects and the administration of transferred subjects in the Provinces. They would deprecate this very strongly, because they feel that this task is essentially the task of the Governor and he is the man who has to watch and to guide this very important constitutional change. Others seem to suggest that the diarchy sought is this, that in some way the Indian members of the Executive Council are to have special powers, in conjunction with the Legislature, for what have been called the more domestic or popular subjects. They would, of course, regard this as quite irreconcileable with the position of the members of the Council as jointly responsible for the deliberations of the whole Executive body. However, whatever may be the precise form of diarchy which finds most favour, the Government of India do not like it. They do not know and they do not profess to say what is to be the future of the Central Government. It may be that diarchy will have to come there in some form or another in time, or the line of development may take quite another course and it may never be necessary to have diarchy. Anyhow, what the Government of India say is that there is no use gazing into the far future. For the present we have ten years time to allow those developments to

to mature in the Provinces, and the subject of the future Government of India can quite easily be reviewed after that interval elapses, and when there is much more material for judgment. For the present, therefore, the view of the Government of India is precisely that which is embodied in paragraph 289 of the Joint Report. They quite admit that the Joint Report has been treated by themselves and by everybody else as a draft for criticism, but they do think in paragraph 289 there is a special importance and special weight attached to the retention of the authority of the Government of India on very much its present basis. They want to emphasise this point of view, and they instruct me to say that they would have had very great difficulty in going so far in the way of assenting to changes in the Provincial administration if they had felt any doubt about the firmness of the future central power. Of course, it may be that they will be twitted with having doubts in their own minds as to the principle of diarchy which they have advocated very strongly for the Provinces, but that is not really the case. The diarchy in the Provinces is a special provisional measure intended to carry over the period of training, and in itself to be an effective agent for training. At the same time, nobody can be blind to the fact that it does involve risks, and that those risks have been deliberately taken in the Provinces for the purpose in the whole of this great experiment of encouraging the development of responsibility. The attitude of the Government of India is that in central affairs this need does not exist at present, and, therefore, there is no need for taking the risks. They urge very strongly that time is necessary to consolidate the new constitution, and they hope that time is going to be given to them by leaving them in a situation of neither delicacy nor anxiety about the strength and the simplicity of the control of the central authority.

The third point upon which I have instructions is the increase of the number of Indian members of the Executive Council of the Governor-General. They have seen suggestions in the evidence that there should be a large extension of the number, that so many as one-half of the whole number of the members should be Indians, and one witness the other day pressed for at least half, suggesting that it might be even higher. The Government of India have no desire to touch upon either racial or controversial questions which necessarily must be of great delicacy in discussing the merits of individuals, or the suitability of individuals. I do not myself think that they view with much equanimity the general prospect of a large increase of the Council quite irrespective of the constitution of it, because I think most people who are competent to judge rather feel that the Council as it at present exists is quite big enough for efficient working, and that certainly any increase in its size would tend to the increase of the Departmental evil, that is, to work being done much more Departmentally than being brought before a very large body for slow and protracted deliberation. But what they are seriously alarmed about is that in this or in any other way there should be in the near future an absolute majority in the Council who have no administrative experience. I quite admit, and I am sure the Government of India would endorse that view, the time will come when administrative experience will be provided by the development of the experiment in the Provinces, but at the present moment it does not exist to that extent. They specially ask that during the initial stage it should be in a position to exercise firmness, and to give prompt decisions in case of emergencies. They have gladly agreed to the inclusion of two Indian members in the Council, one of whom will be normally a Hindoo and the other normally a Mohammedan; but they ask me to urge on the Committee that any further development should await the recommendations of the first Statutory Commission.

The next point refers to the voting of the Central Budget by the Indian Legislatures. I should like, if I may, to read the words of a telegram in which they have conveyed their instructions to me. After asking me to express their opposition to this proposition, they go on to say this: "We are profoundly unwilling to accept the untried restorative power. We believe that such a power could not possibly be used with the frequency that the situation will demand. We regarded it as only the second merit of the separate purse system in the Provinces that it made this arrangement superfluous in the case of reserved subjects."—I shall explain that point later—"If we admit that the Legislature may vote the Budget, we recognise that the Legislature normally has financial control, and therefore may shape the policy of the Executive except on those extreme occasions when the latter calls up its last resources and overrules the Legislature. To grant such powers to an assembly, whose capacity in matters of Imperial importance is still quite unknown, would in our opinion be most unsafe. Such a grant would mean that on every contested point of revenue, e.g., salt, customs, income tax, and of expenditure, e.g., Military, Civil Service, railways, ecclesiastical, etc., the Government of India could only maintain their policy by confronting a situation comparable to that which in the interests of ultimate security they recently faced on the occasion of the Rowlatt Bill. A state of sustained hostility must ensue between the Executive and the Legislature unless—and this is in practice the more probable consequence—the normal control of finance, and therefore of policy, passes entirely to the Legislature. What we accept both as regards reserved and central subjects is the influence of the Legislature, and what we definitely reject is their control. We undertake to weigh carefully the suggestions of the Legislature in regard to finance, and we hold that, in that Government which is the keystone, this is all that can safely be allowed for the initial decennial period." Then in regard to Standing Committees with the Government of India and the Parliamentary Under Secretaries, they would ask that if those institutions are accepted by the Joint Committee an exception should be made in the case of two Departments—the Army Department, and the Foreign and Political Departments. They think that the danger, to put it quite frankly, of leakage in those very important Departments where secrecy is of such high importance, justifies them in recommending special treatment. Those are the points in regard to the Central Government.

Now, coming to the Provinces, the first point which they wish to take is in regard to the method of control over the official half of the Government in its administration of reserved subjects. There is a passage in the Report of the Crewe Committee which again has rather disturbed their minds, because it seems to suggest that the Secretary of State is to enter into much closer relations with Local Governments in regard to the control of these matters. They hope that that is not intended, and they are quite content to stand, and they believe the necessities of the case will be met, by the formula in what is briefly called the Feetham Committee Report, where it is laid down as the principle of control that the Governor-General in Council shall exercise superintendence, direction and control over Local Governments in regard to reserved subjects with regard to the purposes of the Act as laid down in the Preamble. The Government of India have observed that that formula is not embodied in the Act. In Clause 1, sub-clause 3, there is a parallel formula in regard to transferred subjects, but they assume that the formula which I have just quoted in regard to reserved subjects is accepted, and, if that is so, they are perfectly content; and here again they would state the position in exactly the same way as I have tried to state it with reference to the Central Power, that if a Provincial Legislature was in accord with a Provincial Executive over some matter which requires superior sanction, the sanctioning authority would give the very greatest possible weight to that fact, but that it would not in itself be a reason for dispensing with the authority if necessary on other grounds.

The next point is the constitution of the Provincial Executive in cases where the Governor is a stranger to Indian conditions. They renew their plea for the addition of a second member to the Executive Council with the service qualification—they do not say whether Indian or European, and that is immaterial, but it is the administrative experience which is desired. As they understand the position, there is no question of maintaining a balance between Indian and English Councillors; it is entirely a matter of giving a Governor with no local knowledge more official assistance than is required by one who has himself been trained in Indian conditions, and, even if the theory of balance is admitted, it is to be remembered that in some Provinces you may have two Ministers appointed at once, and the Governor might thus find his colleagues to consist of only one trained official alongside one recently appointed non-official Councillor and two untried Ministers; they think that might be a dangerous situation.

The next point is in regard to voting by the Legislative Council in the Provinces of budget provisions for reserved departments. I need not quote the telegram, but what I did quote before refers almost in identical terms to this issue. They have in practice little confidence in the power of restoration, and they apprehend that its frequent use would produce grave friction between the Governor and the Legislature, and they stand again on the principle that the Legislature may influence, but ought not to control, the policy of the reserved departments.

Then they come to the use of the Grand Committee, or, in the alternative, ordinances. They quite realise the extent to which the system of ordinances will expose the Governor and the official half of the Executive to sharper and closer criticism than the alternative method of acting through a Committee of the Legislature, but, on the whole, unless the Committee of the Legislature is to be an effective legislative organ, and it certainly is not in some of the proposals that are before this Committee, they would prefer the perfectly straightforward and honest course of having the affirmative power of legislation in the form of ordinance. They would certainly expect these ordinances to be freely discussed beforehand by the Legislature, and the ordinance power would not be used except after the previous approval of the Governor-General in Council. Then they renew respectfully their objection to the elaboration of figures in the first Schedule of the Act.

9407. You mean the members?—Yes, the membership of the Legislatures. As I said before, they are quite content to have the aggregate number, the ratio of elected and nominated members, prescribed in the Act; but the other details they would much prefer to leave to rules, especially as they still consider that a good many of the points in connection with the franchise and the constituencies require further examination, which they are now giving them.

Diarchy I do not know that I need touch upon; they stand by that. I am to ask permission to put in a narrative of the actual manner of daily working of a diarchic Government, or dual Government, as they see it in a Province. They had reduced the mechanism of the dual executive to a series of elaborate rules, but when we examined them here we found they were probably too severe; and what is proposed is to substitute the brief narrative of procedure which, if I may, I will hand in in two or three days.

Then comes the separate purse by which they stand very hopefully, and they have just sent a telegram on the subject, of which the origin is this: During the last month accredited representatives of the different Local Governments have been at work with the Government of India, endeavouring to compile and fix the materials for the allocation of the central contribution as between Provinces—the spade work preparatory to that Committee on Financial Relations, which we have asked for. In the course of their investigations, they have apparently, and quite naturally, had to look into the whole question of the allocation of Provincial finance in the future, and they have sent, I may say, a perfectly unsolicited testimonial in the shape of the following telegram:—"At recent conference with representatives of Local Governments on the subject of Provincial settlements under the reform scheme, the question of a joint versus a separate purse was informally discussed. The unanimous view was that a separate purse was essential, and that there would be no difficulty in adopting the separate purse system in practice. These views were only the personal views of the Provincial representatives, including, of course, a large number of financial secretaries to Local Governments, and are not necessarily the official views of the Local Governments themselves." I do not know if I should weary you again by touching on the subject of the reservation of higher education.

9408. I think you ought to tell us anything the

Government of India told you to tell us?—In regard to higher education, their point of view was briefly this. After hearing and seeing a very great mass of evidence which has been laid before you, they regard the position in this way: They do not contest for a moment that education in an Indian Province must be regarded as an organic whole, and that education, if it is going to be worthy of the country, must be inspired, so to speak, by the genius of the nation, or, in other words, that the educational system ought to be an expression of national life. They admit all this as a statement of ideal fact, but what they are concerned with is the practical business of the moment, and that business is to get our educational system adapted to the development of India, and, if one may say so, to the expansion of of its national life and genius. Now higher education, from their point of view, is the key to the whole of the social and economic changes that they foresee in India, and they regard it, and they put it in the most entirely impersonal way, as the clearest duty of the official Government to establish higher education on a satisfactory basis before they hand over heavier responsibilities to the people. A passage to which very considerable weight must be attached is found in chapter 30 of the Report of Sir Michael Sadler's Commission, and in paragraph 12 of that chapter, and the succeeding paragraphs, there seems to be a very powerful argument to support the position of the Government of India. The Commission start by pointing out how to build up a sound system of national education in the country. Their first step is this: "At the base of the system should be well-staffed primary schools, bringing a new stimulus to the mass of the population by means of training liberal in spirit and yet adapted to the conditions under which the vast majority of the people must afterwards seek a livelihood." This stage the Government of India believe must develop into the only possible agency for the training of the electorate of the future, and, consequently, for expanding the electoral roll and for bringing in the true growth of democratic institutions. That work they believe to be essentially the work of Ministers, and, not only that, they say it provides enough work for Ministers in the field of education certainly for the first ten years—and in all these criticisms I do not profess to go beyond ten years ahead. Then, says the Commission: "In order that every child of special promise may enjoy further opportunity, the primary schools should be linked up to secondary education in its various grades." This link at the present moment does exist. It is a loose link, and it is not incompatible with the differentiation of the administrative authority of the primary schools on the one hand and the upper schools on the other. We can maintain that link, we are confident, by concerted action between those who are responsible for primary schools and those who are responsible for secondary schools; in other words, if our proposals are accepted, by concerted action between Ministers and the Governor in Council, as in hundreds of other subjects. But we do contend that the existence of this link, and this link only—and this is the only link—is not a final argument for placing both branches under the same administrative authority. Then Sir Michael Sadler's Commission goes on to discuss high schools and universities, but I need not quote the further passages. He points out that in regard to these higher forms of education infinite care is necessary in the organisation, and that they must be developed by patient experiment, by public and private expenditure on a generous scale, and with rigorous regard for excellence in quality; and then he goes on to show how in Bengal under private agency, in the absence of adequate Government control, those essentials have not been observed. That is as much as I need say, I think, in support of an argument which you have heard many times over.

The other points are comparatively trivial. The Government of India hope that there will be no such thing as a revision of the lists of reserved and transferred subjects five years hence, for reasons which have been already very fully stated and considered. They hope that as to rules made by the Secretary of State under Clause 23, either through the method of resolution in Parliament or in another way, special publicity will be given to them before they become final. They have asked that some addition shall be made to the Third Schedule of the Act, but I understand that these recommendations are now being examined in the India Office. The Third Schedule is the list of offices reserved to the Indian Civil Service. They would also ask that in order to save trouble hereafter, the Committee should be pleased to raise the maximum strength of the Legislative Council of Burma from thirty to 100. It is defined in the Act at present as thirty, and we feel that in view of possible development in Burma it would be convenient to put in the higher number now and avoid the necessity of subsequent legislation.

Those are the points I desire to bring before the Committee.

Lord Sinha.

9409. Do they recommend what the number should be?—One hundred.

Mr. Montagu.

9410. You said in one place that the Government of India stands firm about diarchy?—In the Provinces, yes.

9411. Am I not correctly summarising what you have said if I say that with the exception of Standing Committees and Under Secretaries and Burma they stand firm about every proposal which they have made?—Yes, I think that is so.

9412. Really the object of your instructions to state their views once more to the Committee is that they obviously feel they would not have been impressed themselves by the evidence that we have heard, and they hope that we would not be either?—Well, they have seen most of the evidence.

9413. They have seen it and were not impressed by it, and hope that we would not be. Is not that a fair statement?—I think they would be prepared to suggest that, if the Committee had an omniscient witness before them, he probably would be able to dispose of a considerable amount of the evidence which has been heard.

9414. Let me take one or two of your cases. They would deprecate the suggestion that the Government of India should be allowed to have its own way when it was in agreement with the Legislative Council. Let us take administration and legislation separately. With regard to legislation, it has never been suggested that the Crown should abandon its right to veto, which exists in every part of the Empire?—No, that stands.

9415. That would remain, and therefore this suggestion can only really apply, so far as statute is concerned, to administration. Is not the theory of the Government of India that the Secretary of State in Council is the instrument devised by Parliament for the execution of its trusteeship as the representative of an electorate in India which does not exist?—I understand that the British Parliament undertakes the protection of the interests of the Indian people?—Yes.

9416. Unless the Legislative Assembly of the Government of India expresses a view which there is reason to believe is not the view of the electorate it is supposed to represent, or is not the view of the people that the electorate is supposed to represent, is there any reason for the interference of the British Parliament?—The view the Government of India take is that that undoubtedly would be a final argument if India had reached a stage of full responsibility, but that during the stages at which that responsibility is being created the accountability of the British Parliament, and through them of the Government of India, cannot be dispensed with.

9417. But I do not think that is quite an answer to my question. It is a very important topic. Supposing that the Government of India were confronted with the wish of its Legislative Council on a subject on which it believed that the Legislative Council, because of the electorate of India and because of the nascent condition of representative institutions in India, was not representing India, and supposing it came to the conclusion that although they asked for it in the Legislative Assembly it was not what India really wanted, then they would not agree with it, would they?—No, I take it they would not.

9418. Therefore the only case in which the Government of India can agree with the Legislative Assembly is a case in which they believe that the Legislative Assembly is asking for something which India really wants. In that case what reason is there for the interference of the Secretary of State in Council?—I think the Government of India honestly feel that they are put into the position of having to decide when it is representing the voice of India and when it is not, and they would much prefer to have the Secretary of State behind them in making a decision of so much importance.

9420. Should not you think that the Government of India were in a better position when confronted with the arguments of the debate than the Secretary of State?—There is another consideration: the extent to which you remove the control of the Secretary of State, or to which the Secretary of State abrogates his own control, represents also the extent to which he is unable to come to the support of the Government of India when they require it. Control and support go hand in hand.

9421. Then it really comes to this, that the only possible way in which you can get a delegation from London to India in the Government of India is either by choosing subjects upon which the Secretary of State will permit the Government of India to do what it likes, or by choosing a principle something like this upon which the Government of India will be allowed to do what it likes. You object on behalf of the Government of India to the principle, and therefore you can only fall back on a series of subjects and limits?—The series of subjects and limitations will, of course, have to be undertaken. I hope I have not overstated it, but the objection to the principle I think is more an objection to recording the principle in a rigid formula of law.

Chairman.

9422. That is what I understood from the beginning?—They accept the principle as a motive power—that is to say, they entirely agree that the consent of the Legislature to the proposal of the Executive is, first of all, a factor to which they themselves will attach the greatest importance, and, secondly, a factor which they would impress upon you when you have to decide whether this policy is to be accepted or not, but they trust that the operation of the principle will be left rather, as I said, to practice and experience than to a rigid formula of law and rule.

Mr. Montagu.

9423. Now I want to ask you a question about this prior sanction to all Bills. Do you by that mean Bills which the Government of India want to introduce, or Bills which any member of the Legislature wants to introduce?—They mean private members' Bills, as well as official Bills.

9424. In your experience does not the principle of previous sanction lead to one of two evils, either an enormous delay, or, very often when there is an urgent necessity, inability to give the Secretary of State in Council time to examine the Bill, and even in some cases to communicate his previous sanction?—I think the present rule provides an interval of two months between the intimation of intention to introduce a Bill and the period at which the Secretary of State's assent may be presumed. I have not heard any grievance on that point in regard to private Bills, and certainly in regard to official Bills the matter would be conducted by telegram. It is perfectly clear, and I hope I have not made it at all doubtful, that previous sanction in no way interferes with the right of the Crown to veto a measure which has been previously sanctioned.

9425. And you really attach importance to the keeping of the two checks, previous sanction and veto?—The importance which the Government of India attach to previous sanction is this: You may have a vast amount of legislation of a thoroughly unnecessary character, if I may say so, introduced and carried through both Houses, canvassed in the whole country, enormously debated, and then in the end vetoed; and they believe it would be much wiser in the present state of development to keep a control over the legislation at an early stage. But I have made the alternative suggestion that there should be a development of Section 65 in order to make it clear that there will be certain classes of cases in which the Legislature can go ahead without previous sanction.

9426. You will recollect cases of Bills which have had to be introduced without sanction, or rather, in which sanction has had to be given to skeletons of Bills because there has been no time?—Yes.

9427. The next question I want to ask you is about the Government of India's statement that they stand by their objection to diarchy in the Government of India. I imagine you would never suggest that in practice the Government of India would force a Bill through the Council of State—I am keeping the machinery now as it stands—for renewing indentured labour with Fiji?—No.

9428. You would not imagine, would you, that the Government of India would force a Bill through the Council of State that would deprive the Legislative Assembly of expressing their views on the results of the International Labour Convention at Washington?—No, certainly not.

9429. Is not some of the evidence we have had in this Committee based on the fact that there is a suspicion that the words in the Bill describing when the Council of State will be used are capable of very wide interpretation, and might be used for anything?—You mean "Peace, order, and good government."

9430. "Peace, order, and the interests of British India or any parts thereof"?—Yes, that fear has been expressed.

9431. Have not you gathered from the evidence that there is evidence of anxiety, apart from those who advocate diarchy in the same sense as it is advocated in the Provinces, to make certain that the Assembly will be given something to do, and will not be left merely to criticise?—Yes, I think that is very natural.

9432. And the Government of India, in refusing diarchy, can offer no suggestion as to how to relieve that anxiety at all?—The only suggestion is that which I ventured upon before—the determination either by some authoritative definition now or by the growth of practice in classes of cases such as you have enumerated, social legislation, or matters of that sort, in regard to which the Assembly would certainly not be interfered with by either the official side of the Government or by the Secretary of State.

9433. As to the three members of the Executive Council of the Government of India, and the suggestion that they would very much deprecate more than two, do you think there is any real difficulty in finding more than two men of administrative experience in the whole of India?—Among non-officials?

9434. It does not necessarily mean non-officials?—No.

9435. Does not your experience show that you beget a sense of irresponsibility when you keep people in a permanent and hopeless minority?—Yes, undoubtedly.

9436. Would not that really be an answer to some of your arguments about the other subjects—the voting on the Budget, for instance? Are you not much less likely to have opposition when votes have a real effect than opposition to motions when votes have no effect at all?—I think that is undoubtedly the lesson of the present system.

9437. Does not that answer, to some extent anyhow, some of the arguments of the Government of India, both about the voting on the Budget and about the composition of the Executive Council?—I think it would answer them in the future. At the present moment we are not confident that that responsibility exists, and what the Government of India do ask for—I can only repeat the formula, which I am afraid you have heard ad nauseam—is that their operations should not be subject to popular control at the present stage, however gladly they welcome popular influence.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

9438. One question about the joint purse. You heard Mr. Curtis's scheme of the separate purse?—Yes.

9439. What is the Government of India's attitude with regard to that?—I think they probably would say half a loaf is better than no bread, but they certainly would not prefer a fractional allocation of revenue to the allocation of specific sources of revenue, mainly, I think, for the reason I stated before that the allocation of specific sources of revenue does confer a feeling of much greater responsibility on those who have to undertake the task of assessing and collecting those revenues, which is absent from the alternative of the fractional system.

9440. In that paper with the proposal you handed in, the only large source of revenue was excise. It practically means giving Ministers excise to play with and nothing else?—They have a number of other substantial sources of revenue—they have agriculture; but excise is undoubtedly quite the largest.

Lord Islington.

9442. Assuming that the separate purse were introduced, a great deal more examination than has hitherto taken place would have to be made in each Province to work out a practical scheme?—I think we have most of the materials ready for such a body as has been suggested—an independent body of arbitration.

9443. You have the body ready?—No, the materials.

9444. In which Provinces?—I think they must necessarily be based on the statistics of revenue and expenditure of previous years. May I just mention in connection with that point a very important matter which was also touched upon this afternoon? It was suggested that it might be essential to start with a joint purse in order to prevent delay, and that the material for a decision as regards the separate purse or for the investigation by some such body as had been proposed by way of arbitration would take a very considerable time; in fact, it has been suggested that for the first three years we might go on as we are. I want to point out that as a practical proposition, I think that is an overstatement. We are now at the end of 1919. I do not profess to prophesy when the new regime will start, but obviously it cannot be very much before the beginning of the financial year which starts in April, 1921. When Ministers come, if they do come, into office in 1921 they will find a Budget ready, and there will be nothing for them to do—no difficulties and no disputes; their allotments will be there, and for that year they will simply have to work upon a Budget which, naturally, had to be prepared before they assumed office. So the issue would not become a vital one until January, 1922. What I want to point out is that between now and January, 1922, we can easily devise and get through the whole scheme for a separate purse in every Province.

9445. I want to be certain in regard to the dissent of the Government of India to the proposal that where the Legislative Assembly and the Viceroy's Council agree they still desire that the reference should be made home on the grounds that the Government of India, although they are in agreement with whatever the matter may be which has been carried by the Legislative Assembly, do not feel themselves prepared to take the responsibility of giving enforcement to their agreement?—I do not think they shirk the responsibility; they would probably welcome the opportunity. But what they do feel is that they are being placed in a position of having to decide when the Legislative Assembly is acting wisely in the interests of the whole of India, and when it is acting unwisely. That decision hitherto has lain, in matters of important policy, with the Secretary of State, and they only propose that the same principle shall be maintained.

9446. But would not that principle obtain? If they came to the conclusion on a particular occasion that the Legislative Assembly were not representing India and were therefore not acting wisely, they would dissent, and the mere fact of their dissent would necessarily involve reference home?—That is so.

9447. It would automatically entail reference home where there is disagreement between the Government of India and the Legislative Assembly. I cannot quite follow the trend of mind of the Government of India. Having satisfied themselves that the decision come to by the Legislative Assembly is one which represents Indian opinion, is one that is generally acceptable and useful, and is one, therefore, they can assent to, and when we want to see and they want to see as much delegation as possible, they still desire to refer home?—If they were thinking only about their own position at the moment, I have no doubt whatever they would welcome any opportunity of using the Legislative Assembly as a substitute for reference to the Secretary of State, but they feel they have to look to larger issues; they feel there is a very great danger, if not now, in the future, of a Government of India being tempted to play off the Secretary of State against the Legislative Council, and they do not want to put themselves or their successors in that position. I think that is the basic fact of their difficulty.

9448. Then what is the logical reason why they would extend that principle to the Provinces, and, in the case where the Legislative Assembly is in agreement with the Government on a reserved subject reference to a higher authority has to be made, because that argument would not necessarily obtain in the Provinces, would it?—The Governor might conceivably be tempted to play off his Council against the Government of India. It is exactly the same position.

9449. And in that case the Government of India desire they should have the last voice?—Where the matter is one which on other grounds would require their sanction. In nine cases out of ten we hope the necessity for sanction will be dispensed with by generous delegation in both spheres.

9450. Has the Government of India had an opportunity of reading Lord Crewe's Report?—Yes, they have seen it.

9451. You have had no reference from them that you can give this Committee as to the suggestions embodied in that note by Sir James Brunyate?—I know they dislike the suggestions, but I have no more material than those telegrams, which I think have been before this Committee.

Mr. Montagu.] Yes, they expressed their opinion in a telegram to me on that point.

9452. I understand the Government of India realise the difficulty they will have in the future of a Legislative Assembly with a large elective majority, and with no sort or kind of responsibility?—Yes.

9453. And I gathered from you just now that they are anxious, if they can, to introduce, in however modest a form, something in the nature of responsibility to that body?—I understand so. I think they are very anxious to get a responsibility which will grow up by convention.

9454. But you are not in a position to give us any considered reasons why they object to the tentative proposals put forward in that direction, and the only ones that I know of have been put forward by Sir James Brunyate?—I think what they feel, again, if I may put it in almost the same words, is that those proposals would make an excellent basis for the convention I have been trying to describe, but they do not want these proposals crystallised into the form that outside critics have given to them. As Sir James Brunyate himself explained, his proposals have been very gravely misunderstood or exaggerated, and the Government of India are apprehensive of that. They want to restrict the method of the operation of this new principle in practice.

9455. Would not the most effective way of doing that be to put it into the statute to make it quite clear?—I think that is exactly what they do not want to do.

9456. But would not it be the most effective way of restricting it, to make it quite clear what you may do and what you may not do?—I am afraid I have not any instructions on that point.

Lord Sinha.

9457. The Government of India agreed long ago that instead of the Indian element on the Viceroy's Executive Council being one it should be increased to two?—I think in the first despatch that was included.

9458. I understand that is their position still?—Yes.

9459. What is the precise danger if you increase the two to three?—As I explained it, the precise danger they anticipate is an increase in the inexperienced elements in the Council.

9460. Supposing you make one of the Indian members an Indian official, and take one from of official origin, that would get rid of the element of inexperience?—Yes.

9461. And you know it would give great satisfaction, and add to the sense of self-respect of all Indian politicians if they got that point?—I am sure it would.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Duke of NORTHUMBERLAND.	Mr BENNETT.
Earl of SELBORNE.	Sir HENRY CRAIK.
Lord BRODRICK (Viscount Midleton).	Mr. MONTAGU.
Lord ISLINGTON.	Major ORMSBY-GORE
Lord SYDENHAM.	Sir J. D. REES.
Lord SINHA.	Mr. SPOOR.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF SELBORNE IN THE CHAIR.

SIR SANKARAN NAIR, C.I.E., is called in: and Examined, as follows:—

Chairman,

9462. You have just ceased to be a member of the Government of India?—Yes.

9463. You were the Education member of the Government of India from 1915 to 1919?—From November 1915 to July 1919.

9464. And before that you were a Puisne Judge of the High Court of Madras?—Yes.

9465. Before that you were Advocate-General?—Yes; and before that Government leader and Public Prosecutor.

9466. You

Chairman—continued.

9466. You have been good enough to give answers to the questions we put to you?—Yes.

The following are the questions and answers:—

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India? and, if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"? And do you generally accept the proposition contained in the Preamble?—(a) Yes. (b) Responsible government implies the subordination of the Executive to the Legislative Council composed of the representatives of the people.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the Provinces involves the establishment in Provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority (Clause 6)?—Yes.

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the Executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—Yes. Subject in cases of differences of opinion to the control of Parliament generally to be exercised by a committee of the Houses of Parliament.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of government in the Provinces in which at present the Provincial Executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes?—I do not accept the assumption that the Minister and the Legislative Council are not responsible to Parliament. The Provincial Executive is at present only the agent of the Government of India and the Secretary of State. It has never been in a position to enforce its own wishes when they were not in conformity to the wishes of the Secretary of State. As regards reserved subjects, it must continue in the same position as heretofore.

5. If you accept the propositions stated under questions 1 to 4, do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view?—I think the dual form of government is the best means of securing responsibility.

7, 8. If you consider a dual form of government acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail the modification of which you regard as necessary? If so, what are those points, and what modifications would you suggest? 8. In particular, do you think (i) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure," i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their Department by the Governor or if they fail to retain the confidence of the Legislature (Clause 3 (1))? (ii.) That the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities (Clause 3 (3))? (iii) That the Executive Council should in all Provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian (Clause 4)? (iv.) That the Governor should have power to dissolve Legislative Councils (Clause 7 (iv.))?—(1) Ministers should be liable to removal if they fail to retain the confidence of the Legislature. (2) Yes. (3) The official European and the non-official Indian must be equal in number. (4) Yes.

9, 10. Referring back to questions 2, 3 and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the Legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed generally by Clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and legislative powers as ((i) suitable, or as (ii) unnecessarily severe, or as (iii) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament (Clause 9)? 10. In particular, (i) do you think that the Legislature should have power with whatever limitations to vote supplies (Clause 9 (2))? (ii) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—(1) The Budget as a whole should be placed before the Legislative Council for its assent, and not the proposals for the appropriation only. (2) I do not accept the plan of Grand Committee. My reasons are given in Par. 29 in my Minute of Dissent to the first Despatch of the Government of India and in my dissent to the second Despatch of the Government. In addition to the method that I have suggested I would also suggest that the Governor may be allowed the power to issue ordinance with the sanction of the Committee of the Houses of Parliament for the purpose of securing necessary legislation.

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to Provincial Legislative Councils over Provincial Governments?—Yes.

12. Do you agree that it is advisable none the less to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature (Clause 16)?—Yes.

13. Do you accept the plan of a bicameral Legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential (Clauses 14, 15, and 16)?—No. My reasons are given in par. 34 of my Minute of Dissent to the first Report of the Government of India.

14. Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature (Clause 20 (3) and (4))? Or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities?—I have suggested three courses at the end of par. 34 of my Minute of Dissent. With reference to the Budget, the sanction of the Legislative Assembly should be substituted for the sanction of the Secretary of State. Where the Executive Government of India and the Legislative Assembly differ in opinion the decision should rest with the Secretary of State acting on the advice of the Committee of the Houses of Parliament. See par. 35 of my Minute of Dissent.

15. Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council? If not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest?—I accept the Section 21. I would add, however, that there must always be three non-official Indians in the Viceroy's Executive Council. My reasons are given in par. 37 of my Minute of Dissent to the first Despatch by the Government of India.

16. Do you think that the development of Provincial autonomy on the one hand, and of self-government in the Provinces on the other, involves any modification of the provisions of Sections 2, 33, and 45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23)?—I accept Clause No. 23. I would substitute 5 for 10 in this Section.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—I would substitute "shall" for "may" in Part 1, Section 1, Clause 1. I would omit the words "for the allocation of Provincial funds for the purpose of such administration" in Clause "D" of the same Section. If they are not omitted, then it must be clearly pointed out that the rules should not be inconsistent with Section 9. I would omit the words "except with the sanction of the Secretary of State in Council" in Clause 2 of the same Section. If they are not to be omitted the sanction of the Committee of the Houses of Parliament should be a condition precedent to the exercise of such power by the Secretary of State. There must be a Clause similar to (3), in the same section, defining the powers vested in the Governor-General in Council so far as reserved subjects are concerned.

cerned. The rules should not reduce the number of members to be elected by General Electorates given in Schedule 1.

19. Have you any observations to offer on the Reports on Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs?—I have already recorded my opinion that there should be no difference between males and females. Punjab should be allowed at least 28 more men in their Legislative Council. I support communal representation. There should be no residential qualification in any Province. I have stated my reasons for my opinion on these and other questions arising out of the Report more fully in my Minutes of Dissent.

9467. We have had the advantage of reading your Minutes of Dissent which have accompanied the Despatches of the Government of India; therefore I think we are generally very fully informed of your opinion. Is there anything you would like to add now before the Committee?—I have nothing to add. I would prefer to wait for any questions that might be put to me if any explanation is needed.

Lord Sydenham.

9468. In your Minute of Dissent you speak of the village government of long ago. What period do you refer to?—Which part of the Minute do you refer to?

9469. On page 59, paragraph 3, of the Report of March 5th?—"It can scarcely be denied that in the ordinary villages a democratic form of government prevailed when the British took possession of the country." Is that the part you are looking to?—

9470. Yes?—I refer to the period when the British took possession of the country.

9471. When British rule gradually spread over India it found in every part of India this village system in full working order?—Almost so. Whether there are any exceptions in obscure villages I cannot say, but generally throughout India.

9472. And you say that the spread of the British system of revenue destroyed this village organisation and administration?—Yes, I do.

9473. Do you think that that village organisation can now be restored in any way?—Not in the form in which it prevailed of old.

9474. But your view is that that system of election and elective methods still lingers in the villages?—Yes.

9475. On page 61, in paragraph 8, you speak of the increasing poverty of India?—Yes.

9476. You are aware that that is a very serious statement?—Exactly.

9477. Can you give your reasons for believing that poverty in India is increasing?—I can do that. The strongest proof, in my opinion, is the rate of mortality, according to the census accounts which have been taken in India. That is one. The second is the decline which we find throughout the country of the physique of the schoolboys. The third is the difference in the physique of the jail population, according to the diet which was given to them some time before and at present. The next is their inability to withstand diseases. This conclusion is supported by probabilities, and among those probabilities I would name the decline of industries and the condition of the agricultural population. These are some of the things which occur to me at present.

9478. Do you know we have had strong evidence pointing to the increasing prosperity of the masses?—I believe so. That is an opinion held by various persons.

9479. When I was in India I was assured by Indians who are not old men that in their lifetime they have seen signs of improvement. Were they wrong?—You will be assured even now by some people that it is so, but that is not my opinion.

9480. You are aware that 1,200 million rupees have been withdrawn from circulation in four years? Those rupees must either have gone into ornaments or been buried underground. Does that extraordinary disappearance from the currency point to increasing poverty?—I cannot say that. May I interject one remark? All those conjectual arguments cannot weigh in my opinion against the inference to be drawn from facts which definitely point to a certain conclusion. Those conjectural arguments are useful to support and corroborate conclusions which may be drawn from facts, but in my opinion they cannot afford the foundation of any conclusion by themselves.

9481. Are you aware that the drain of precious metals towards India causes some anxiety in other countries?—So I have been told.

9481A. Do you think that a country which is drawing to itself a disproportionate share of the gold and silver of the world can be said to be getting poorer?—To derive any conclusion from that you must have comparative tables. You must know what precious metals were being drawn to India in the old days and then compare it with the present flow into India, and also consider it was and is in exchange for food products or not, otherwise you cannot draw any conclusion.

9482. Are you aware it has been stated that in quite recent years people have shown increasing powers of resistance to famine which they did not even forty or fifty years ago?—That is not the fact.

9483. That is not the fact?—Certainly not.

9484. You speak on page 64 of the restoration of Indian industries. What do you mean by that?—Because my own belief is that the Indians were an industrial nation in the old days. At present they are not.

9485. Would you say that in the old days—I do not know quite what the old days are—there were more Indians employed in industries than there are at this moment?—Certainly. If you will allow me I may state at present that my statement of the industrial condition and the causes thereof is almost a harmless statement, according to the evidence which is available. I had intended, in support of my statements, to put before the Committee the statements submitted to them by Sir Fazulbhoy Currimbhoy, the Mohammedan representative of Commerce in the Imperial Council. That contains generally the opinion of the Indian commercial community. If you wish it I will just draw attention to it without reading it unless the Committee wish it, so that you may satisfy yourself what the views of the commercial Committee are.

Chairman.

9486. I think it is enough if you give us your opinion and the authority?—Yes; it was circulated to the members of the Government of India on the 29th January, 1918.

Lord Sydenham.

9487. Can you tell us what are the obstacles in the creation of Indian enterprise by any Indian who has the capacity to manage it, who can secure the necessary amount of capital?—I am not an expert in it myself. I would rather refer you to that opinion of the Commercial Representative. If you wish to read it, I will lay it before you.

9488. You have observed the immense growth of the mill industry in Bombay and elsewhere in Indian hands?—Yes.

9489. That is a modern development, is it not?—Yes.

9490. That development arises from the example and the spectacle of the work of Europeans who brought the mill industry into India in the first instance?—Yes; I agree with you.

9491. Has not that led to a very large amount of employment of Indians in industry?—You mean of the labour population?

9492. Yes?—Yes; but that was not the point I was labouring at.

9493. You realise that all industry has undergone revolution in every country?—Yes.

9494. And that old hand industries in this country and elsewhere have never been able to hold their own since the introduction of power on a large scale?—If you will allow me to reply to all that in one word my point is not that. My point is simply that Indian industries have not had fair play at the hands of the Government.

9495. That

9495. That is the point I wish to elicit. Would you say in what way?—That is why I wanted rather to refer to the statement of an individual who has put forward that evidence before the Government of India, rather than in my own words. If I may give it to you I can do so.

9496. Having regard to the recent growth of such very large industries as the Tata Steel Company and the Tata Hydro-Electric Works, purely Indian industries, would you say that the Government was really obstructing the growth of industries of that kind?—There, again, I quite acknowledge that so far as the Tata industry is concerned, it had all possible encouragement from the Government. As to the mill industry, whether with the encouragement of the Government or not I do not know, but it has grown up. There are those two. But in spite of that the evidence to my mind is overwhelming that not only have the Government not encouraged Indian industries as it might have done, but there is a feeling amongst the commercial community of the whole of India that the Government and the railways and other departments controlled by Government have been standing in the way of Indian industries. In view of the questions which you are putting to me I should like to put this before the Committee, because that will save a lot of time, perhaps. May I, Mr. Chairman, place it before the Committee?

Chairman.] Put in your reference.

9497. You have referred the Committee to that Report?—Yes.

9498. You would not say that every Indian industry would not get as much encouragement as you say the Tata industry did get?—The Tata industry is an exceptional one for various reasons. The conditions under which it came to exist are exceptional. You know that better than myself. I would not rely upon the encouragement afforded to that industry as an example.

9499. Then your view is that Indian industries cannot start in any sufficient amount by Indian enterprise, and that Government must step in and take the initiative?—No; I do not say that either. I would like that to be done, but what I would say is that the Government ought to afford more encouragement than it has hitherto afforded.

9500. More encouragement?—Yes.

9501. You say in your Minute of Dissent as regards local self-government that the orders of Lord Ripon and Lord Morley with regard to self-government have been practically disregarded?—Yes.

9502. Would you say what you mean by that?—Yes. The orders of Lord Morley and Lord Ripon, as I understand them——

Chairman.

9503. Or rather Lord Ripon and Lord Morley?—Yes; I beg your Lordship's pardon. The effect of those orders was that Indians were to have the management of those institutions themselves, that in the District Boards and the Municipalities their voice was to be the predominant voice; they were to be advised by the officials, and their defects pointed out to them. As a fact that has not been carried out. The Municipalities and District Boards were really governed by officials. They had elected members in many of them, and their opinion was taken, but I cannot say that their opinion is generally given effect to. The Executive was not under the control of the elected members of the Municipalities; in a great many of the District Boards and Municipalities they had not a majority of elected members, and the chief Executive officer was not under the control of the local boards. All this was against the spirit of the orders of those two noble lords. Unfortunately, I did not bring it to-day, but if the Committee wish it I have at home a statement which shows the number of Municipalities which contained a majority of elected members; the number of Municipalities and District Boards in which the chief Executive officer was an elected member, and it will show in how very few local bodies there was really the predominance of the elected element. The other matter in which it was not carried out was that the funds were not placed at their disposal at all, which were necessary in order to carry out the duties that were imposed upon them.

Chairman—continued.

9504. May I ask that Sir Sankaran Nair should put in those figures?—If I go home I can bring it in the course of the day; I can certainly do it to-morrow.

9505. We have had evidence before this Committee of the Government of the Punjab taking strong steps to try and induce municipalities to adopt popular government, and they were successful only in a comparatively few instances. May that feeling among the people in some places against the popular institutions have retarded what Lord Ripon and Lord Morley wished to bring about?—No, it is not so. The feeling amongst the various leaders of public opinion against going into the local boards is due to the fact that their presence there is an absolute waste of time because they have no powers at all.

9506. I think you will admit that there has been an increasing number of municipalities brought under complete popular control, though the pace may not have been as quick as you would have liked to see it?—The fact was this. For some time after 1884 there was an increase. Then towards the middle of 1897 or thereabouts there was retrograde legislation, and there was no increase whatever. Then recently there has been an increase.

9507. Are you aware that I myself gave complete popular control to a very large number of municipalities in the Province of Bombay?—I am glad to hear that, but I was not aware of that.

9508. Now, in your Minute of Dissent, in paragraph 13, you say: "I would, therefore, propose that it should be open to a Minister to appoint, with the sanction of the Secretary of State, or request the Secretary of State to appoint, any person outside the Service for any post under him." Do you realise that that is a power which is not possessed by any Minister in this country?—I do not know anything about the state of things here. I cannot say.

9509. Would not the effect of that be to give enormous patronage to every Minister?—How can it, when it is subject to the control of the Governor and of the Secretary of State, and, besides, that is a state of things which it is open to an Indian member of the Executive Council to do now.

9510. You speak of the Governor. You do not mention the Governor here; it is only the Secretary of State?—Yes, because the Secretary of State is now the sanctioning authority, and therefore I mentioned only the Secretary of State, and there is no necessity for mentioning the Governor, because he always acts under the orders of the Secretary of State.

9511. How could the Secretary of State possibly say that any particular appointment in the quite subordinate secretariat was a suitable one or not?—It may not be in the subordinate secretariat, but when we speak of all these appointments we do not refer to the clerks, we refer to the higher appointments; for instance, in the case of the Minister, the chief appointment is that of the Secretary under him; just as in the case of a member of the Executive Council of the Viceroy; when I speak of the appointments, the appointments that I refer to are the appointments of the Secretary to the Government, and also of the advisers in the various Departments to the Government. I do not refer to any appointments below that.

9512. You do not mean what you say here, "any post." You only mean certain select and comparatively few posts?—Well, the other appointments are not made by the member, they are made by the Secretary; therefore I only refer to the appointments which are in fact to be made by the Minister. The other appointments are in fact made by the Secretary in the Department.

9513. Would you allow the Minister to bring in to these posts untrained people who had not gone through the mill which admits them to the public Service?—A man who becomes a Minister is supposed to be a man a man of some common sense, who knows the sort of men he would want to appoint to that post, and therefore he may be trusted to put forward persons who are competent to carry on the duties of that post, because he is responsible for the working of the Department. I would not assume that he would appoint a man who is not fit for it; I mean he would not nominate a man who is not fit for it.

9514. Might not the trained people who have got hold of these appointments feel rather aggrieved if the untrained friend or relation of the Minister were brought in over their heads?—I would not assume that he would bring in a man who is not fit for it, as I say, and I would only assume that he would nominate a man who is more fitted for that post than anybody otherwise in the Department who might be eligible. If you want examples, if you want the position to be explained by concrete instances, I can do so.

9515. You have said you did not know that this power is not exercised by Ministers in this country?—Yes.

9516. But you do know it is not exercised at present by members of the Executive Council in India?—I know it is exercised.

9517. In the Provincial Councils?—No, in the Imperial Council.

9518. Only in the Imperial Council?—That I do know, and I believe in the Provincial Councils, too.

9519. That is not my experience?—But that is a fact now; it is the fact at present.

9520. It is a new development, is it?—No, it is not; I can give you instances if you want.

9521. With your great knowledge of Madras and Southern India, are you in favour of giving communal representation which the non-Brahmins are demanding in such large numbers?—Yes, I am.

9522. You are?—Yes, I am in favour of giving communal representation.

9523. You know that Sir Rabindranath Tagore, the other day, also pronounced himself strongly in favour of communal representation?—I did not know that. At any rate, I am in favour of giving communal representation to non-Brahmins.

9524. You know the Brahmo-Samaj and its members wish as far as possible the abolition of class distinctions?—Yes

9525. Is it not rather remarkable that members of the Brahmo-Samaj should advocate communal representation, because we have been told that communal representation would increase the caste differences and perpetuate them?—I cannot say anything about that. My reason for giving communal representation to non-Brahmins in Madras is that a state of things has been brought about which compels us to give it. I recognise all the disadvantges and all the difficulties attending that, but now I would give communal representation to non-Brahmins simply because we cannot help it.

9526. May I take it you do not see in communal representation the crystallisation of caste systems throughout India?—Not in the form in which it is recommended by the Indian Government. But if you only reserve those seats as recommended by the Indian Government, I do not think the dangers are great. If you form communal electorates for the election of members of that community, then perhaps it might possibly crystallise class differences; but if you do not form communal electorates, but only reserve seats for them, say 30 seats out of 60, as recommended by the Government, then I do not think the danger is so very great.

Chairman.

9527. Of the two plans which have both been discussed at great length by witnesses before this Committee, which do you recommend, communal representation or reservation?—Only reservation.

Lord Sydenham.

9528. You know that since the British rule became established in India the population has rather more than doubled? Do you think that the doubling of the population is a sign that any country is going down the hill?—I have not formed any opinion upon that question.

Sir J. D. Rees.

9529. You have objected to the proposals of the Government of India on the ground, you say, that the justification for their proposals is the assumption made by them that those to whom powers would be transferred are an oligarchy who might use them to the detriment of the masses. You do not accept that, do you?—No, I do not.

9530. I am anxious not to go over anything which is expressed in your Minute. It is abundantly proved from what you have written that you regard Hindoos as people who love their country and their fellow-countrymen. Not in the least speaking with regard to the principal of communal representation, I want to ask you why in that case you wish to provide for special communal representation for one-tenth against nine-tenths of those patriotic and fellow-countrymen-loving population?—For one-tenth?

9531. I am taking the Brahmins as a small proportion?—Because the non-Brahmins now demand it, and their feelings are so excited that it would be safer to give it to them.

9532. It is not because of the feeling that it is absolutely necessary to protect them against the higher classes?—I must divide the non-Brahmins in Madras—I do not refer to the others—into two classes: That is, the non-Brahmin caste Hindoos and the non-Brahmin non-caste Hindoos—that is the pariahs and others. In the case of the non-Brahmin caste Hindoos I really do not think they do want any protection, though I would give them class representation. But in the case of the others the case is different. My own opinion is that when this matter comes to be inquired into ten years hence it is possible that the Brahmins of Madras may want protection against the non-Brahmins.

9533. Following that, may I ask you what classes do you place in the category of depressed; it is only the Malis and hill tribes, and so forth, or do you include the ordinary sudra, the cultivator, in the depressed classes?—I do not.

9534. Then you would not suggest that the land-holding classes ever could be amongst the depressed classes?—No.

9535. Taking the step you suggest, upon the explanation you have given, would not this communal representation amount to the exclusion of Brahmins rather than to the special representation of those who are a vast majority of the population? It would amount to the exclusion of Brahmins pro tanto?—It might in course of time.

9536. Would not it now?—I doubt whether it would now.

9537. But if you reserve 30 seats out of 60 for non-Brahmins, does not that mean providing for the exclusion of Brahmins rather than for the representation of the others?—From those 30 seats you exclude them.

9538. Seeing that is half of the whole of the general seats, would not that amount pro tanto to the exclusion of Brahmins?—To the extent of the 30 seats, yes.

9539. Would I rightly gather from your writings that you are in favour of founding the new democracy by placing the intelligentsia under any disabilities?—No; I would not.

9540. You say in your Minute the India Office with the Secretary of State as at present constituted does not favourably represent Parliament. Can you briefly explain that? I do not catch the meaning?—When I say that the Secretary of State does not represent Parliament, I mean that he accepts so often the views of the official classes in India that I do not think he represents the Parliamentary view here.

9541. You are speaking of the Secretary of State as an an institution, and not of any occupant?—I do not refer to any individual.

9542. You say he does not faithfully represent Parliament. Do you think he could maintain his position if he did not?—Not if Parliament knew what he is about.

9543. But do not you think Parliament keeps an eye on him? Parliament watches these great officers, do not you think?—They do not, and that is why we suggest a committee of the House of Commons and the House of Lords to keep an eye on him. At present they do not.

9544. Do you realise that Secretaries of State are very great officials, chosen for their particular eminence in Parliament?—Yes.

9545. And that while they are, of course, trusted by Parliament—otherwise they could not maintain their office—still they are watched by Parliament and by Members of Parliament who are interested in their particular portfolios?—Yes; they may be.

9546. But in spite of that you adhere to your opinion?—Certainly. You cannot imagine a person, for instance, who is more anxious to do certain things to advance Indian interests, but I know how helpless I was as the head of the Department, though I was watched by the Indian politicians; I can therefore imagine how helpless the Secretary of State is in many respects, though he might be very willing to do what is needful in Indian interests.

9547. You think it is a fairly analogous case then?—Whether it is analogous or not, it is an illustration and I think it shows how it works.

9548. My next question arises by accident out of what you have just said: You rather demur to the Secretaries of Departments under a Minister having access to the Governor, which might reduce to a figure-head the Minister. Are you aware that under the existing constitution in India Secretaries of Departments always have that power?—Yes, but the condition would be different. When I was a member of the Government of India my Secretary, if he differed from me on any question, might take the file to the Viceroy and explain it to him. He has got the advantage of explaining it to him first, which I have not. But if the Viceroy differs from me he cannot overrule me. He can only place it before the Council for the opinion of the other members. Under the new conditions it will be open to the Governor to overrule the Minister and practically therefore to make the Minister entirely subordinate to himself. He may accept the Secretary's view, and there is an end of the matter; whereas at present in the Viceroy's Executive Council the Viceroy has no power over me; he has to refer the question to the Council and the Council alone can overrule me.

9549. Upon the recommendations made by your late colleagues in the Government of India on the separate purse, am I right in supposing that you hold that the report scheme gives the Minister and the Legislative Council considerable influence even in the reserved subjects, while the Government of India would leave them no responsibility in the transferred subjects and no influence in the reserved subjects?—Yes, very little; I will not say no responsibility, because men may differ as to the meaning of it.

9550. I am not asking because I dispute it, but as a question of fact, have you reason to believe that that view of the modifications of the Government of India is held by most of those who, like yourself, are in a position to criticise these reforms and proposals made in connection with them? Do you believe that the view you have expressed is generally held among the Indian politically minded classes?—Yes.

9551. I want to ask you why you hold that responsibility in the Province connotes or demands responsibility in the Government of India?—Because it would be open otherwise to the Government of India to overrule a Minister and a local Government in matters arising out of the transferred Departments. I read in one of the papers—Mr. Feetham or somebody has explained the situation much better than I can put it—that it will be open to the Government of India, with reference to those matters arising out of the transferred Departments, to take them out of the control of the local Governments, on the ground, for instance, that uniformity requires that a certain particular line of conduct shall be followed. That is one explanation.

9552. You strongly object to the proposal that the Governor should have power to resume the portfolio of a transferred subject, and to give the power to the Secretary of State to re-transfer a subject. Have you reason to believe that those views also are generally held by educated Indians?—I believe so.

9553. In your second Minute of Dissent you say that the Government were actuated by the highest motives in regard to educational matters. Will you explain how the highest motives are compatible with a desire to reserve education not for the sake of education, but for political reasons, with a determination to confine higher education to affluent boys, and to withdraw boys to vernacular schools from English schools for political purposes. I want to ask you in a word how you reconcile those charges against the authorities with the attribution to them of the highest motives?—Well, I do not wish to argue the point with you. If you think it is not compatible you may drop it.

9554. I would like to ask you a question further upon what Lord Sydenham asked—the decline in industries which you alleged has taken place in India. Without going into elaborate detail, can you give us any specific example of any decline in any industry? You have suggested a general decline, of course?—The decline of the muslin trade all over Bengal, the decline of industry in the south, calicos, named from my town of Calicut.

9555. You think the evidence we have had submitted here during the last few weeks, some of which went to show there had been a real advance in India, is not correct?—An advance in what respect?

9556. Commercial and industrial?—There is an advance in certain directions, of course—nobody denies that.

9557. But, speaking generally, you are of opinion that there has been a decline?—Yes.

9558. And that that decline is due to the inaction of the Government of India?—I am satisfied that that is the evidence.

9559. Do you think that this Bill, in its present form, if it becomes law, will improve things very materially?—Certainly.

9560. In these respects?—Yes, I think so; but the Bill leaves so much to rules and regulations, that until those rules and regulations are formulated it is difficult to say exactly what its results would be, but there is in it the potentiality of a great deal of good 9561. You believe, then, that if the rules are framed along fairly liberal lines the tendency will be to stabilise commerce and also, I take it, the industrial workers' conditions will be improved?—Yes, generally.

Chairman.

9562. I want to make it quite clear. I do not want to misunderstand you. Is your criticism of the attitude of the Government of India towards industry based on the fact that it has never given anything in the nature of what is called protection?—No.

9563. It is not based on that?—No.

Mr. Spoor.

9564. In your Minute of Dissent, in those words which have been quoted by Sir John Rees, that the India Office and the Secretary of State, as at present constituted, do not faithfully represent Parliament, I take it that you consider that Parliament is largely indifferent to Indian affairs?—Quite, that is why I said that. If you will allow me, may I explain it? Parliament has declared that there shall be no distinction between, say, an Englishman and an Indian or anybody so far as any appointments in India are concerned. The Secretary of State has not carried it out. I believe myself if Parliament were fully aware of the extent to which the Secretary of State has failed to comply with its intentions with the rules as laid down by them that Parliament would have interfered. But Parliament does not know the extent to which he has failed to carry out its intentions, and I say, therefore, the Secretary of State does not represent Parliament—he does not comply with the intentions of Parliament.

9565. And you believe that if this Select Committee of both Houses is established it will largely overcome that difficulty—it will give the necessary Parliamentary control?—I will not say control, but I believe the Secretary of State will not fail to the same extent as he has done hitherto.

9566. Further on in your Minute you express the view that the report has minimised very much the intensity and volume of that political consciousness that has been quickened in India during recent years. Now I daresay you are aware that we have had a great conflict of evidence here on this matter. It has been suggested by some witnesses that there has been a most extraordinary awakening in India. It has been suggested by others that as a matter of fact the masses of the Indian people are altogether indifferent, that the agitation, that the interest, has been very largely confined to a comparatively small section of the community. I take it that your view is that there has been a general awakening?—Oh, quite.

9567 Even amongst the illiterate classes right through the country?—Yes. You have only to go through the country and see the reception given to the Home Rulers as they pass through the country, and the reception given to officials when they pass through the same districts; you could easily come to your own conclusions. You can go further and compare the feeling in favour of the so-called Moderates and the feeling in favour of the so-called Home Rulers. That also will explain to you the feeling of the country.

9568. You believe that the great mass of people are anxious to take part in political progress?—That I cannot say, but a great part of the people rely upon the political leaders in the country. That statement of mine is an answer to the statement in the report of the Secretary of State and of the Viceroy, which, I believe, is incorrect, that hitherto the masses have been looking to the District Officer for their guidance and for everything that they need, and that the attempt which is now being made to make them look to the ordinary political leaders in the country might even be attended with danger. I think it is an extract from a report of some other official. My minute is really intended as an answer to that.

9569. If the movement is of that extent in India that you suggest, I take it that we want to secure the widest possible electorate. Could you make any suggestion by which it would be possible to widen the electorate beyond the proposals which are already before the Committee?—I think the electorate should be widened. I have not gone so fully into that because I took it that after a Commission has reported upon the matter it will be very difficult to raise the whole question over again, and it would not be advisable to do so. But I felt all along that the electorate in Madras and the electorate in the Punjab in particular ought to be widened. If you will allow me to draw attention to the state of the Punjab, I think the Punjab Legislative Council should have more members than have been given to them in the Bill. I draw attention to it in my Memorandum. In the first schedule the Punjab has only got 83 members; 18 members to be elected by the general electorate. I have suggested an addition of at least 28 more to make it 111. The general electorate is much too small there.

9570. Speaking generally I gather that while you approve the proposals so far as the Provincial Governments are concerned, you are of opinion that there should be a measure of responsibility in the Central Government from the very beginning?—Yes. I do not approve of the proposals so far as the Provincial Government is concerned in regard to Grand Committees.

9571. No; but speaking generally you do?—Yes.

9572. But what you want is a larger measure of responsibility in the Central Government from the very start?—Yes.

9573. I see you suggest with regard to the Viceroy's Executive Council that there should be three non-official Indians on that Council?—Mine is an alternative proposal with reference to that. I would like a Minister in the Central Council to be in charge of certain subjects. If the Committee are not willing to recommend a Minister, then I would have three members. If you are going to allow a Minister, then I would not claim three members.

9574. What you want to do is to increase the power of the Legislative Assembly very considerably. Do you consider that the terms of the pronouncement are in any real degree met unless responsibility is given in the Central Government?—It ought to be given in the Central Government.

9575. But if it is not given?—Then the pronouncement is not met. Not only that, but if the responsibility is not given, that scheme, so far as the Central Government is concerned, is open to all the objections which have been advanced against what is called the Congress-League Scheme.

9576. And you believe that unless responsibility is given in the Central Government we will have continued agitation, and probably continued trouble?—Yes, it would be so. I may state at once that my main reason for the addition of one more member is not only those theoretical considerations which you have advanced, but its absolute necessity for improving the administration of the country, because there are troubles ahead arising out of labour conditions in India in which the Government are directly concerned as perhaps the largest employers of labour, taking the railways as part of the Government; and you have this fact now which you have to face, that the whole Indian commercial community has gone over practically to Home Rule now. The feeling is not due to any sentiment, but, as stated, there it is due to certain grievances under which, at any rate, in their opinion, they suffer. And you have also this third circumstance that all through India there is a feeling that the Executive Government, as now constituted, must not be given a free hand in dealing with all questions of peace and order, a feeling which has been very much intensified on account of the recent Punjab disturbances. And in future you will have to impose heavy taxation on the country. It is essential, therefore, leaving aside the Legislative Council for the moment, that in the Cabinet, the Council of the Viceroy, there should be a strong Indian element. Unfortunately, the policy which has been followed of appointing sectional representatives there—that is, appointing men as Hindoo representatives and as Mohammedan representatives—has led to this result, that the best men have not always been appointed, because where the best man is a Mohammedan, for instance, it may be that they had to appoint a Hindoo; similarly, when the best man is a Hindoo, they had to appoint a Mohammedan. Taking those considerations together, I think three is the minimum. You must have at least three Indians in the Executive Council. I will not say even then that it will be adequate, but it would be a fair Indian representation. It is also essential, of course, that they should be in a position to place their views before the Secretary of State always when they differ from the Government of India. At present they have got no such opportunity, except in certain cases.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

9577. I wanted to ask you a question with regard to the position of the Secretary of State. You rather suggest that Secretaries of State as a body are not acting entirely in accord with the way that Parliament would act. Have you in your mind any particular case in which Parliament has thought of one thing and the Secretary of State has done another?—Many.

9578. What are they?—I should not like to mention them, but I think that the Secretary of State has in various instances yielded to the opinion of the Government of India in many respects in which he would not have yielded, if he had acted solely in Indian interests. Very often he has felt himself compelled to defer to the wishes of the Government of India—felt himself unable to overrule them.

9579. Taking the debates of Parliament, or the pressure of Parliament, have you in your mind any particular ticular cases where Parliament has pressed the Secretary of State in one direction and he has gone in another?—That I cannot say. Parliament has said there should be no distinction as between Indians and Englishmen to any post in India. When the Government of India said: "In this case you must appoint so and so, and you cannot appoint an Indian to the post, you have to appoint an Englishman," we have often felt in India that the Secretary of State has yielded to the importunity, or, rather, to the pressure from the Government of India, when he would not have yielded but for that pressure.

9580. Is it not possible that in India people are misled by the strong opinions expressed by certain extreme Members of Parliament, who take an interest in Indian affairs, and have mistaken their views for the views of the general mass of the House of Commons?—I cannot say that when I find the resolutions of the House of Commons not carried out. Take for instance the resolution of the House of Commons in 1832, that there shall be no such difference.

9581. Holding the view you do, you would welcome the institution of a Joint Committee of the two Houses to consider Indian questions?—Decidedly.

9582. And for their greater information?—Yes; and I would like the Secretary of State to take the opinion of that Joint Committee on all questions in which there is a difference of opinion between the Executive Government and the local Assemblies in India.

9583. All questions of difference?—All questions in which there is a difference of opinion between the Legislative Council and the Executive Government in India.

9584. You are taking rather a broader view than has been suggested yet, are you not?—It may be so.

9585. You are anxious that the Houses of Parliament here should sit to decide administrative differences?—No; what I say is this: Supposing there is any question on which a Legislative-Council and the Executive Government in India differ, then that question should be decided by the Secretary of State only after the Joint Committee have expressed their opinion. The result of that then would be that if the Secretary of State has come to a conclusion repugnant it may be to the opinion of the Joint Committee, or has come to a certain conclusion which certain members of the Joint Committee feel is so perfectly indefensible that it should be challenged in the House of Commons, it would be open to any member to raise that question in the House of Commons. All this would be a great check upon the Secretary of State and upon the Executive Governments in India.

9586. There is a time-honoured custom that the Secretary of State, or any member of the Government, is responsible to give an answer and to convince the House of Parliament to which he belongs on any subject on which he is challenged. That is obvious. But you would not go so far as to suggest that on subjects on which differences arise in India, the Secretary of State, without being challenged, should have to refer to anybody in Parliament before making his decision?—No; I say in all such questions the Secretary of State should only act after receiving the opinion of the Joint Committee.

9587. I wanted to ask you one question with regard to the franchise. I think you realise that the great difficulty will be to interest a larger number of the electorate in public affairs in India in the first instance?—That is what I am always told.

9588. It is not very easy in other countries to get the masses of the electorate to consider individual political opinions?—That is so.

9589. That must be of slow growth in India, I suppose?—That is not the view I take. May I explain it? There are many questions now in India which are awaiting solution in which the masses are very much interested.

9590. But, speaking generally, of the whole of the electorate it is proposed to create, do you expect there will be any close touch between them and their representatives?—Yes, I do, certainly.

9591. Are you speaking of particular Provinces or individual Provinces?—I mean all Provinces. May I instance it? Take any one question now, either land revenue or irrigation or the separation of judicial and executive functions—all those are questions in which the masses are interested, and I have not the slightest doubt myself that when these Councils are constituted and these representatives go to the masses with their programme for the Legislative Council the masses would be able to form an intelligent opinion on those questions. There are many questions on which they will not be able to form an intelligent opinion, but there are many other questions on which they would be quite competent to form an opinion.

9592. Having in view the great diversity of races and religions and languages which may be found, and will be found, even in similar constituencies, do you think that the touch between the member and his constituents will be as great under an electorate such as is to be formed under Lord Southborough's Committee's report, or would the touch between the member and his constituents be greater in the case of a communal electorate?—The term "communal electorate" is used in such a way that it is very difficult to give a clear answer to that question. If you will allow me, I would explain the difficulty. Taking the case of non-Brahmins in the Madras Presidency, who are the foremost in claiming that sort of representation, they are divided into so many castes and classes among themselves that there would only be the same touch between them and their representatives as there would be amongst the territorial electorates if they are not very large.

9593. That is your view?—Yes.

Chairman.

9594. But I suppose that would not apply to a Mohammedan electorate?—No, it will not; there would be greater touch between the Mohammedan representative and the Mohammedan electorate than there would be apparently between a Hindoo electoratee and a Hindoo representative.

Mr. Montagu.

9595. Do you deal in any part of your Minute of Dissent or answers to questions with the subject of who is to preside over the meetings of the Legislative Council or the Legislative Assembly?—I do not know whether it is in my Minute of Dissent, but it is in one of the despatches which was forwarded to the Secretary of State. I say it should not be the Governor or the Viceroy.

9596. Whom would you suggest? Would you suggest an elected Speaker?—I would suggest an elected Speaker.

9597. At once?—Yes, or, failing that, a non-official, to be appointed by the Governor or the Viceroy.

9598. Supposing this Committee were to decide that some means should be found for securing the representation of non-Brahmins in Madras, do you believe from your knowledge of the Madras Presidency that the Brahmins and the non-Brahmins could arrive at a concordat between themselves like the Lucknow Compact between Hindoos and Mohammedans?—It is possible. I would suggest referring the question to the Madras Government to take their opinion to settle it.

9599. When you were Member in Charge of Education you also looked after sanitation?—Yes.

9600. You were responsible for the steps taken, so far as they were Government of India steps, for sanitation?—Yes.

9601. Will you tell the Committee whether it was a subject in which Indians were much interested?—Oh, very much indeed. In fact, I have not been able to carry out all their wishes. Representations were made to me wherever I went about questions relating to sanitary conditions.

9602. We have received evidence that if sanitation were a transferred subject there would not be so much energy; there would not be so great an impetus for improvements as there is under present conditions; I wanted your opinion as the member responsible for sanitation whether that is so or not?—It is absolutely incorrect. The fact is that in the case of municipalities and District Boards hitherto they were under the control of revenue officials, and they always paid their chief attention to Communications, and funds were devoted to sanitation and education only after the funds available were devoted to the improvement of Communications.

9603. Have you read the accounts of the work which is being done in Bengal by Lord Ronaldshay's Government with regard to malaria?—Yes. The fact is, we initiated it; it was the Government of India in my Department that gave the first impetus to it.

9604. Am I right in thinking that that has been received with great popular enthusiasm?—I would rather put it the other way: It was forced on the Government by popular feeling.

9605. One word with regard to the separate purse, on which we have spent some considerable time in this Committee. I gather from your Minute of Dissent that you are opposed to that recommendation?—For a separate purse, yes.

9606. May I ask whether you make any distinction at all between the form of separate purse recommended by your colleagues in the Government of India and other forms of separate purse? If I may explain what I mean, the separate purse as recommended by the Government of India was accompanied by a proposal, I think, that neither the transferred nor the reserved part of the Budget was to be voted by the Legislative Council. It would be quite possible to have a separate purse in which both halves of the Budget would be voted by the Legislative Council. Would that sort of difference make any difference to your view?—When you say voted by the Legislative Council, may I understand that it means that it would be open to the Legislative Council to transfer items from the reserved Budget to the transferred Budget, and vice versa, or does it simply mean that they do not accept the proposals with reference to the reserved Budget and the transferred Budget?

9607. That they do not accept the proposals?—That would not make any difference.

9608. It would not make any difference?—No.

9609. They would have much the same powers as Members of Parliament have here?—I do not wish to say anything about the powers here; I do not know that subject.

9610. But that would make no difference?—No.

9611. Now let me take another case. The separate purse which the Government of India recommended allocated particular heads of revenue to the two sides of the Government. There is another form of separate purse in which each side of the Government would have a percentage of the total revenues of the Province?—I am not aware that they allocated; I only know that their proposal was to allocate.

9612. I am glad you corrected me, but it does not make any difference to my question. You have expressed your opposition to a scheme of a separate purse which proposes to allocate separate sources of revenue?—Yes.

9613. There is another form of separate purse which proposes to give each side of the Government a percentage of the total revenue for a fixed period: Would that make any difference?—No, it would make no difference. We considered that in coming to that conclusion, and that would make no difference.

9614. Are you aware that the separate purse was considered in the discussions before the Joint Report was issued?—Yes.

9615. You took part in those discussions?—Yes, I did.

9616. You were a party to the general features of the recommendations of the Joint Report?—Yes.

9617. There is only one other question that I want to ask you. In reference to your answers to questions Numbers 9 and 10 you say: "The Budget as a whole should be placed before the Legislative Council for its assent, and not the proposals for the appropriation only"?—Yes. I am not sure whether I rightly understood your question, and therefore I safeguarded myself by those general terms.

9618. A Budget in India contains proposals for taxation?—Yes.

9619. For the raising of non-tax revenue?—Yes.

9620. And for appropriation?—Yes.

9621. All three?—Yes.

9622. As a matter of fact, in a Provincial Council there is very rarely any taxation, is there? Do Provincial Governments in your experience tax much under existing circumstances?—You exclude land revenue?

9623. Yes; that is what I called non-taxed revenue for the moment. I do not want to argue about it, but that is done by Executive action?—Yes.

9624. Do they ever bring in a Bill imposing a tax?—I do not remember; I cannot say whether they do or not. I do not wish to give any definite reply.

9625. Supposing all new taxes in the Legislative Assembly and Council were introduced in the form of Bills, the only parts remaining in the Budget would be the appropriation and the non-tax revenue, would they not?—Yes.

9626. Do you think that increments in land revenue can appropriately be voted by the Legislative Council?—In my opinion there should be no increment in land revenue without the sanction of the Legislative Council.

9627. That is what I mean. Do I understand by that recommendation from you that each time a new settlement for a particular district is made that individual settlement shall be voted by the Legislative Councils?—Yes.

9628. The other proposal that one has heard is that the instructions which the Executive officers are to obey in making a settlement should be settled by the Legislature, but you want the actual settlement?—Yes. In the Madras Presidency the settlement is usually by districts or parts of districts, and that settlement must be voted upon by the Legislature.

9629. Would you then have your land resettlements incorporated in the form of a Bill or just do it by resolution?—A Bill would be better, but on that point I have not considered the distinction between the two, and so I do not wish to be committed to anything.

9630. All you want is to secure some instrument?—All I want is to secure that the settlement should be carried out in accordance with the wishes of the Legislature.

9631. What you desire is that no new tax or burden of any sort should be put upon a Province without the consent of the Legislative Council?—That is it.

9632. Have you considered in detail the form of this Bill? You said quite rightly that so much is left to rules. Could you suggest any way of obviating that?—Yes; I considered it in detail as a member of the Government of India when it was sent down to us.

9633. Would you suggest any method of obviating such frequent recourse to rules as the Bill proposes?—Do you want my opinion with reference to any particular question, or generally?

9634. Could you mention something of importance which you would suggest should be incorporated in the Bill rather than left to rules?—Yes. I would draw your attention particularly to section 6 (1) (a). That is "Rules under the principal Act may provide for increasing by not more than 5 per cent. the aggregate number of members of any Council." May I draw your attention to the first schedule as it is printed on page 21.? There is a printer's mistake there. The Committee perhaps have noticed it. In the case of Assam, "Communal Electorates 2," I think it ought to be "12" there. That makes a good deal of difference. So far as general electorates are concerned, I do not think it should be in the power of the Government of India or of the Secretary of State to reduce it in any way, because as it now stands the Section allows rules to be framed by which the representations by the general electorate might be reduced. The general policy which we are now following, I understand, is to discourage communal representation as much as possible. As it now stands, the section would enable the Government of India, with the sanction of the Secretary of State, to reduce that list of members to be elected by the general electorate and make them, if the Government of India are so inclined, all communal electorates. I do not think that should be allowed at all, because a general electorate should hold the first place in the system of election.

Lord Sinha.

9635. With regard to the question of the separate purse about which Mr. Montagu asked you, you remember that in your own Minute of Dissent of the 5th March, page 69, you suggested that the revenues should be apportioned by the Executive Government as a whole between transferred and reserved subjects. That means the revenue should be allotted between those two, divided between those two, by the Executive tive Government? There must be a division of revenue between the two departments in any case?—Yes.

9636. There has been such an amount of confusion on the question as to what is meant by a separate purse and a joint purse that I am obliged to put this to you. That might be called a separate purse system?—Yes.

9637. But you do not object to that?—No; of course there must be division.

9638. And that division has nothing whatsoever to do with the division of sources of revenue which you object to in your Minute?—No; and it has nothing to do with the question of separate purse or joint purse either.

9639. But the allotment, the division, must take place, each side having a purse of its own after the division is made?—Yes.

9640. You do not object to that?—No; after the division of the joint funds, from whichever source they come.

9641. You do not object to that?—No.

9642. That is necessary?—Yes.

9643. And as long as the sources of revenue are not divided in the way the Government of India propose you do not object?—No; that is what I meant.

9644. Your suggestion is that if the two sides of the Government differ the Governor should decide ordinarily?—Yes.

9645. If instead of the Governor deciding, which, of course, is rather an odious thing for the Governor to do, an independent body is substituted for the Governor, you would have no objection to that?—If it is independent.

9646. Quite?—The whole thing depends upon that.

9647. Upon the independence of the body and its impartiality?—Yes.

9648 If you can secure that you would rather have the duty of decision, when there is a difference put upon an independent body?—I have no objection to that.

9649. And if that is the separate purse system that this Committee agrees to, you would agree to it yourself?—I would not object to it.

Chairman.

9650. What would you consider an independent authority?—That is to say, a body not in any way looking for inspiration to the Governor or to the Executive Council.

9651. Would you consider, for instance, a distinguished official of the Treasury here an independent authority?—Yes; in that respect. That is why I said in all these cases I should have no objection, for instance, to the Joint Committee deciding it. A Joint Committee may not be a proper body for this purpose, but that is the principle I was going on.

Lord Sinha.

9652. You have seen, have you not, the list of Central and Provincial subjects proposed by the Functions Committee?—Yes.

9653. As revised by the informal Reforms Committee of the India Office, you have seen that, have you not?—Not as revised by the Committee of the India Office.

9654. With the Chairman's permission, I propose to give you that list. (The same was handed to the Witness.) I want to ask you this: Supposing there is to be a division of subjects in the Central Government, which of those do you consider can be transferred? It is very much the same as Mr. Feetham's list?—I should hesitate to give an opinion off-hand on a question like this, but I consider that all the subjects in my department, amounting to seventeen or eighteen may certainly be placed under a Minister.

9655. Those are now going to be transferred subjects in the Provinces?—Many of them; most of them, perhaps.

9656. Therefore there will be very little control, if any, by the Government of India?—Yes.

9657. Therefore, they will hardly be sufficient for transfer to a Minister in the Central body. We have to do all that in the Provinces ourselves?—I should not like to state my opinion off-hand now.

Mr. Bennett.

9658. You attach a great deal of importance to the place of the village organisation in establishing your theory that self-government exists at the basis of Indian society. I think that is your argument, and you attach great importance to it?—Yes.

9659. Accepting all that you say as to the vitality and the universality of the village organisation in India, would you say what area the village authority controlled and what was the outlook of the village self-governing authority?—I can answer the second part of the question as to the outlook, but I cannot answer as to the extent of the boundary of the village over which they exercised their control.

9660. Is there any evidence that the village organisations formed a part of groups, first of district groups, and then of Provinces?—There is evidence that they did form part of the groups, but I cannot give any opinion on it whether they were groups within the last 100 years or not. That question I could give no opinion upon.

9661. Were the groups as definite and as distinct as the present Taluka?—That I cannot say. I cannot give a general answer, but what is said in the books is this, that ten villages formed, for instance, a group; 100 villages would form another group.

9662. And they were administrative organisations?—They were administrative organisations. There is evidence of that in the books. There is evidence of the working of the village system in another form, evidence as it existed when the British Government took possession of the districts in Southern India. We had villages, and over the villages a group of villages which had a certain distinctive term in the vernaculars and certain classes of offences, for instance, were always sent up and disposed of by the head of that larger group. That is what is said in the books and in the reports of the British officials.

9663. Did we find that in existence when we went there?—Yes.

9664. In the dominions of the Peshwas was there any other exercise of authority by the central power than in the collection of revenue?—I cannot say; I am not able to give any information about that.

9665. You know of no other exercise of authority but that?—I should say from general considerations that there was no other exercise.

9666. In the matter of famine I think you dispute the suggestion that Lord Sydenham made that the people of India are to-day better equipped for meeting famine than they were a generation ago. You dispute that?—Yes. I will not put it a generation; I will put it further back than that.

9667. Do you contend that there has been no improvement under British administration in the capacity of the people to confront famine?—There has been an improvement in certain classes of people, but, taking the country as a whole, I do not think so.

9668. You, as a member of the Government of India for some years, will be able to say whether or not it was the contention of the Government of India—a contention which they were prepared to substantiate—that the people of India were better suited, were better equipped, for meeting famine than they were in the old days?—I am not aware that they ever said that.

9669. You are not aware that that was the official view?—No. I am aware that they have always said there is no evidence the other way, that there is no evidence that they are not as well equipped as before; but I am not aware that the people are much better off in that respect.

9670. Has it not been said in regard to the recent famine, which was a serious one so far as shortage was concerned, that it affected the people less than any famine in recent memory?—It is difficult to say that in the face of six million deaths on account of influenza.

9671. I am not speaking of influenza; I am speaking of famine?—Yes, but it refers to that.

9672. I am speaking of famine; I do not want to go into that very wide field. With regard to the action of the Government of India in regard to Indian industries, is there any staple industry in England, for instance, for which the Government have done more than they have done for corresponding staple industries in India?—I cannot say anything about that.

9673. You do not know?—No, I do not know anything about that, and I cannot say anything.

9674. The Secretary of State put a question to you as to the election of a Speaker by the Legislative Council. Do you attach much importance to that?—I certainly do.

9675. And failing getting a member of the Legislative Council, who by experience and training and other qualifications would be suited for the post, would you object to going outside the Council in order to get the kind of man who would be necessary?—I would prefer a man in the Council, first of all an elected man; if the Committee did not like a man elected by the Council itself, then a non-official member, and, failing that, a nominated member.

9676. You said that the non-Brahmin question should be referred to the Madras Government. Can you explain why I, and I suppose other members of the Committee, have had what must almost be called shoals of resolutions from various non-Brahmin and low-caste bodies in Southern India protesting specifically against the reference of this question to the Madras Government? I ask you to clear up a curious incompatibility. Can you explain that?—It is not that I object to this Committee deciding the question, but I thought, as the Franchise Committee did not take evidence on that point, it might be safer to refer it to them to take evidence on this and settle the question after laying down the broad general principles. But if the Committee consider the materials before them are sufficient, then I do not object. So far as I am concerned, I would raise no objection if the materials are available.

9677. You said that individual revenue settlements should be passed by the Legislative Council?—I did not say "individual" revenue settlements. I said each revenue settlement.

9678. That settlement would include a special area?—Yes.

9679. A group of villages?—Yes.

9680. Had you thought that out before you expressed that opinion? You have, I think, no personal experience of revenue problems?—I have been thinking about it from 1884, when the question was first raised about a settlement in my district. We never had a real revenue settlement before that. The question was raised at that time, and I have been considering the settlement from that time up to the time I became a Judge in the High Court.

9681. Have you, even after all those years of consideration, been able to satisfy yourself that the Legislative Assembly is a body capable of dealing with questions of detail, of scientific data, with individual claims? Even after all those years of reflection and study have you come to that conclusion?—That is why I objected to the term "individual" settlement. The question is not one of individual settlement, but the question is one of the settlement of a district or a portion of a district.

9682. I think we agree upon that point. I quite know what you mean?—Then the question will not arise whether any particular individual would pay a certain amount of revenue or not; questions will only arise whether certain classes of people either with reference to the nature of the land they hold, or on account of other considerations, should pay an increased revenue, or whether their payment should be decreased.

9683. You have the same in Madras as in Bombay, and in Bombay the settlement as such does not deal with individual holdings, but with groups of holdings?—Yes.

9684. We have the same thing in view. You still hold that the Legislative Assembly is a fit body——?—To decide the class of questions which I have in view.

9685. Not principles?—Yes—principles.

9686. But the principles have already been laid down?—No. In no settlement, so far as I know, will you ever find the question discussed whether that district as a whole can afford to pay an increased revenue or not. For instance, take the population in a district; consider what is required for them to live upon, then whether that district as a whole can pay anything more than what they already pay, or whether, considering what is required for them to live upon, the revenue should be decreased or not; that is a question which, so far as I am aware, is not considered in the proposal of any settlement. All they consider is whether any holders of land can afford to pay a higher revenue or not.

Mr. Bennett—continued.

9687. You spoke of the Home Rule propaganda in the villages of India: would you tell the Committee from your knowledge how that propaganda is being carried on?—It is carried on by the vernacular newspapers; it is carried on by speakers on public platforms.

9688. How far has it gone down? I am simply asking for information. How far has it gone down into the community?—It has gone into the community within the last three years.

9689. It is not an urban opinion which is being developed?—No, certainly not. You might have said so some years ago, but certainly during the last three years the change has been something marvellous.

9690. How far do newspapers go into the community?—I do not speak now of the whole of India, but in many districts two or three of the villages form a group to subscribe to vernacular newspapers, and those vernacular newspapers are distributed amongst the members of those villages, both men and women, and they exercise tremendous influence.

Lord Islington.

9691. The Home Rule propaganda is pretty widespread, then?—Yes, very.

9692. And deep-seated?—Yes.

9693. These papers, I suppose, are taken to the villages, and are then read to those who cannot read?—Yes. A library is formed for a certain group of villages, and the papers are distributed in many cases; in many villages there is a particular place where a man who subscribes for a paper reads it and explains it to all those who come there to hear it. I do not speak with reference to the whole of India; but I have found that in many districts.

9694. Just one word as regards finance, which you were dealing with with Mr. Bennett just now, and Lord Sinha was asking you questions also. You say you want the Budget, as a whole, voted by the Legislative Council?—Yes.

9695. What power would you give to the Governor to control, if he so desires it, the decision of the Legislative Council in that respect?—The Governor could have power to restore it in the interest of the subjects of which he is in charge—the reserved subjects.

9696. And as recommended in the Report?—Yes.

Lord Islington.

9697. I gather you followed and agreed with the scheme as put forward by Lord Sinha of a joint purse with subsidiary allocations respectively to reserved and transferred subjects?—Yes.

9698. And then you went on to say, I think, that you would prefer to see an independent authority introduced?—Yes. I accept the suggestion.

9699. Where more money was required which would involve either a transference from one branch to the other or taxation to meet that additional expenditure you would like to see an independent authority brought in to report to the Government?—I do not mean that, and I did not understand the question in that way.

9700. That is why I put the question. I want to know exactly what the independent authority is to do?—What I meant was, in the place of the Governor, as put in the Report, substitute an independent authority. Whatever functions the Governor has now to perform, according to the original Report of the Secretary of State and the Viceroy, let those functions be performed by the independent authority.

9701. With regard to the Budget and its allocation?—With regard to the Budget and its allocation.

9702. I want to go a little further on that, because this is one of the most vital questions, as you will agree?—Yes; according to me the most important of them all.

9703. What

9703. What would be the duties of this independent authority? I take it, first of all, to put a hypothetical case, it would be a case where the Governor finds he wants more revenue for a reserved subject?—You have to go further back than that.

9704. I will put the question in another way. You would like to see allocation made over a period of years?—No.

9705. You do not wish to see that?—No.

9706. Allocation from the pooled Budget—so much for reserved subjects and so much for transferred?—No; not over a series of years.

9707. You do not want to see allocation over a period of years?—No.

9708. You want to see it carried out annually?—Yes.

9709. Then my question, I think, does obtain. I have put this to you. The Governor finds that for some reserved subject he has not enough revenue under the allocation, and he has got to find it in one of three ways: He has either got to find it by a readjustment—at least, I put this to you—as between his own reserved subjects or else a readjustment as between the allocation to reserved and transferred services, or else by the imposition of taxation?—Yes.

9710. Those are the three methods by which he can arrive at the additional revenue for his reserved subject, are they not?—Yes.

9711. Am I right in gathering from your reply just now that you suggest that the decision as to which of those methods should be carried out should rest with an independent authority?—I did not suggest it, but I accept the suggestion made by Lord Sinha that, whether there should be such allocation or not, and whether more money should be devoted to the reserved subjects or not, and in what form that money should be raised, may be left to an independent tribunal.

9712. I am trying to get it into a more definite form, to see how it will work out, and I am suggesting there are only three ways in which the Governor can get his additional revenue—the three ways which I have described?—Yes; I take it from you.

9713. There may be others, but those are the three which occur to me?—I take that from you.

9714. Would that be a subject that you would refer to an independent authority?—Yes; I say I have no objection to it.

9715. You would prefer an independent authority undertaking that work as against its being left to the discretion of the Governor?—That I am not prepared to say. I accept that suggestion, but I am not prepared now to express a preference for the one over the other.

9716. You are not prepared to give an opinion upon that point?—I have not considered it.

9717. You would not say it should be merely a financial expert's business?—No; certainly not. It is not a financial expert's business.

9718. There is an important policy involved?—The financial experts business will come first, as I understand it; that is to say, the Executive Council would say: "We want so much money now, because we have to carry out such and such improvements with regard to the service, or with regard to other objects we have in view." Then the Finance Department or the financial authority, may say: "No; that money will not be sufficient, but you will want so much more money." Or they may say: "You do not want so much money; it is enough if you get so much less." The Minister in charge of the transferred Department will similarly say: "I want so much money in order to carry out the work of my Department." The Finance Department will say: "In order to carry out the object you have in view you do not want so much money; it is quite enough to have so much"; or they might say: "You want more money," and they might make alterations. The Finance Department will then settle what is the amount that is required if the objects of the Executive Council and the Minister are to be carried out. Then the members of the Executive Council and the Ministers will put their heads together and see whether they can make such modifications as to bring it within the amount that can be allowed. If they cannot make that modification, or if they cannot agree to the allocation of it, they will go to the Governor, and I say the Governor's order is the final order. That I understand to be the scheme. Now, I accept Lord Sinha's suggestion—at any rate, I do not oppose the suggestion—that, instead of the Governor, you may substitute an independent authority, in order to settle these questions. That order will have, finally, to be carried either by the Executive Council or by the Minister, as the case may be.

9719. Whilst you are not prepared to dissent from that proposal, I suppose you would admit that quite serious difficulties would be presented to an independent authority from England coming out to adjudicate on a matter like that?—That may be. As I said, I have not fully considered that matter; only at the first blush it struck me as not being objectionable.

9720. Would you not say, on the face of it, it is a matter not merely of finance, but of policy, and therefore one which should be dealt with by the Government on the spot?—It may be so. I do not wish to give a decided opinion upon it.

9721. There is one question, with regard to the Parliamentary Committee. I quite appreciate the reason why you want to see established a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament, but I want to gather exactly what the position of that Committee is to be. I think you said, in answer to a question put to you by Mr. Montagu, that the Secretary of State was not to give a confirming or a dissenting decision on a subject from India until he had been given advice by this Committee?—On questions on which there is a difference of opinion between the Legislative Council and the Executive Department; otherwise, I think the Secretary of State should not interfere at all.

9722. In other words, your proposal is that a body of gentlemen from both Houses of Parliament is, practically, to be incorporated into the India Office as advisers to the Secretary of State?—It may be looked upon in that way.

9723. It is another Advisory Committee to the Secretary of State, only in this case it is composed of Members of Parliament?—Yes.

9724. Of course, that advice would not be of any use either to the Secretary of State or anyone else, unless they were furnished with the whole detailed information with regard to the question under consideration?—Yes.

9725. When you advised this had you thought that out, that this Committee should be practically an integral part of the Indian Government at home here?—That was what was intended. So far as the information is concerned all the information, the popular side—would want to be placed before the joint Committee would be furnished by the debates in the Legislative Council. It would also be open to them to supplement such representation as they wished to be placed before the joint Committee. So far as the other side is concerned, the Secretary of State would place before that Committee such information as he might think fit to place before them.

9726. Would that be a constantly sitting Committee, or called together on occasions?—When there are differences of opinion in India, which I do not think are likely to be very great if it is known that there is a joint Committee to arbitrate between them.

9727. Would you confine the functions of that Committee to what you have just described, merely to have the whole material for their decision on subjects which have undergone the process of discussion in the Legislative Council?—Yes, only in cases of differences of opinion between them, because my opinion is that the Secretary of State should never interfere—the Home Government should not interfere when the Executive Government and the Legislative Council agree in India.

9729. Do you suggest that this Committee, as you have described it, should sit in addition to the Secretary tary of State s Council?—Frankly, I do not attach any importance to the Secretary of State's Council.

9730. Then would you suggest that this should be in substitution for the Secretary of State's Council?—I do not say that because I do not know what the constitution of the Secretary of State's Council is going to be; therefore, I do not wish to say anything about it. But as that is a body that works in secret and is not a popular assembly or representative of a popular assembly, I prefer to rely on the Committee of the Houses of Parliament rather than on the India Office.

9731. I think you said in answer to a question of Sir John Rees that you objected to any power of resumption in the case of a service?—Yes, final resumption.

9732. Do I gather by that that you meant that when the subject is once transferred it is transferred for ever, it will never go back to be a reserved subject in any circumstances or conditions?—Not as a reserved subject; but that is a very different thing. The Governor may resume administration of it for temporary purposes.

9733. That is the distinction you make?—Yes.

9735. Yes, I see your point?—So that final resumption, I think, is unnecessary. Temporary resumption will do.

9736. One word as regards industries. You want to see industries a transferred subject?—The development of Indian industries. I do not mean all industries.

9737. The future development of industries should be on the transferred side?—The future development of industries, so far as India is concerned, Indian industries; that is to say, I do not want to bring English industries or industries which are maintained by English capital or by Englishmen under it.

9738. Would you like to see an extensive develop ment of joint industry—Indian and British?—Yes, certainly.

9739. Joint capital and joint administration?—Yes.

9740. Do you think that that probably may be the most effective progress of industry?—I cannot say that. I do not know the matter sufficiently well to give an opinion on it

9741. In the case of the development of Indian industries you dealt with the village industries that have deteriorated since former days?—Yes.

9742. Do you think that under our modern conditions those industries as they then obtained could successfully exist to-day if an attempt were made to revive them?—I should think it very difficult, though I have heard the contrary opinion expressed.

9743. It would be a matter of very grave consideration before any serious efforts were made to revive those industries?—Yes.

9744. And until it was quite certain that they would be a going concern?—Yes.

9745. In order to that would not you say that European assistance and advice would be vital?—European assistance would be vital, under the control of an Indian Minister. What I expect the state of things to be if my proposals are carried out is that the Indian Minister would call in the English experts in order to advise him how to carry on industries. For example, the Mysore Government utilised the services of Mr. Chatterton to develop the Mysore industries. But the policy is to be guided by the Indian Minister. He lays down the lines in consultation with the English expert, and the result, I expect, will be a great advance. But unless the head of it, the man to carry out the policy and assist the industry, is an Indian, I do not expect such great advance as reasonably ought to come.

Duke of Northumberland.

9746. There is one question I should like to ask you with reference to the Parliamentary Committee. Could you tell me what would happen in the event of a disagreement between the Secretary of State and the Parliamentary Committee?—The decision of the Secretary of State would be final. It would make no difference. The responsibility would be on the Secretary of State to disregard, if he likes, the opinion of the Joint Committee.

9747. In the event of a disagreement the Secretary of State and the members of the Joint Committee would both present their cases to Parliament?—No, they need not. The Joint Committee might accept the opinion of the Secretary of State. If the Secretary of State comes to a contrary conclusion, then the Joint Committee might submit to it. If they preferred it, they might go to Parliament and take what steps they liked according to the proceedure which might be open to them.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

9748. One question on the concrete proposals you wish to put before us in regard to non-Brahmin representation in Madras. I gather you suggest the reservation of seats as the solution of the difficulty?—I do not say it is a solution, but that is what I suggest.

9749. Now how would you work that reservation of seats? Would you say that individual constituencies which would be scheduled are not to elect a Brahmin or would you group constituencies together in threes or fours and say that not more than so many Brahmins shall be elected?—I should prefer grouping in that case.

9750. Do you think it is practicable to group rural as well as urban constituencies in Madras?—It is practicable in many cases. I am not prepared to say whether it is practicable in all. Where it is not practicable, where you can get a constituency, for instance, composed only of non-Brahmins, then you might form a single constituency like that. The reason why I put that forward is that if you have separate electorates then the non-Brahmins have nothing to do with Brahmins and the Brahmin sentiment may be against non-Brahmins and the non-Brahmin sentiment may be against Brahmins.

9751. In a word, you are against communal representation as it has been advocated by the non-Brahmin Associations before us here, that is to say, the creation of separate Brahmin and non-Brahmin electorate?—I do not support that. I think that would be against the interests of the non-Brahmins themselves very much, because if these Legislative Councils are formed I expect legislative proposals for social reform to be brought forward, and if these Brahmins and non-Brahmins are not made to work together, the Brahmins are very likely to raise the point that such questions should not be settled by the Legislative Council, as they are questions dependent upon the religion of the country, and would excite religious opposition. The result of that would naturally be that the Executive Government will interfere and say: As these are all religious questions you can never interfere with them. I think therefore that it is in the interests of non-Brahmins who would require such legislation that the electorates should be such that they can work together, in which the Brahmins also must be forced to work along with them.

9752. Do you think that the reservation of 33 per cent. of the seats to non-Brahmins would satisfy any volume of non-Bramin opinion in Madras?—I cannot say whether it would satisfy or not, but I think that is reasonable.

9753. Do I gather from the answer you gave to Lord Islington that you are anxious that the Council of the Secretary of State of the India Office should be abolished?—That it should be only an advisory body if it exists.

9754. You have read the report of the Crewe Committee?—Yes. I knew the proposals in India, not in detail, but I read it after I came here recently.

9755. And you think the Advisory Committee which they suggest would be a useful body and better than the maintenance of the Council?—It is better than the maintenance of the present Council. Whether it will be useful I am not prepared to say.

9756. One question on another subject altogether. The Executive Councillors, that is to say, the reserved side of the Government, will, I presume, be appointed by Royal Warrant?—Yes.

9757. Do you think that is a good system?—I have not considered it.

Chairman.] We are very much obliged to you.

MR. BHUPENDRA NATH BASU is called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Chairman

9758. You were an unofficial member of the Bengal Legislative Council?—Yes.

9759. And after that of the Indian Council?—Yes.

9760. And now you are a member of the Secretary of State's Council?—Yes.

9761. And I think you accompanied the Secretary of State to India?—Yes.

9762. And you were also a member of what is known as the Crewe Committee?—Yes.

9763. We have, of course, had the advantage of reading what you have left on record in respect of that Committee, and you have been good enough to answer the questions that we have put before you?—Yes.

The questions and answers were as follows:—

It is noticeable that in changing from one system into another, the eminent authors of the scheme, whose countrymen are the representatives of the present order of things, which in time has yielded great and striking results in many directions, have necessarily felt themselves hampered by an excessive degree of caution. As an Indian working for his own country, I would be prepared on my forward journey to take risks which the scheme has avoided with almost painful elaboration. But whatever may be the drawbacks of the scheme in this respect, it furnishes adequate tests for that proof of our capacity for which we have so long pressed without much success, and provides an almost automatic machinery for further progress towards self-government. The initial stages are obviously beset with difficulties, perhaps somewhat over-estimated, but once we have travelled past them, our further progress will be freer from impediments and will attain an accelerated speed. In this view, after most anxious consideration, I have accepted the scheme in the best interests of my country. I regard it as a carefully thought out and statesmanlike attempt to give effect to the intention of Parliament as expressed in the announcement of the 20th August, 1917.

With these preliminary observations, I proceed to answer the questions.

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India? and, if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"? And do you generally accept the proposition contained in the Preamble?—I accept the proposition. I go further, it is not only desirable, but it has become necessary to bring about progressive realisation of responsible self-government in India, and I would take responsible government in India to mean a government responsible for its actions to the people whom it governs. I accept the proposition contained in the Preamble to the Bill, with the reservation that I am not one of those who would make the Provincial Governments entirely independent of the Government of India. My conception of the India of the future is entirely different from the India of the past, if we exclude from that past the Manryan era, which began shortly after the rise of Buddhism in the 4th century before Christ, and continued for several centuries. I do not wish India, now being welded into one organic whole by British rule after the lapse of nearly 2,000 years, to be split up again into practically independent States, peopled by communities very many of which, though alike in race, traditions and religion, were yet distinct, thus falling an easy prey to outside invaders. Under the influence of British rule Indian sentiment all over the country, from the Punjab to Assam in the East, and Madras in the South, is running in the direction of a common nationhood, and I should do nothing which will obstruct the channels through which that sentiment is flowing. In all great things affecting the life of the entire country, I would keep some central direction, and except in matters of purely local concern I would have some central machinery for co-ordination and co-relative growth.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the Provinces involves the establishment in Provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority (Clause 6)?—As an abstract question a responsible government in the fullest sense of the term would involve Legislatures wholly elected and on a territorial basis. The state of things in India at the present time has led to certain variations, such as the inclusion of officials, of nominated members, of representatives of special communities and interests which, under existing circumstances, are unavoidable.

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the Executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—Under certain safeguards, I do not think it would be impossible to vest the Legislatures as are proposed to be now constituted in the Provinces with power to control the actions or the policy of the executive. (1) In certain matters, resolutions might be required to be re-affirmed after a stated interval or passed by a specified majority or approved by a second house or put to the test of a dissolution of the house, or any combination of these. At present the non-officials, though they undoubtedly exercise indirect and appreciable influence, possess no power to control the sections and policy of the executive.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of government in the Provinces in which at present the Provincial Executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes?—If the scheme of the Bill, namely, of reserved and transferred subjects, is adopted the control of the Secretary of State in regard to the reserved subjects must remain. I am strongly of opinion, however, that in some of the Provinces at least, this separation of functions may be safely dispensed with.

5. If you accept the propositions stated under questions 1 to 4, do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view?—Taking the propositions contained in questions 1 to 4 as accepted I think the essential feature of the dual form of Government embodied in the Bill is now the only practical solution. It is undesirable, if not dangerous, to let the waters rise while overlooking an obvious way of escape, we are searching for what we believe may be a better outlet.

6. If you have any other method to suggest, does it (i) provide possibilities of advance by stages and facilitate the "progressive realisation of responsible government," and, if it does, in what way (Clause 2, 3, etc.)? and (ii) does it afford means of judgment, (a) to the electors, and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress of the success or failure in results of the control exercised by the Legislature and those who represent it in the Executive?—In answer to this question, I may say, without wishing to disturb the solution arrived at by the authors of the joint report, that there was another solution, which would probably have been better accepted in India at one time. It is not my purpose to go into elaborate details, but if the dual scheme is not accepted by the Committee, the lines I venture to suggest are, in my opinion, worth exploring. My solution was this:—A Legislature with two chambers: the first chamber preponderating ly if not wholly elected, which for brevity I shall call the Assembly; the second chamber partly elected and partly nominated, which I may call the Senate—an Executive half official and half non-official, as in the Congress League Scheme of 1916. The voice of the Assembly to ultimately prevail in all matters, except in certain matters certified by the governor in terms of the formula enunciated in the joint report and confined to the subjects now known as reserved subjects. The Senate should be so constituted as not to be regarded as a mere device to register the decrees of government, and therefore not less than half its members should be elected, and not more than half nominated and of the nominated not more than two-thirds should be officials, the remaining one-third being men of reorganised position in the public life of the Province. It should discharge functions somewhat analagous to those mentioned in Lord Bryce's report on the second chamber in this country, and should have power to formulate revisions which in all non-certified matters, will come before the Assembly for consideration, and which the Assembly after due consideration will be at liberty to reject. In certified matters after discussion in the Assembly without voting, the opinion of the Council to prevail. I would not make it compulsory for the Ministers to resign, except when they feel that they cannot give effect tothe will of the Assembly in non-certifiable matters, and I would impose certain safeguards, namely, that when the Ministers concerned are unwilling to assent to a resolution it must be expressed by a certain specified majority or that it must be repeated at a certain specified interval, and I would give the governor power to dissolve the Assembly if he thought fit, and to call another in order to put the majority votes of the Assembly to test. I do not see the necessity of a Minister resigning when the constitution provides that the will of the Legislature is to prevail, except when he finds himself unable to give effect to it. In my scheme the official ministers would follow the same course as the non-official ministers. I have not gone into the question whether the responsibility of the Ministry should be corporate or separate, but I am inclined to think that in departmental matters not involving any question of general policy, the minister concerned should alone be responsible. The resignation of ministers is a constitutional device, which did not come into existence in this country until after the Reform Act, and does not obtain even now in the democracies of America and Switzerland, and need not, and, in my opinion, should not, be adopted in India at the present moment. We have not yet developed into parties in India. Indian legislatures, specially with communal and sectional representation, will for many years be divided into groups, and steady progress may be regarded by factions and cliques. For some time to come we want continuity and a feeling of confidence, both of which will be lacking if ministers are at the mercy of factions or groups, the experience of some of the Continental countries ought to be a warning. The scheme which I have briefly sketched out satisfies the formula of progressive realisation of responsible government, for under my scheme as the Assembly becomes more and more familiar with its powers the constituencies better informed and instructed, administrators better trained we do away, (1) with the official element in the ministry and the Assembly; (2) with the certifiable subjects; and (3) the nominated element in the Senate, giving rise in course of time to a purely non-official Executive, controlled by a purely non-official Assembly, subject to the steadying and corrective influence of a second chamber (not constituted on the hereditary principle) and less liable to be carried away by some passing storm than the Assembly. I recognise the obvious drawbacks of my scheme, such as the mixture of the official and the non-official in the Ministry; but my scheme, while securing the advantage of co-operation between these two elements and of a unified form of government, lays the final responsibility upon the Legislature, except in certain certified matters, and therefore presents no difficulty in the adjudgment of responsibility, when the Statutory Commission holds its enquiry. In one sense it may be a better method of procedure, for the commission will be in a better position to judge of the fitness of the electorate, and therefore of the extension of its powers. I may conclude my suggestions by observing that a properly constituted second chamber, whose authority and weight may be acceptable both to the Government and the people, may help towards the abolition of the reserved and transferred subjects in the Provinces, a question which has excited keen controversy in different quarters.

7, 8. If you consider a dual form of government acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail the modification of which you regard as necessary? If so, what are those points, and what modifications would you suggest? (8) In particular, do you think (i.) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure," i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their Department by the Governor or if they fail to retain the confidence of the Legislature (Clause 3 (1))? (ii.) That the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities (Clause 3 (3))? (iii.) That the Executive Council should in all Provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian (Clauce (4))? (iv.) That the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council (Clause 7 (4))? I supose though the forms of the law make them appear formidable, the powers of the Governor as against the Ministers will be merely of influence and hardly of compulsion. Holding this view. I do not contemplate a case where a Governor will overrule his Minister, if the Minister has the support of the Legislative Council. In my opinion the Minister should not be liable to removal unless he finds himself unable to carry out the wishes of the Legislature, in which case he will resign himself, and as the case of a Governor over-ruling his Minister, when the latter has the support of the Legislature is hardly likely to arise, the contingency of a Minister's removal when he holds views not finding favour with the Governor, need not be considered; obviously he should not be so removable. It would be better to remove the misapprehension of the public mind, and the words "during pleasure" should be limited in the sense I have indicated. I should not lightly empower the Governor to disregard the opinion of his ministers. It may give rise to serious difficulties, and may lead to an explosion. If constitutionally this right is thought desirable to maintain, then I should make it compulsory on the Governor to take the opinion of the Government of India and of the Secretary of State before taking such a step, and, through the medium of telegrams, this can be done at once. In case of a grave emergency he may be authorised to take immediate action in anticipation; but he must report immediately to the Government of India, and the Government of India, in consultation with the Secretary of State, may confirm or set aside the action of the Governor's. The instructions should define the nature of cases which may be considered as of grave emergency. (iii) I think there is no Province, which has a Ministry, that should have more than two members of the Executive Council, under any circumstances; a larger Executive Council will be an unnecessary and intolerable burden on the taxpayer. (iv.) It is a necessary and useful power; but a new council must be called at an interval of not more than three months. In regard to the certificate procedure, firstly, as to the Budget: (a) In regard to the reserved subjects, the fear has often been expressed that the reserved subjects may absorb the best part of the revenues, leaving small scope for the transferred subjects, which principally concern the spending departments departments. In order to impose on the Governor a greater sense of responsibility, I should strongly urge, where the Governor disregards the vote of his Council, that there should be a reference to the Government of India, as contemplated in the case of legislation under Paragraph 252 of the Report. Nothing will be lost by the delay involved, as Budgets are framed in advance, and the Governors of India will have before them the views of the local government and of the Legislative Council, as expressed in its resolution. In regard to sub-clause (b) Clause 9, which applies, I apprehend, to both reserved and transferred subjects, the Governor's certificate should also be similarly dealt with, and in no case should this power be exercised except under special emergencies, as arose in Egypt when the Ministry resigned and no one was found willing to come forward to frame a new ministry. (c) In regard to legislation, the provision of appeal to the Government of India, as embodied in Paragraph 252 of the Report, was adopted after much discussion, and consideration of various alternative proposals, and should not be set aside.

10. In particular, (i.) Do you think that Legislature should have power with whatever limitations to vote supplies (Clause 9 (2))? (ii.). Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—(i.) Yes. (ii.) The Grand Committee is one of the means; a second chamber, constituted as I have suggested, another. An ordnance, a third. I am absolutely opposed to legislation by ordnance. In the first place, it cannot be done. In the second place, if done, it will lead to very serious trouble, which I desire to avoid. If the Grand Committee is retained, its composition should be as proposed in Paragraph 252 of the Report. This also was adopted after a great deal of discussion with the Councils, such as are contemplated for the provinces, there is no fear that a Grand Committee, constituted as suggested in the Report, will not enable the Government to have its affirmative legislation.

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to Provincial Legislative Councils over Provincial Government?—I think the position adopted in Part II. of the Bill is neither safe nor desirable. Constructive politics must fail if they do not proceed upon the principle of well-known physical laws. The motion of the outer members cannot but affect the central body. Therefore some change in the Government of India in the direction in which the Provinces are moving is inevitable. The authors of the Joint Report have realised this necessity; but, in my opinion, have not given it sufficient weight. They have changed the composition of the Indian Legislative Council, which they have greatly and properly enlarged; they have enhanced its powers of criticism and obstruction without responsibility; these will aggravate the evils so vividly pointed out in the Joint Report in regard to Lord Morley's reforms (vide specially Paragraph 31), and are bound to make the position one of unstable equilibrium specially with the contrast that will be flagrantly apparent between the Governments of India and of the Provinces. Apart from the enlargement of the Council some change should be made similar in nature, though not the same in extent as in the Provincial Governments, and the way has in great measure been cleared by the admirable note of Sir James Brunyate on the report of the Crewe Committee. I can see no possible harm in entrusting the functions therein mentioned to Ministers whom the Viceroy will nominate, and who need not be removable as in the provincial scheme.

12. Do you agree that it is advisable none the less to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature (Clause 16)?—I agree.

13. Do you accept the plan of a bicameral Legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential (Clauses 14, 15, and 16)?—I accept.

14. Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature (Clause 20 (3) and 4))? Or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities?—I accept.

15. Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council. If not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest?—I should ask that half the members should be pure natives of India; in any event, they should not be less than three.

16. Do you think that the development of Provincial autonomy on the one hand, and of self-government in the Provinces on the other, involves any modification of the provisions of Sections 2, 33, and 45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23)?—I have expressed my views in detail in my note to the Report of the Crewe Committee.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examination?—I am content to accept the procedure, though I should have preferred a speedier process. I regret the absence from the Bill of the provision that the Government of India at the end of five years might consider the question of further expansion of the transferred subjects in the Provinces. As such expansion will not be the result of agitation, but of administration successfully conducted, it would have been a great incentive to effort and to harmonious working between the Legislature and the Executive. This provision in the Report (Paragraph 260) was adopted after careful consideration, and should not have been given up.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—I do not like, and I do not think anybody likes, important matters to be left to rules. Very grave dissatisfaction arose because the rules framed under Lord Morley's scheme to a great extent diminished its liberal character. The same thing may happen again: but I do not see any alternative if reform in the Government of India is to be achieved while there is yet time. I only hope we may meet a better fate this time.

19. Have you any observations to offer on the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs?—I do not wish to go into details about the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees; they are capable of improvement in some particulars, and will certainly require revision. Power should be reserved to the Local Governments from time to time to consider the question of franchise by the light of experience, without alteration in number or proportion of seats, and power should be reserved to the Government of India to consider the question of franchise with a view to further popular expansion. There are some matters, however, in the Franchise Committee's Report to which I feel bound to call attention. Firstly, as regards Provincial Councils. (1) In Bengal the Landlords' representatives in the present Council number 4½ out of an elected number of 28. They will now have five seats in a body, with 105 elected members. If there is to be representation by interests, this is not fair to a very important interest in the province. (2) The European special interests have been given 12 seats. All these special interests, except, probably, the Calcutta Trades Association, are controlled by and included in the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, which has got four seats. The extra seats are an unnecessary reduplication. The European community have, in addition, been given two special seats, besides one seat for an Anglo-Indian. This gives an almost aggressively excessive representation to the European community in Bengal, and to my mind, having regard to the general attitude of that community towards the scheme, jeopardises its smooth working, and will make the course of the popular Ministers extremely difficult. (3) In the University seats in all the Provinces the fellows only have been made the electors. Under the Statute more than 80 per cent. of the fellows are Government nominees, and I believe the greater proportion of them are Government officials. In the result, these seats become Government seats. If the University seats are retained, the electorate should include all "registered graduates," an expression known in the Indian Universities as applying to graduates of a certain standing who, by payment of a fee, have registered themselves as voters for the fellowships. It may be found necessary to impose a longer standing on the electors; but it is hardly much use constituting a new and disguised Government electorate. If this enlargement of the electorate is not possible, then the electorate ought to exclude all fellows who are Government officials, as is done at present in the case of Municipalities and District Boards. Secondly, as regards the Indian Legislative Assembly. In my view, the general electorate for the Indian Legislative Assembly, namely, the non-official and non-communal representatives of the Provincial Councils, is not a desirable constituency. It is an easy way of solution which had been placed before the authors of the Joint Report, who did not see their way to accept it, and left the question open. There are difficulties, but the Franchise Committee have presented no real solution; they have cut the Gordian knot, but did not untie it. The question was to find a direct electorate. Failing to find one, the Committee have chosen a small and narrow electorate and have adopted all the methods which have in the past led these elections to be manoeuvred by cliques. I do not think it is impossible to find direct electorates, for instance, in the five divisions of Bengal for five members. If, however, we give up the quest for a direct electorate, a better indirect electorate was as ready to hand as the Provincial Councils. Take Bengal, for an example, which is divided into five divisions, each division is divided into about five districts, and every district has several municipalities within it, district and local boards. These municipalities and district boards have been, so far, electing members to the Provincial Councils. Now that the Provincial Councils are to be directly elected, these electorates may be utilised to vote for the India Legislative Assembly. It will, no doubt, be indirect voting, but it will be a much wider constituency, with less chance of the formation of cliques. These constituencies will have to be rearranged and regrouped, Mohammedan voters who have separate seats being eliminated, and the defects of the present system, under which votes are allotted to the municipality and district boards, according to their income to be remedied. Seats also will have to be readjusted and reallotted. There is another very important matter which the Southborough Committee have overlooked. From their electorates for the India Legislative Assembly they have excluded the Mohammedans because they have a separate representation of their own; but they have included the landholders, the members representing European and India commerce, all of whom have also separate seats allotted to them. The principle of the differentiation is inexplicable, and is entirely unfair to the candidates who, standing ostensibly for the general seats, have to seek the suffrage of the representatives of special interests, which have all a separate representative in the India Legislative Assembly. The evil will be much exaggerated if, as the Committee recommend, each voter is able to give all his votes from four to seven, according to Provinces, to one candidate, for in that case a candidate of the special interest is certain to secure one, if not more, of the general seats. And, thirdly, as regards the Council of State. It is again to be regretted that even in such a Council as this Bengal and Bihar, which have probably the largest landholding interests in India, have been given half a seat each; that is, Bengal will have no Zemindar representative for an alternate period of five years, and so also Bihar. This should at least have a whole Zemindar member. The members of the Council of State may be elected by the non-official members of the Provincial Councils, and there again not only Mohammedans should be excluded, as is proposed, but all other representatives of special interests who have separate representatives, and there should be no accumulated votes. It was worth while trying for this Council the experiment of Lord Morley's original idea of an electoral college, composed of representatives of all communities, and electing specified numbers of each. In that case, in one Council at least, we would have, in however small a compass a representation in mosaic as in the Indian of the future. It is highly undesirable that the same constituency should allot members both to the Legislative Assembly and the Council of State, destroying the value of the latter as a revisional and corrective agency.

9764. Is there anything you would like to say in addition?—No.

9765. Would you be good enough to answer any questions?—If you have any questions I should like to answer, but I myself do not wish to add to what I have already said.

Lord Islington.

9766. Have you any views to give us with regard to the maintenance of the Secretary of State's Council?—I have stated them in my note to the Report of the Crewe Committee. I have nothing to add.

Lord Sinha.

9767. In regard to your answer to question No. 11 with regard to the Central Government, is there any definite proposal which you are in a position to make as to the changes in the Central Government? For instance, would you advocate the introduction of the principle of diarchy in the Central Government?—I would not oppose it. I would assent to it; but if the principle of diarchy was thought inadmissible in the Government of India, I would urge the adoption of its essence, namely, in certain matters set out in Sir James Brunyate's Note, the will of the Legislature might be allowed to prevail; that is, the Executive might in those cases defer to the wishes of the Legislature.

9768. With regard to specified subjects?—With regard to specified subjects.

9769. Would you advocate the definition of the subjects by statute or statutory rules, or would you be prepared to leave it to convention and practice?—Though I should prefer to have them defined by statute, I am not afraid of leaving them to convention.

9770. Could you tell us the subjects, apart from Sir James Brunyate's Note? Could you tell us with regard to the Central subjects any that you think might be transferred if a diarchy were adopted? I do not know if you have seen the list in the Feetham Committee's Report?—I have seen it.

9771. Amended by the India Office Report?—That I have not seen.

9772. Therefore, I do not suppose you have any particular knowledge of the scheme as it is now put forward?—No. I would suggest the same line of cleavage as in the Provincial Governments; that is, the principle being the same.

9773. Are you one of those who consider it essential that there should be larger representation in the Executive Council of the Viceroy than the two members recommended by the Report?—I think so.

9774. That there should be more than two?—Yes, especially as I believe the Executive Council of the Viceroy will have to be enlarged by adding other members.

Chairman.

9775. There is one point I want to get quite clear. Do I understand that you agree with Sir James Brunyate's suggestion that there should be no change now in

in the Council of India, but that there should be a change at the end of the period of probation unless the Statutory Commission otherwise advises?—No, I do not agree with that proposition. I think, without any detriment to the safeguards which the authors of the joint scheme are anxious to maintain, at the present moment you can introduce a system in the Government of India——

9776. I am talking of the Council of India here in London. As you know, the majority of your Committee recommended that the whole responsibility should be taken away from the Secretary of State's Council and placed upon the Secretary of State, that the present Council should be abolished and a new Council of an advisory character established?—I am opposed to that view.

9777. Sir James Brunyate made a contrary proposition?—In my note I have tried to combat the view that the Secretary of State's Council should be abolished, and an Advisory Committee substituted in its place, with no power, direct or indirect, over the Secretary of State.

9778. I am quite aware of this, but I want to get your opinion on the notes?—I am in favour of the whole Council being abolished altogether, but not in favour of the Council being abolished and an Advisory Committee, with no powers of control, being substituted in its place.

9779. You would be in favour of the complete abolition of any Council now?—Yes.

9780. You are not in favour of the abolition of this Council and the appointment of an Advisory Council?—That is so—without any statutory powers.

9781. Nor do you agree with Sir James Brunyate in leaving matters as they are for the next period of ten years?—No. I have suggested changes, and I believe that the Secretary of State's Council, which is really the centre of the Government of India, should respond to the changes which have taken place in the outer spheres, otherwise there will be a great want of correlation between the Secretary of State, who is at the centre, and the Governments in India, who are in many instances the executants of his will.

9782. Assuming that the Secretary of State's Council remains, what changes would you like to see introduced into its composition?—I have suggested that a larger number of Indian members should be taken, not less than half. I have further suggested that not less than two-thirds of this number should be elected by panels in India, panels constituted by the non-official members of the Legislative Council. I have further suggested as regards the other half, which is to consist of Englishmen, that all of them need not be officials. I have said the official view is very well and strongly put always by the Governments in India. It is more necessary for it to have an outside view of those questions than the official view, which is already there.

9783. Would you be in favour of allowing some of the official members to come earlier in their service instead of at the end of their service?—They might come somewhat earlier, but much earlier would not be desirable, because this Council exercises naturally great authority in India, and the character of that authority would be affected if it was composed of men not of very ripe experience.

Mr. Montagu.

9784. I have one question arising out of that. Supposing the Secretary of State's Council was abolished, how would you suggest that the Secretary of State should obtain any Indian advice?—When I say the Secretary of State's Council should be abolished, I take a different point of view altogether, viz., that the Secretary of State would be unwilling to interfere, because of his want of reliance upon authority, which he would feel, to save him against any mistake; and therefore under my scheme if the Secretary of State's Council were abolished the Government of India would be more and more centred in India itself, amenable more largely than now to Indian influences. That is my object.

9785. So the Secretary of State would not require Indian assistance?—No, not certainly to any large extent.

9786. Have you ever thought of the controversy between a joint and a separate purse?—Yes. I was a party to it when I was a member of your deputation.

9787. What do you think about it now?—At one time I am free to confess I was in favour of a separate purse, but after very careful consideration I have come to the conclusion that a joint purse would be a better method of procedure and place greater power of control in the Legislature and greater means of association between these two branches.

Chairman.] Thank you very much.

(The Witness is directed to withdraw.)

(After a short adjournment.)

SIR ELLIOT COLVIN is called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

9788. Sir Elliot Colvin, I think you were in the Indian Civil Service on the Revenue side?—Yes.

9789. And you served most of your time in the Political Department?—Yes.

9790. Your last appointment was in Rajputana?—Yes.

9791. What was the appointment you held there?—Agent to the Governor-General.

9792. You retired in 1918, after thirty-five years' service?—I retired at the end of 1917. I think perhaps I ought to mention that, although I have served the greater part of my service in the Political Department, it has so happened that I have always had to deal with a certain amount of British territory. In Beluchistan, for instance, when I was Revenue and Judicial Commissioner of Baluchistan, there was British Baluchistan to be dealt with, and when I was Agent for the Governor-General in Rajputana I was of course at the same time the Chief Commissioner of Ajmer-Merwera; so that the political development in British India is a subject with which I have always been more or less in touch.

9793. I may say that you speak from a very wide experience of India and knowledge of the Indian Civil Service?—Yes.

The following answers by the Witness to questions submitted by the Committee were handed in:—

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India? And, if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"? And do you generally accept the proposition contained in the Preamble?—(a) Yes. (b) I define "responsible government" for India as the government of the whole of India in accordance with the wishes and sentiments of all those Indians who are genuinely loyal to the British connection and who desire that India should remain an integral part of the British Empire. (c) Yes.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the Provinces involves the establishment in Provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority (Clause 6)?—Undoubtedly in due time. But see reply to Question 4.

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the Executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—(a) Not for a long time yet, except in the particular matters or functions made over to them. (b) At present, they can exercise considerable influence, but not control.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of government in the Provinces in which at present the Provincial Executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes?—Certainly.

5. If you accept the propositions stated under Questions 1 to 4, do you think that the dual form of government government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view?—I recognise the great difficulty of accomplishing a gradual transfer of power without some form of dualism. But the one essential element of success in this object is harmony and co-operation between Indian and Englishman. I apprehend that the "diarchy" proposed in the Bill will divide every Province into hostile camps, one British executive and the other Indian legislative, and thus introduce and foster the racial spirit which it is our particular aim to avoid. The five Provincial Governors who have advanced an alternative scheme have felt this; and though their proposals are open to the criticism that they fail to eradicate dualism and may lead to a more sudden and violent transfer of power, I believe that their instinct is right. I do not myself see how dualism in some form can ultimately be avoided; but we do not want it now. There has been too much racial feeling about in recent times. We want to start the new era with a fairly long period of harmonious co-operation between Englishman and Indian towards the great object we have set before us. That will be a more substantial step towards our goal than any other conceivable. I cannot believe that when the whole energies of the Government of India and of the Provincial Governments and of the entire civil services are being loyally directed, as they will be, towards carrying the new policy into effect, there will be any failure to advance along the pre-appointed path under a unitary system of government for the next ten years. After that, dualism in some form will be inevitable; but meanwhile arrangements for minimising its dangers and inconveniences may and probably will be evolved. In any case, it appears unnecessarily hazardous to start away at once with so risky an experiment as "diarchy" in all seven Provinces at once. If it is absolutely resolved to proceed with "diarchy" at once, let it be limited at first to one Province.

6. If you have any other method to suggest, does it (i) provide possibilities of advance by stages and facilitate the "progressive realisation of responsible government," and, if it does, in what way (Clause 2, 3, etc.)? and (ii) does it afford means of judgment, (a) to the electors, and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress of the sucess or failure in results of the control exercised by the Legislature and those who represent it in the Executive?—(i) Yes. In just the same way as the Joint Report suggests. (ii) Yes. Moreover, in 10 years' time the election machinery will be getting into fairly good order, and the electors will be more representative and therefore more reliable "judges." As to the Statutory Commission, it will be able to push things forward, perhaps also to keep them stationary, but never to put things back, or undo anything that has been done, even though its "judgment" may point in that direction. The force of advanced Indian opinion will compel progression, not retrogression.

7. If you consider a dual form of government acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail the modification of which you regard as necessary? If so, what are those points, and what modifications would you suggest?—In my opinion, the two divisions of government should be independent of control by each other, though influence may be exerted as at present. The control over "reserved subjects" should be frankly claimed and firmly held by the Executive, although the opinion of the legislative bodies should be ascertained on all important matters, and their sentiments and wishes, if expressed by a large majority, should be treated with every respect and consideration, and where possible without serious injury to the administration, should be acceded to.

8. In particular, do you think (i) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure"—i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their department by the Governor or if they fail to retain the confidence of the Legislature (Clause 3 (1))? (ii) That the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilties (Clause 3 (3))? (iii) That the Executive Council should in all Provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian (Clause 4)? (iv) That the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council (Clause 7 (4))?—(i) Yes. But the power should be sparingly exercised, and it would be well to require a two-thirds majority of the Legislative Council to justify removal on a vote of want of confidence. (ii) Yes. (iii) Please see my replies to Question 10. (iv) Yes. It is to be hoped this would seldom be necessary, for it would mean the breakdown of the dual system of Government, if it occurred at all frequently. But I agree with the views expressed in para. 102 of the Government of India despatch of March 5, 1919.

9. Referring back to Questions 2, 3 and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the Legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed generally by Clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and legislative powers as (i) suitable, or as (ii) unnecessarily severe, or as (iii) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament (Clause 9)?—(i) No. (ii) No. (iii) Yes.

10. In particular (i) do you think that the Legislature should have power with whatever limitations to vote supplies (Clause 9 (2))? (ii) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—(i) Not in regard to "reserved" subjects. The Budget for reserved and transferred subjects should be treated separately. The latter should be controlled by the Legislative Councils, who would vote the supplies for them. In regard to "reserved" subjects, the Legislative Councils should see the Budget and advise on it, but they should not have the power to control it. To grant them this power seems to me inconsistent with the scheme of the retention by the Executive of control over reserved subjects. To secure this control I should advise retaining two British members on the Provincial Executive Councils for the present, not necessarily both official. (ii) The plan of Grand Committees appears to me both cumbrous and unnecessary. The Grand Committee will, in fact, be a packed committee, and, unless its numbers are kept low, the packing may be very difficult. Those who are left out will feel outraged. In regard to "transferred" subjects, there is really no need for Grand Committees. For "reserved" subjects, the Legislative Council should, as at present, be furnished frankly with an official plus nominated majority. This seems to indicate the need for two Legislative Councils in each Province, but this would not be nearly so bad as it sounds if it were arranged (and this could easily be done) that one—i.e., the Legislative Council for transferred subjects—should merely be an extension of the other. It would not be so awkward as a Legislative Council and a Grand Committee.

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to Provincial Legislative Councils over Provincial Governments?—Yes.

12. Do you agree that it is advisable none the less to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature (Clause 16)?—Not at present.

13. Do you accept the plan of a bicameral legislature as arising out of this as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which

which he regards as essential (Clauses 14, 15 and 16)?—No. I think a single chamber similar to the proposed State Council, but slightly larger, would be quite enough in the earlier stages of the transition. There would be room on it for three to five first-rate Indian representatives from each Province. The Government of India must hold control over the whole administration for a long time yet, and does not want a large Legislative Assembly mainly elected in this early period of transition. This would obviate the possibility of continuous friction between the two Chambers, which would be deplorable.

14. Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature (Clause 20 (3) and (4))? Or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities?—Is answered by the preceding reply.

15. Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council? If not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest?—Yes; but two-thirds of the members should for the present be British.

16. Do you think that the development of provincial autonomy on the one hand, and of self-government in the Provinces on the other, involves any modification of the provisions of Sections 2, 33 and 45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23)?—Yes.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examination?—Yes.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—The Bill seems to leave a great deal to be dealt with by rule, but in view of the changing conditions of the situation this is probably wise. I am, however, very doubtful whether the list of transferred subjects in any Province or the relations between the Secretary of State and the Government of India should be open to modification before the report of the first Statutory Commission has been received and considered.

19. Have you any observations to offer on the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs?—Franchise Committee's Report.—India is sharply divided into Urban and Rural communities. The latter are by far the most important section, 226 out of 244 million; but of the 6 per cent. of the population who can claim some degree of education it is probable that the majority live in the towns. When one considers that the utmost limit to whom the vote can as yet be given is 23 per 1,000, that communications in rural areas are still very backward, and that the electoral machinery especially in rural areas is likely to work stiffly and unevenly at first, one feels that the town population will for some time be over-represented and the country population under-represented on the Councils. But, as the Joint Report says, it is our imperative duty to assist and protect the ryot. This, in my opinion, supplies the strongest possible reason for going slow with reforms until the spread of education makes it feasible to extend the electorate. The Franchise Committee's report seems to have overlooked the need which the Joint Report emphasised of help and protection for the ryot.

Report of the Committee on Division of Functions.—For the same reason I advise the transfer of a limited number of functions at first. We are in danger of handing over to the dwellers in towns the interests of the rural population. We should go slow until the ryot is better able to look after himself. It would in my opinion be a serious error to transfer at the present stage the whole subject of "Education" (with the slight limitations proposed) and "Development of Industries"—I agree with the views expressed by the Government of India on these two points. Also, since "Co-operative Societies" affect mainly the interests of the agricultural community, and since they have not yet attained a full measure of growth in India, I would not permit their transfer at present.

Public Services.—The Joint Report promised protection to public servants in the discharge of their duties under the new arrangements. This is essential, and I do not think permission to retire on a proportionate pension meets the case. We do not want to see the new régime result in British officers trooping out of the country. Until the new arrangements are seen to be working well and with justice to old officials, so long, in fact, as we are still in the stage of experiment, the interests of these men should be carefully watched, and Indians who are placed in authority over them should be advised accordingly.

The Bill debars officials from being appointed Ministers (3 (i.)). Some of the best and most experienced material is to be found in the ranks of our Indian officials, and if they are ruled out it is to be feared that the supply of the necessary material may run short.

9794. You have been good enough to send us in answers to the questions we sent you, and that information is all before us. Have you anything you would like to say in supplement to these answers?—I do not think I have very much to add to what I have already written, but I am very much impressed by a point which is mentioned in the Joint Report, a sentence I noticed at the time that struck me very much, to this effect: "Nor do we overlook the fact that a public opinion, which is, in fact, the opinion of the population of India as a whole cannot be developed until education spreads and until the people have learned to use the vote." I think that is a very important sentence in the Joint Report, and I am not quite sure that in the anxiety to push forward the details in regard to the development of self-government perhaps there has not been a tendency to overlook that very essential point.

9795. Would you say something more to us about the position of the Civil Service under the new constitution? You allude to it in one of your answers, but you do not develop it at all. What effect do you think the realisation of the general scheme of reform adumbrated in the Joint Report, and embodied in this Bill, will have on the Indian Civil Service and what will be the position?—My feeling is that so long as we are really in an experimental period with regard to self-government very strong support ought to be given to all members of the Civil Service lest they should feel that they were placed in almost an impossible position. This might lead to a large number of early retirements, which I think would be very unfortunate for the administration generally. There seems to be a possibility that a great many men, feeling that unless they have the strong support of the Government behind them, they would find it very difficult to carry on under the new arrangements, might go in for retiring at an unduly early period on a proportionate pension.

9796. They will look at it from rather a different angle, will they not?—Certainly.

9797. Of course, the position of a Civil servant, who is not brought by his duty into contact with a Minister, will be the same as it is now?—Certainly.

9798. But a great many Civil servants will have to work under the direction of Ministers in respect of the subjects which are transferred to their responsibility?—Quite so.

9799. And that would be a new experience?—Yes.

9800. I wanted you to tell us how far you think the general body of the Service would be able to meet that new responsibility, with or without difficulty?—Of this I am quite certain, that the whole body of the Civil Service will do their utmost to meet the new situation and carry it out loyally and in every way that is possible to improve the prospects of self-government in India. Now that the Civil Service knows that is the policy of the Government at home. I am quite certain they will do everything in their power to forward it, but, at the same time, difficulties are bound to arise; for instance, a Minister may have a view which the Civil servant finds, perhaps, that he cannot easily accept, and there may arise differences between the two. It would be unfortunate fortunate thing if, although the Government of India itself were of opinion that the Civil servant was in the right in the matter, nevertheless he should have to leave the country, and accept a proportionate pension and retire.

9801. Where no moral question is involved and it is a question of opinion as to what is wise or unwise, do you think the members of the Indian Civil Service would find difficulty in carrying out the orders of Ministers?—No; I think they would carry out the orders of Ministers in questions of that sort, but other questions might occur in which they would find it difficult to carry out the orders they received. It is possible to conceive it very easily.

9802. What class of questions are you thinking of?—If a Minister desired him to undertake a duty which he did not think it was morally justifiable that he should do he would then be in a position to refuse to do it, and, therefore, a difficulty with the Minister would arise, or he would have to carry out a matter contrary to his own conscience.

9803. Can you, from your great experience, give us an illustration of what might be such a case?—I could give an illustration, but I would rather do it not in public.

9804. Have you been in a position to form an opinion as to whether any considerable number of the Indian Civil Service regard the future with such misgiving that they would like to leave the Service?—Well, it is almost two years since I left India, so I cannot say that I have met men who say they would actually leave the country rather than carry on. I do not think there are many like that.

9806. In your political work were you brought into contact with native states governed by Indians?—Yes.

9807. The principal officers of those states were always Indians, I presume?—Yes.

9808. But some of them may have had some European subordinates?—Yes.

9809. In what kind of sphere of employment were those Europeans?—They held various appointments. One man, for instance, was a Revenue Member of the Council, another was a Public Works Officer, and another was a Judicial Officer. In almost every department Europeans have been holding office in native states.

9810. Where would those Europeans come from?—They came from the Services in British India, either the Civil Service or the Public Works Department.

9811. Did you find that it worked easily and comfortably under the Indian officers?—I think, as a rule, it might be said they worked easily under the Indian officers, but I think I ought to point out that the situation in a native state is different from what the situation will be in British India in future, because in a native state you are a servant of the Chief, and nothing else, practically. You have to carry out the views of the native Chief and of his Government, but in the new situation there will be a double duty as it were; you will be in the Civil Service itself under the Government of India, but you will, at the same time, be under the orders of the Minister who is responsible to the Legislative Council. That is where a certain difficulty will come in which does not exist in native states.

9812. Can you remember any cases where these Europeans, in the direct employment of the Chief, were confronted by the kind of moral difficulty you said you could imagine, but would rather not explain in public?—Yes, I can.

9813. You have known cases?—Yes.

9814. That was in your mind when you gave the previous answer?—Yes.

Lord Sinha.

9815. As I understand your answers, you suggest that the Majority Report of the Local Governments should be adhered to for the first ten years, and then this scheme of the Bill come in?—The Majority Report of the Local Governments?

9816. The five Local Governments, or rather five Lieutenant-Governors have a scheme of their own to which you referred?—Yes.

9817. You suggest that should be tried for the first ten years?—Yes.

9818. And after that period the scheme now embodied in the Bill should be given effect to?—Quite so.

9819. You would do that, as I understand, because you think just recently there has been a certain amount of racial feeling?—I think we want to create a new atmosphere. At present we have not got in India the atmosphere we want in order to start with any form of dualism. I think if we spent ten years in working together in harmonious co-operation, both the Englishman and the Indian, we should in that time evolve the atmosphere which we want in order to enter upon dualism.

9820. But assuming that under the scheme of diarchy, which has sometimes been misunderstood, you ensure close association between the two sections of the Government, do you not think this would create the atmosphere of co-operation which we all desire?—No, I do not think so.

9821. Why not?—Because I am afraid there will be constant friction.

9822. Assuming that the members of the Executive Council and the members of the Ministry meet together constantly over important questions of policy, and that no decision is arrived at by either section without a full discussion between the two of them, that would be very much the system which is now in vogue, would it not?—There would be this difference, that they would be all working together under one authority, and they would not have two different authorities to consider when they were discussing subjects.

9823. You mean the Secretary of State as representing Parliament on the one hand——?—With regard to reserved subjects.

9824. And the popular assembly on the other?—With regard to transferred subjects—quite so.

9825. You do not think, then, that the association in itself will create the desirable atmosphere?—I think it is not likely to do so. I think that the atmosphere would be created if you had one authority over both for ten years, all working together for the same object, and then during that period it will be possible to evolve a system of dualism which will perhaps work smoothly.

9826. I understand you to say that it is inevitable that dualism should come in at some stage or another?—I do not see any alternative.

9827. I suppose you know that there is a very large mass of opinion in India of what has been called the educated classes, and sometimes the politically-minded classes, which has been expressed in favour of the scheme embodied in the Bill?—Yes.

9828. Have you taken into account the disappointment which would be caused to that section if the scheme of the Bill was abandoned in favour of the scheme of the Lieutenant-Governors?—Yes, I have fully considered that point, and I quite realise it will create disappointment, but I feel it would be right to face that disappointment, because, as the Joint Report mentions, there is not as yet "a public opinion which represents the whole of the population"; and until we can get something more approaching a public opinion which really represents the whole of the population, it is wise to go slow even at the risk of creating some disappointment.

9829. Have you also considered the fact that under the Lieutenant-Governor's scheme the Indian Members of the Executive Government will be more or less amenable to the Legislative Council in almost the same way as they are under the Bill?—The Indian Members of the Executive Council?

9830. Being

9830. Being chosen from the elected members—that is their proposal—they will be amenable to the influence of the Legislative Council, and will, in general, try to give effect to the policy of that body as they conceive it to be?—Certainly.

9831. So that from the first you will have in that body two different influences exerting themselves, one of the Secretary of State——?—You are speaking of the Government of India at present?

9833. And, therefore, not so subject to the influence of the Legislative Council as the two other Members, the non-Official Members, who would be appointed from amongst the elected Members?—Quite so.

9834. So that under that scheme you will have the two influences exerting themselves upon two different branches of the Executive?—You want the two influences; if you did not get the two influences the whole scheme would be futile. You must have both influences.

9835. But you would have the two, and the influence of the Legislature would be exerted very much more powerfully and forcibly upon those Members who are taken from the Legislature itself, would it not?—Yes; you want them there in every way in order to have the touch with the Legislative Council, which is so necessary.

9836. Therefore, does it not come to very much the same thing?—No; I do not think it would.

9837. You suggest, as an alternative, that diarchy might be tried if it is introduced immediately in one Province?—I suggest that as a pis aller.

9838. Will not that create some difficulty as regards the choice?—I do not think it would be very difficult.

9839. I see you disapprove of the Grand Committee plan?—Yes.

9840. Do you approve of the Council of State plan with regard to the Central Government, the Government of India?—I approve of one Chamber only for the Government of India, whether it is called a Council of State or the Legislative Council.

9841. Therefore you are not in favour of a bicameral system?—No.

9842. Either in the Provinces or in the Central Government?—In the Provinces there would be a Legislative Council.

9843. That is only one Chamber?—Yes, and the Executive.

9844. So that you are against the bicameral system in the Provinces?—It is not proposed, I understand, is it?

9845. Yes, except by the procedure of the Grand Committee, and that you disapprove of?—The way it strikes me is this. The proposal is that there shall be a Legislative Council in every Province, and that, if necessary, after the certificate procedure has been entered upon the Council will resolve itself into a Grand Committee. It seemed to me simpler if there were only one Legislative Council which dealt with all transferred subjects, and a smaller portion of that same body which should deal with reserved subjects. That is the intention of my note, although, perhaps, I did not make it very clear.

9846. Have you seen the lists of transferred and reserved subjects which have been put in before this Committee?—No, I have not; I have only seen the list proposed.

9847. I mean in the Report of the Feetham Committee. Have you seen that list?—Yes, certainly, I have seen that.

9848. Do you approve of the list generally, or those lists rather?—I think it is rather a large number of subjects to transfer as a beginning. I think the whole of education, for instance, is a large matter to transfer at the initial stage.

9849. Do you consider that education might be divided?—I think it can very well be divided by making primary education transferred and secondary and University education reserved. I think that is a very easy line of division to take.

9850. I understand you would also keep co-operation as a reserved subject?—That is my feeling.

9851 I understand from your evidence that you prefer the scheme as proposed by the Lieutenant-Governors?—For the next ten years.

Lord Islington.

9852. And if you were to make an exception to that it would be in the direction of taking one Province and experimentalising with it in dualism?—Quite so.

9853. As regards your proposal, as an alternative to the Grand Committee, you disapprove of the Grand Committee?—Yes. The other system seems to me less likely to cause friction.

9854. Your system with regard to the transferred subjects would be to let the Legislative Council, as constituted, carry through its work?—Yes.

9855. And with regard to the reserved subjects to reduce the number of that Council?—Yes, to deal with the reserved subjects.

9856. What would be the difference between the reduced Legislative Council and a Grand Committee?—The difference is this, that in the one case the whole Council discusses all these subjects, whether they are reserved or transferred, and in the other case they only discuss the transferred subjects—they do not discuss the reserved subjects at all. Only the smaller section of the Council discusses these. That is the difference.

Chairman.] No certification?

Lord Islington.

9857. No certification?—No certification.

9858. I do not quite follow it?—May I try to explain?

9859. What you propose looks to me on the face of it, to be very similar to a Grand Committee. The whole Council, of course, as constituted, discusses and votes upon the transferred subjects?—Yes, but there would be no reason for any such procedure as certification. You avoid the certificate procedure altogether if you have only reserved subjects discussed by the smaller Legislative Council.

9860. How would you constitute that smaller Legislative Council?—That is a large matter to tackle straight away, but I think means could be devised.

9861. I want to see where the difference in the constitution of your smaller Legislative Council comes in from the constitution as proposed of the Grand Committee?—Probably it would be much the same, but the point is that in the one case you do not bring the reserved subjects before the whole Legislative Council at all, and in the other you do.

9862. I see your point—the reserved subjects will only be discussed by the official element of the Legislative Council?—Yes, or rather by a Council in which the official and nominated members held a clear majority, so that there would not be the wide discussion and, perhaps, very bitter feeling and great differences of opinion on matters which really lie within the field of the Executive administration.

9863. Would it not be regarded as rather a retrograde proposal in India, taking some of the most important subjects out of discussion by the Legislative Council of the Province?—It no doubt would in a way deprive the enlarged Legislative Council of a discussion on certain subjects which are discussed at present; that would happen, but, on the other hand, it supplies a means of avoiding the possibility of friction which is so likely to occur. It must not be forgotten that the smaller body would continue to discuss all subjects, as the existing Legislative Councils do.

Duke of Northumberland.

9864. If your proposal is carried out to introduce the scheme of the Lieutenant-Governors, do you think it will lead to a great increase in the agitation?—I think it will create disappointment undoubtedly, but my feeling is that if we go too fast we shall end in handing over power to a small section of the population instead of to a large section, as it should be.

9865. Do you think it would lead to a very serious situation in India if the scheme of the Lieutenant-Governors were carried out?—I do not think so; I think it would no doubt create a feeling of disappointment, but we have to remember that the whole future of India depends upon our handing over powers to a majority of the people, and if we go too fast we shall hand it over to a small minority.

9866. There is just one other question I want to ask you about the Civil Service. You say you do not think that permission to retire on a proportionate pension meets their case?—Yes.

9867. Have you got any scheme in your mind for further safeguarding the Civil servants?—I think it would be wise to say to the authorities who are appointed for the transferred subjects, that after all we are still in a stage of experiment and that, therefore, it would be expected that the British officers should be treated with every consideration.

9868. You would not suggest anything more specific than that?—No, I do not think so.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

9869. I see at the end of your Paper you state: "The Bill debars Indian officials from being appointed Ministers. Some of the best and most experienced material is to be found in the ranks of our Indian officials, and if they are ruled out it is to be feared that the supply of the necessary material may run short." You would not suggest, would you, that an Indian who becomes a Minister in a Provinical Government should remain an official, paid as an official?—No.

9870. You would have to terminate his official career?—That is so, to give him a proportionate pension or to treat him in whatever way was decided to be fair; but if I may say a few words about that, Mr. Chairman——

Chairman.

9871. Please?—I have felt, for some time, that some of the most capable Indians that I have met in India are amongst those who are already in the Service, and they have had a great deal of experience in administration, being much more experienced than many of the others who, perhaps, will come forward under the new scheme, and yet those men are not at present admissible as members of the Legislative Councils. The Bill, as it stands, debars them from election.

9872. Unless they leave the Service?—Unless they leave the Service, which very few of them would do.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

9873. Your point is that they are not likely to leave the Service and throw up an official career unless they are given a proportionate pension?—Unless they are told, beforehand, that they will receive a proportionate pension if they do. There are a great many very capable men amongst the officials, and that is the sort of class whom I feel might very well, perhaps, stand for election for the rural population of a district. We do not want to have the rural population of a district represented by a pleader at the headquarters town. It would be much better to have them represented if possible by the class who have in the past been officials who have had to deal with them, who perhaps have been doing their Land Revenue settlements, and have constantly been in touch with them. That is the class of man who might very well represent the rural population in the new Councils, and yet, at the present time, as the Bill stands, he is not eligible.

Lord Sinha.

9874. He is eligible for nomination, just as much as any other official?—Yes; but he cannot be elected to the Council if he is an official, and yet that class provides a very large number of men who might be of great value to us in those new Legislative Councils.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

9875. You have referred to another question. Is your objection to the Council of State and the Grand Committee an objection to the cumbersome method of procedure, or an objection of that kind, or is it an objection per se to a second chamber system? Do you object to the idea?—No; it is not an objection per se to the second chamber system, but it is a feeling that since the Government of India is not to be treated in the same way as the Provinces are, and that, as far as possible, the old arrangements are to stand with the Government of India, it appears wise to me to go on with the Legislative Council very much on the same lines as we have had hitherto for the Government of India.

9876. You think, when the time comes for the development of the Indian Constitution in accordance with the spirit of the pronouncement of the 20th of August, 1917, eventually there should be a bicameral system introduced as regards the Government of India?—It is very difficult to say what would be done a great many years hence, but I think probably a bicameral system will be the evolution of it.

9877. Some of us are very anxious to know how one could form a second chamber in India. There is the present proposal for the Council of State being derived from the same electorate, with the same authority as the Legislative Assembly of India. Have you any suggestion to propose as to how you could select the sort of men in India who would make the second chamber representatives? Are there Indians who have served in native States, who are in an outstanding position, and who would be useful in the Government of India?—There are many Indians who would be excellent members of a——

9878. Of a Senate?—Yes; a Senate or second chamber; but how to bring them together I must say I have not considered very much. I cannot see how you would do it, except by nomination, really.

9879. Can you tell me what type of man you have in your mind?—At the present time I have in mind a Kashmiri Brahmin who was for a long time a Minister in the State of Jodhpur, an extremely able man. He went from Jodhpur and became Minister in Udaipur, where he remained for about five years. He left Udaipur last year and returned to Jodhpur to a position of still greater importance. He is a man of great ability. I could mention many others, but he is one who occurs to me at the moment.

9880. Do you think that sort of man would be willing to face popular election in a Province in India?—He would not have a chance, because he has never been in the Provinces; his whole time has been spent in the native States; but you will find men of the same kind in the Provinces, no doubt. There are men who would be very excellent members of a Senate, but how to get them together I do not know. I cannot think of any other plan except nomination.

9881. And such nomination would probably have to be by the Provincial Governors, or by the Provinces, rather than by the Governor-General?—It would have to be by the Provincial Governors; no one else would be capable of doing it.

9882. In the native States with which you were concerned, do the same problems in connection with the outcastes and the depressed classes exist in the same way as in British India?—It is not so marked in Rajputana as it is in Madras, of course; but it does exist there, too—it is everywhere the same.

9883. You lay some emphasis in your paper upon the backward nature of some of the rural areas?—Yes.

9884. You see no way of getting these backward elements of the population represented at present other than by nomination?—No, I see no way except by nomination.

Lord Sydenham.

9885. I think you are very much impressed by the extreme difficulty of working diarchy, are you not?—Yes.

9886. And it is the diarchy, is it not, which introduces those dangers with respect to the effect on the great public services of which we have heard so much?—Yes.

9887. With a unitary Government, therefore, as proposed by the five Lieutenant-Governors, those difficulties would disappear. One suggestion you made to us which I think is new, is that we should try diarchy in one Province and see how it worked and let the others go on?—That is the second suggestion, but, if I may say so, my first suggestion is that we should try a unitary Government on the lines of the suggestions of the five Provincial Governors for ten years, and if that is not accepted I would suggest that diarchy should be tried in one Province. It could be tried simultaneously.

9888. Do you think it would be a very invidious matter to select a Province in which diarchy should be tried?—You would naturally try it in the most advanced Province.

9889. Do you think there would be a demand to be chosen to have the honour of having the diarchy?—I think very probably they would prefer it to the other suggestion themselves.

9890. I take it you do see that there are very great dangers dangers in this rift at the very head centre of the Governments of all the Provinces?—I see very great danger there, and I think it is too early to start upon it at present. I feel that we want to create an atmosphere in which we shall all be anxious to work together before we start on actual dualism.

9891. You say that you would retain two British members on the Provincial Executive Council for the present. Is not that almost necessary in the case of Provinces which have received their Governors from England?—Yes.

9892. It is scarcely sufficient, is it, that a Governor at his start should depend entirely on the advice of one man?—Yes.

9893. You have laid stress upon the possible danger of over-representation of the towns population. Do you therefore agree that we should adopt the communal representation, as has been pressed upon us by many witnesses, to ensure that the country population and the lower-caste population should have adequate and real representation in the new Councils?—I am not sure that communal representation would be a very great advantage to the rural areas, but I do think that we should adopt communal representation at the present stage in India to a very large extent.

9894. Do you think that in the proposals of the Franchise Committee there is an undue preponderance given to the urban element?—It is this way: The number of voters from the rural areas is, of course, according to the scheme of the Franchise Committee, very much larger than the number of voters from the urban areas, but it will not work when it comes to practical business, because a great many of the rural voters live at distant places, and they will not trouble to register their votes, and the urban voters will take much more trouble about registering their votes, and the result will be that the rural population will not really get represented owing to the difficulty of understanding what the vote means. Although in the Report of the Franchise Committee the number of rural voters is very much larger than the number of urban voters, still the practical difficulty of working the electoral machinery for the first few years will make it extremely difficult to get a true register of the rural vote.

9895. Do you think it desirable to enforce the residential qualification for the candidates in rural districts?—Certainly.

9896. Do you think there is any difficulty in defining a residential qualification for that purpose?—I suppose the definition would be a residence within the district for rural areas.

9897. For a certain period in the year?—Yes, for the greater portion of the year.

9898. Do you fear that the Civil Servants may be frequently and personally attacked by name in the new Legislative Councils?—I should not think there would be very much attacking of individuals by name.

9899. You remember when the Morley-Minto reforms were instituted it was very widely stated that the Civil Service opposed and obstructed those reforms. Was not that statement, in your experience, quite unjustified?—Yes, I think that is unjustified. I think there were a good many Civil Servants who did not like the spirit of the Morley-Minto reforms.

9900. As a matter of fact they did, and tried to do their best to make those reforms a success?—Quite so.

9902. Is not that rather a probable cause of a difference?—Yes.

9903. Now, do not native states largely use European and British servants for special duties when they are wanted?—Yes.

9904. And their case—the case of the Europeans employed in any native state—is entirely different from that of a Civil Servant in British India working under a Minister?—Yes, I think I said that; the cases are very different.

9905. Have you known Indian officers trained in the British service who found moral difficulties when working in native states?—Yes, I have.

9906. You know the system which prevails in a Presidency Government—the Governor is the second member for every subject, and therefore he sees all action which is taken by the Governor in Council. The proposal Lord Sinha made to you that the Governor and the Executive and the Ministers should all be forced to discuss matters together, and that then the Minister should go away and do exactly what he likes, is quite different, is it not?—I am not sure that I quite followed that.

9907. Did you follow what I said about the present procedure?—Yes.

9908. Lord Sinha proposed to you that the Governor and the Executive and the Minister should be forced to discuss together all questions?—Yes.

9909. And then the Minister should go away and do exactly what he liked. That is quite different, is it not in principle from the present practice?—I do not know that I quite understood that from Lord Sinha.

9910. Perhaps I have misunderstood him

Lord Sinha.] I do not think I suggested that the Minister should go away and do what he wished, but in the case of difference of opinion in that joint assembly the Ministers should have the right, subject, of course, to the Governor's veto, to decide for themselves in their own subjects.

9911. And would then, of course, have acted as they decided. (To the Witness.) You see there is a considerable difference between that proposal and the present one?—Oh, yes.

9912. You say that there is no alternative to dualism, which you contemplate in ten years?—Yes.

9913. Supposing a unitary system was set up and worked well, cannot you go on reducing the European members of the Executive until they are all Indians?—I think that you would have a more violent transition in that way than by transferring subjects. You can only have a limited number of members on the Executive Council, and the day would come fairly early when you had a majority of Indian members, and that would be practically handing over the government.

9914. You think it is a greater revolution to change men than to change subjects?—Yes, I think you could change subjects more gradually than you could change men. You have only four men to deal with.

9915. You are not in favour of weakening the Government of India until the result of the proposed system in the Provinces has been made known?—Quite so.

9916. I think you have said, and we all know, there are Indians who would be capable of administering any transferred subjects. Is not the real difficulty to get those Indians into the posts where they would administer those subjects?—Yes; I am not at all certain—and I have not yet seen any inquiry made on the matter—as to whether there are enough really qualified Indians in the country to man all the Provinces in regard to transferred subjects, if these are at all numerous or important.

9917. Still, there are in the country any number of well trained and experienced Indians?—There are.

9918. And the difficulty will be under the elective system to get those Indians to do the work they can do exceedingly well?—Yes, and, if I may add, some of the very best material, so far as I believe it to exist in the country, is ineligible under the Bill.

9919. I understand you consider it quite vital that a good start of the new system should be made, and therefore it is most important that nothing should be done which might create friction at the outset?—That is what I wish to avoid.

9920. If friction is developed at the outset, is it not certain to go on increasing in bitterness?—I think so.

9921. If we could start well with the system——?—Things would have a much better chance.

9922. And at the end of the ten years' period you could go on?—Yes.

9923. You have had the advantage of a wide experience of social matters in India. I notice that the Aga Khan not long ago wrote those words: "There is less social intercourse between Mohammedans and Hindoos or between Rajputs and Parsees than between any of those races and the English in India. The Englishmen alone receive and have friends among all classes and races." Do you think that that state of things that he describes there has now passed away?—No.

Sir Henry Craik.

9924. Sir Elliot, there was one expression you used which I would like you just to explain a little more. You said that in some respects you rather welcomed this statement, because when you went out to India you did not know whether it was proposed to continue the Government of India in the hands of the English Government or to hand it back to the Indians themselves, and you thought that now an announcement had been made it would clear it up?—Quite so.

9925. Am I to accept that then as meaning that you interpret the announcement made as indicating the intention of handing over the government of India entirely to the Indian people and taking off our responsibility?—I meant that it will be under the Home Government. It will not be an absolutely independent Government; it must stay in connection with the British Empire.

9926. What bonds of dependency do you contemplate continuing?—It will differ slightly from the position of a colony. I think the statement as to the future position which is given towards the end of the Joint Report is a very clear statement of the goal at which we aim.

9927. That is handing over entirely the responsibility of government in India to the Indians?—Eventually.

9928. You would look upon this present movement as meaning that?—Yes, it is the beginning of it, but it will have to be done very carefully.

9929. I am not asking whether it would have to be done carefully or not, but I say do you really contemplate and ask us to contemplate that as the ultimate goal of this? We must test this one way or another, and I want your opinion?—I think the ultimate goal is the one stated——

9930. Just tell me your own view about it?—It is as I have said, government by the Indians of their own country, by those Indians who are genuinely loyal to the British connection.

9931. How are we to judge of that? If it is to be responsible government, who is to judge them? We must act logically in one way or another, and I want your opinion one way or another. We cannot judge them if they are to be responsible; they are the people who must judge?—You mean that I cannot say they are to be——

9932. We cannot say to them, "We were going to give you a responsible government, but now we will not give it because we think that those you have chosen are not loyal to us." Do you think that that is a possible thing to be done?—I think that is the way in which it will gradually work out—that we have got gradually to give it to them as we see that they are content to be a component part of the British Empire.

9933. I do not want to press this point too far——

Chairman.

9934. What I understand Sir Elliot to say is that he accepts the statement at the conclusion of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report?—That is what I say.

Sir Henry Craik.

9935. I think, Sir Elliot, you put rather a strong interpretation on it in the words I quoted from your evidence as showing that you now thought that you doubted when you went out to India whether ultimately we were to remain responsible for India, or that ultimately India should be entirely separate, and you thought that now that point had been cleared up?—I did not mean entirely separate from England. If I said that I made a mistake. In fact, you will see my definition of responsible government is that India is to remain a unit of the British Empire.

Chairman.

9936. You mean self-government within the Empire?—Quite so; self-government within the Empire.

Sir Henry Craik.

9937. But you will not define that?—It is very difficult; I quite see your point.

9938. I am going to take you to another point, because that is a point we might enlarge upon to any extent. You spoke of the relations of the Civil Service in India to the Ministers. You are to some extent familiar, no doubt, with the relations of the Civil Service to the Ministers here in England?—Yes.

9939. You know that a Civil servant in England has constantly to serve, and to serve with equal loyalty, Ministers who hold diametrically opposite views?—Yes.

9940. And that the members of the Civil Service here have never found any difficulty in doing so?—Yes.

9941. These divisions at home consist, if they do exist at all, of theoretical divisions of opinion, but never on questions where conscience would be involved?—Yes.

9942. If such a difference did arise in the English Service, where conscience was involved between the permanent public servant and a Minister, the permanent public servant would be obliged, of course, to give in his resignation?—Yes.

9943. And all who have served in the public service know that matters will on occasions arise where that is necessary?—Yes.

9944. But there is a great safeguard in public opinion here and in the necessary publicity which would be given to the circumstances in the case of such a breach?—Yes.

9945. Do you think there is such support of the Civil Servant where a case of conscience arises in India either from public opinion or from publicity? Do you think if a case of conscience arises in the case of an Indian permanent servant he would have the same protection of necessarily widely expressed public opinion or wide publicity?—No; there certainly would not be the same protection afforded in that way.

9946. Now, with regard to the Civil Servant at home; you know, on the one hand, although the Civil Servant at home is obliged to show absolute loyalty to the Minister, on the other hand he demands, and always obtains from the Minister at home the most absolute loyalty and support in public?—Yes.

9947. Under no circumstances, whatever error may be committed, is it consistent with the honour of an English Minister ever to betray or to give up his permanent servant serving under him?—No.

9948. Do you think that the public servant in India would have the same guarantee, or could appeal to the same sense as the public servant does to his Minister in England?—No; I do not think so, and that is why I suggest, as I did just now, that support should be given in the matter.

9949. Now, with regard to the Members of the Indian Civil Service serving in native States, I presume if any difficulty did arise they have always this security that they can at any moment they please throw up their appointment in the native State and return and resume their place in the ranks of the Civil Service at home?—Yes; unless they are bound by contract for a certain period.

9950. If a breach comes they have always to fall back upon their appointment in the Government Service?—Yes.

Chairman.

9951. They are not always in the Government Service, are they?—Nearly always.

Sir Henry Craik.

9952. The vast majority of them are. I have just one more question. You said you were in favour of a residential qualification for the candidate for the Legislative Council?—Yes.

9953. That seems to us here a very natural requirement. We have had a great deal of evidence to show that it is opposed. To what do you attribute the motive of opposing this residential qualification? Why is it desired to have any residential qualification?—I believe the reason to be that it is apprehended there will not be the sort of man they want in the district, or unit, whom whom they would like to have appointed to the Legislative Council.

9954. In other words, very frequently, in country districts, there will be a great danger that the person who will come forward and claim their votes will be a man from the towns, who has no residential qualification at all?—Yes.

9955. You think that the motive of opposing, that is to give greater opportunities to what we, in England, call the carpet-bagger?—That is so.

Mr. Montagu.

9956. Sir Elliot, at what period of your service did you leave Bengal?—I left Bengal in 1897.

9957. After about thirteen years' service?—After about fourteen years' service.

9958. And since then I think you told Lord Selborne the whole of your experience has been either in the native States or British territory adjoining?—Entirely in the native States since then; but, as I mentioned, I have always had some British territory to deal with. Ajmer is not quite like a Province; but it enabled me to know what was going on in the British Provinces, because I got all the papers on the subject, and was able to appreciate what the political developments were.

9959. I want to be quite clear that I understand your proposal about the Civil Servants. You do not suggest that a Civil Servant should be a candidate for the Legislative Council until he retires, but you do suggest that he should be allowed to retire in order to stand: Is that it?—Yes. I was speaking of the members of the subordinate Civil Service. I meant to say that he should be allowed to stand, and that if he is elected he should be allowed to retire. That is what I meant.

9960. Then you expressed yourself very forcibly, in answer to Lord Sydenham, against weakening the Government of India?—Yes.

9961. It really all turns on the word "weakening," does it not?—Would you regard it as weakening the Government of India, for instance, to bring to it a more authoritative expression of Indian opinion, so far as it exists?—No; but I think you will get that expression of opinion on the existing Legislative Council, or something corresponding to it.

9962. I am right in thinking that there are 27 elected members of the Legislative Council now?—Yes.

9963. And I am right in thinking that Simla is not one of the liveliest, or most populated parts of India?—No; but the elected members will be deputed from the Province, of course.

Mr. Montagu—continued.

9964. The whole representation of India depends at present, while the Government of India is at Simla, on 27 elected members?—Yes.

9965. Does that satisfy you, and would you regard increasing that number as weakening the Government of India? Would it not strengthen it?—If it enabled them to swamp the Government of India, it would weaken the Government of India.

9966. Is not the Government stronger the more it knows the wishes of the people whom it governs?—Yes; but it will have every opportunity of knowing that from what goes on in the Provinces.

9967. They are rather a long way off?—No; the Government of India knows every day what goes on.

9968. By telegrams, do you mean?—By telegrams.

9969. And by letters?—Yes.

9971. Not until then?—Not until then.

9972. There is no real harmony, is there, between yours and any scheme which has yet been presented from India, because the Local Governments, whom you quote as supporting, deliberately adopt their scheme with a view to avoiding that diarchy which they think is dangerous and undesirable, while you adopt their scheme with a view to postponing diarchy for ten years?—I think I am in agreement with at least two of the Provincial Governors about that. If I remember right, Sir Benjamin Robertson said he wished dualism to come later possibly, and I think that is also the view of Sir Michael O'Dwyer.

9973. Anyhow, your view is that diarchy must come?—Quite so.

9974. But it is a thing which you would like to postpone for ten years?—Yes.

9975. Then I suppose you would hope that it would last a very short time?—No, I think it would last a long time before a complete transfer was made.

9976. But the friction which you said to Lord Sydenham must come from diarchy, the difference of point of view, will be less, you think, ten years hence?—It will be much less after we have had ten years in which to prepare for it.

Chairman.] We are very much obliged to you, Sir Elliot.

(The Witness is directed to withdraw.)

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Duke of NORTHUMBERLAND.	Mr. BENNETT.
Earl of SELBORNE.	Sir HENRY CRAIK.
Lord BRODRICK (Viscount Midleton).	Mr. MONTAGU.
Lord ISLINGTON.	Mr. SPOOR.
Lord SYDENHAM.
Lord SINHA.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF SELBORNE IN THE CHAIR.

MR. WARDLAW MILNE (Bombay Chamber of Commerce); MR. M. DE P. WEBB (Karachi Chamber of Commerce); and SIR BERNARD HUNTER (Madras Chamber of Commerce), are called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

9977. You, gentlemen, represent the Chambers of Commerce of Bombay, Madras, and Karachi?—(Mr. Milne) Yes.

9978. And you have been good enough to furnish us with a memorandum?—Yes.

Chairman—continued.

VIEWS OF THE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE BOMBAY, MADRAS, AND KARACHI CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE, AS JOINTLY AGREED AT THEIR MEETING AT THE INDIA OFFICE ON THURSDAY, OCTOBER 9th.

1. The representatives regret that at the time their respective Chambers communicated with them these bodies bodies were not in possession of copies of the Bill, and could not, therefore, forward detailed instructions as to the evidence which they might have desired to give. In these circumstances the representatives have contented themselves with dealing with such points as are likely to arise if and when any such Bill as that now under consideration becomes law, but it is desired to emphasise that the absence in their instructions of any reference to a number of main principles should not be taken as an indication that these bodies are of necessity in agreement with or in favour of the Bill. In this connection we desire to draw the attention of the Committee to the views which have already been expressed in India by the Chambers at the various stages of the Reforms scheme.

2. The following are some of the questions which arise, and upon which the Chambers desire more particularly to put forward their views for the consideration of the Joint Select Committee:—

Ports.—The Chambers consider that the major ports, namely, Calcutta, Bombay, Madras, Karachi, Aden, Rangoon, Chittagong, and Vizagapatam, should be under the Government of India, but that the administration should be left in the hands of the existing administrative bodies, over whom Government control should be reduced to the minimum, thus giving them the widest possible discretion in the development of their respective ports.

B. That all minor ports should be under the Provincial Governments, and be reserved subjects, but that the possibility of it being necessary at some future time for a minor port to be declared a major port, should be borne in mind.

We understand that the Bengal Chamber would prefer that all ports, whether major or minor, should be treated as Government of India subjects.

Light and Feeder Railways.—The Chambers urge that light and feeder railways should be treated as a Government of India subject, and not left to Provincial control. The Chambers are of opinion that the Railway Board being in control of the main lines alone, with subsidiary railways under different control, might lead to a most undesirable conflict of policies. In nearly all cases such subsidiary railways are dependent on the main lines both for working and traffic arrangements, and it is felt that it would be very difficult to make suitable terms or come to agreements with the main lines if the light railways were not under the same authority.

Inland Waterways.—The Chambers are of opinion that the navigable waterways of India should be controlled by a Central Waterways Board, the actual executive work being carried out by Provincial Waterways Trusts acting also as advisory bodies to the Board. Under the Southborough Committee's proposals, the inland waterways would be treated as Government of India subjects to an extent to be declared by or under Indian Legislation, and that otherwise they should be Provincial and reserved subjects. The view of the Chambers is that questions affecting navigable rivers are essentially of an inter-provincial nature, and it is conceivable that the activities of one Province in respect of a particular waterway might be nullified by the actions or apathy of its neighbour over whose policy it would have no control. While it is true that under the proposals of the Southborough Committee the Governor-General in Council would have power under the rules to define the extent to which inland waterways should be all Indian, the Chambers would prefer to see their proposal of a Central Waterways Board given effect to rather than to leave it to the Government of India to take over from a Province the control of a river which might have seriously suffered in the meantime owing to Provincial neglect.

Development of Industries, Industrial Research and Technical Education.—The Chambers entirely agree with the views of the Government of India as set out in paragraph No. 116. of the despatch dated 16th April, 1919, which are briefly that the development of industries should be concurrently undertaken by Local Governments and the Government of India, and that this subject should, so far as Local Governments are concerned, be reserved. The Chambers desire to add that in their opinion the proposed government by Ministries is by way of experiment, and that the great industries of India are of far too important a nature to be made the subject of any experimental form of government. If such an experiment must be made it should be limited to less important subjects, and the Chambers are naturally apprehensive of the harm that may be done to commerce and industry by unwise legislation, prejudiced taxation, and inefficient administration.

Representation of European Interests.—The Chambers desire to urge that the representation in this respect set out in the Report of the Southborough Franchise Committee should be the absolute minimum, and that there should be at least eight Europeans in the Indian Legislative Assembly and two in the Council of State.

J. S. Wardlaw Milne.

(For the Bombay Chamber of Commerce.)

Approved by:—M. de P. Webb, for the Karachi Chamber; Sir Bernard Hunter, for the Madras Chamber.

9979. There are one or two questions I should like to ask you about that. In the first place, you put on record that you are not authorised to speak generally in respect to the Bill, because the Chambers you represent had not seen the Bill when you received your instructions?—That is so.

9980. I note what you say, that it does not follow from that that they approve of everything that is in the Bill. You draw our attention particularly to certain questions. The first is in reference to the ports. The proposal at present emanating from the Functions Committee is that ports declared to be major ports by rule or under Indian legislation should be central subjects, and that ports except such ports as may be declared by rule or by or under Indian legislation to be major ports should be provincial subjects, and that those minor ports which are provincial subjects should be reserved. That is the present proposal, and I understand that is exactly what you yourselves suggest, or something very like it?—Something very like it. We suggest that certain definite ports should be laid down as major ports, and that there should be the possibility of minor ports being declared major ports at some future time. The necessity for that should be borne in mind. We further suggest that these major ports should not only be laid down now, but that they should be Central Government subjects; that the minor ports should be provincial subjects and reserved.

9981. That is the proposal?—I have drawn attention here to the fact that the Bengal Chamber, which unfortunately is not represented to-day, would prefer all ports to be Government of India subjects, as against the views of the other Chambers.

9982. As regards the inland waterways, you make a suggestion of your own that they should be contributed by a Central Board?—That is so.

9983. Not by the Provincial Governments or by the Central Government, but by a Central Board under the Government of India?—Yes.

9984. What are your reasons for withdrawing inland navigation altogether from the Provincial Governments?—Our idea is that what is required is a Central Board under the Government of India controlling all the inland waterways, because inland waterways are largely inter-provincial subjects in the first place.

9985. Why do you want the interposition of a board?—We consider that a board working, if I may use the analogy, on the same lines as the Railway Board under the Government of India is the simplest method of working inland waterways.

9986. You take the analogy of the Railway Board and apply that to the waterways?—Yes. I have no authority to make that analogy, but that occurs to me as a possible analogy. We further say that the local bodies should act as advisory bodies to the Central Board in addition to doing the actual administrative work of their own waterways.

9987. Then you propose that industrial development should be a Government of India subject?—Yes; we press that.

9989. "Central subjects to develop all industries in cases where such development by the central authority is declared by order of the Governor-General in Council expedient in the public interest." Development of industries including industrial research and technical education would be provincial subjects and transferred?—Yes. Against that we press that the Government of India's proposal should be adopted—that is to say, that the development of industries should be undertaken concurrently by the Central Government and by the Provincial Governments, and that where it is a Provincial Government subject it should certainly be reserved and not transferred.

9990. We have had a great deal of evidence here to the effect that, whether rightly or wrongly, the impression prevails largely in India that the Government of India has not done in the past all that it might do for industrial development. Do you share that view?—I think we do.

9991. And, therefore, these witnesses of whom I am speaking have urged very strongly that it should be made a transferred subject in the Provinces so far as possible, with a view of giving greater encouragement?—I fear we do not think that that would be the remedy for the present state of discontent. We do not think that transferring it in the case of the Provincial Governments is the remedy.

9992. What do you think would be the remedy?—The remedy, it seems to us, would be a more active organisation in the Government of India, more sympathetic interest from the Government of India. Our feeling is that the industries of India are much too important to be transferred at the present stage to what is practically an experimental Government.

9993. You do not say anything, I think, in your memorandum about industrial matters, the development of industries, factories, settlement of labour disputes, electricity and boilers, gas, welfare of labour, including provident funds, industrial insurance, general health, and accidents and housing. The proposal of the Functions Committee is that all those should be Provincial subjects, but reserved, and subject, as to factories, settlement of labour disputes, electricity and boilers, to Indian legislation. You do not say anything about that?—No; I have no instructions on those points.

9994. One witness has represented to us strongly his view that so far as these matters concern the welfare of labour, they should be transferred, and not reserved. I think his argument was that labour organisations would develop in India on the western model, and that it is very much better for the Provincial Governments that the Legislative Council should deal with them rather than that the Governor and the Executive Council should deal with these labour problems. Are you prepared to express any opinion about that?—On behalf of the Chamber I cannot express any opinion. My own view would be entirely to agree with that, but that is merely my personal view. I do not know even what my colleagues may feel about it.

9995. I do not know whether they would be good enough to say?—(Sir Bernard Hunter.) I should prefer to see that left as a reserved subject. So long as law and order is a reserved subject I think it is neecssary that the labour disputes, and things of that description, should come under the same Government. (Mr. Webb.) I am inclined to share Sir Bernard Hunter's views.

Mr. Bennett.

9996. The European Chambers of Commerce have for many years been regarded as a very valuable embodiment of public opinion, have they not—they have been looked upon as a sound, practical, and moderate order of men?—(Mr. Milne.) I think we may claim that.

9997. There have been occasions when some of the Chambers of Commerce have even been accepted as interpreting, even more than the commerical interests of their place, the moderate practical opinion of their community?—That is so.

9998. Would you be content that the Chambers of Commerce should be accepted as representing European opinion as such, or would you prefer a special representation of public opinion, a communal representation of public opinion outside the Chambers. Do you think that necessary?—Speaking for the Bombay Chamber I think there is no doubt that the Bombay Chamber realise that there is an electorate outside the Chambers which requires representation, although they also realise that the largest interests of Europeans in India are trade and commerce, which are represented by the Chambers.

9999. Do your colleagues take that same view?—(Sir Bernard Hunter.) Do I understand that special electorates of the Chambers are to be done away with, and only communal European representation given?

10000. No, not to be done away with, it is suggested in addition?—Then I agree. (Mr. Webb.) I think such additional representation is essential. There are large bodies of traders which are not members of the Chambers; especially the small traders' trades associations.

10001. With regard to the industries, your opinion seems to be in favour of an exclusive concentration of control over the development of industries in the Central Government?—(Mr. Milne.) Oh no, not exclusively so.

10002. Would you be in favour of leaving as much of the development of industries to Provincial Governments as is compatible with the due oversight and co-ordination of that policy by the Government of India?—What we feel, if I may explain, is that this subject ought to be taken concurrently, because there are two sides to it. The Government of India in charge of development of industries will be able to engage a higher standard of expert, for example, than Provincial Governments alone could do; also, there is the danger that if it is entirely left to Provincial Governments there will be almost competition, if one may use that word, between the different Governments, overlapping, and consequent waste of energy. On the other hand we think there are certain industries which Provincial Governments can best deal with, and we certainly do not want them to be excluded from very active development of their own provincial industries, but we feel that oversight by the Central Government is necessary.

10003. You are entirely in favour of the Government of India view?—We are entirely in favour of the Government of India view; also in connection with technical education.

10005. But is it not likely that that will be discouraged if the entire control of these minor railways is left to the Government of India, as the main lines are?—I do not think that that is necessarily the case. The proposals would naturally pass through the Provincial Governments, and the Provincial Governments would be actively interested in developing those railways. Still, the fact of taking the control away entirely from the Government of India would mean that you would have a divergence between the views of the Government of India, as controlling the main lines, and the Provincial Governments as controlling the feeder lines, while the two sets of enterprise cannot be independent of each other.

10006. Would you contend that it must be either all or nothing between the Government of India and the Provincial Governments? Would not the initiative be with the Provincial Authorities, and of course an ultimate co-ordinating authority would be exercised by the Government of India?—I think that would come about in any case.

10007. It is a desirable end?—Yes. I do not think our proposals would stop that in any way.

10008. Have you found in Bombay, for instance, a suspicion that the Government of India is not too rapid in settling proposals for these local lines?—That is distinctly so.

10009. Sometimes they have shown a strange want of cordiality in the matter—it has been thought so?—It has been reported to us that that is so.

10010. Have you ever heard of an enterprising Bombay capitalist going to Simla, and being told by the Minister

Mr. Bennett—continued.

Minister in charge of railways that he hated promoters?—I have no knowledge of that.

10011. You do not know that? You have not found hatred of promoters?—I have no personal knowledge of that.

10012. You recognise the advantage of doing as much as possible to encourage the finding of local capital for local railway developments?—Certainly.

10013. And, with that object, giving the Provincial Governments as much initiative as possible?—Certainly.

Lord Islington.

10014. Do the Chambers of Commerce, which you are here to represent, represent European enterprise and Indian, or exclusively European?—Not exclusively European, but largely European.

10015. Preponderatingly European?—Distinctly so.

10016. I gather from the answers which you have just given to Mr. Bennett that you, broadly speaking, regard the most effective way of promoting industries through India as through a central organisation?—Central and Provincial.

10017. A Central and a Provincial organisation?—Yes.

10018. How are you going effectively and satisfactorily to demarcate what is to be done Provincially and what is to be done from the centre?—Our proposal amounts to this, if I may explain it—that in the Provincial Governments what will probably arise will be a director of industries in each Province, who will initiate and look after the development of local industries. You will have also the Central Government, with an overriding controlling director of industries, or department of industries, or whatever it may be called, who will co-ordinate the work of all these Provincial directors.

10019. When you say co-ordinate the work, do you mean control the work?—Yes, to some extent control it.

10020. I want to get at to what extent?—Of course it has never been done. One can only deal with what is likely to happen, but I think to say to control it is not too strong. Then the questions of research and other matters which are essentially a part of industrial development can, in our opinion, better be carried out by the Central Government, at any rate in the first stages, than by the Provincial Governments.

10021. The initiative being taken by the Central Government?—The initiative would probably come from the Provincial Governments.

10022. But the work being carried out and controlled by the Central Government?—Yes.

10023. Scientific institutions, for instance, in Madras would be constructed and controlled from the centre, not locally?—Yes.

10024. Do you think that is the best plan?—I think so for this reason: that in the case of the Provincial Governments working all independently there would be danger, as it were, of competition between one Province and another. There would be a danger of one Province getting an expert on a certain subject and another Province getting another expert, and in that way waste of time, waste of money and waste of enterprise.

10025. I suppose you would not object to a healthy competition as between one Province and another, would you?—Oh, no, there is no objection to that.

10026. It would be to the advantage of the development of industry?—Distinctly, I think.

10027. What you really want is you would like to see the demarcation made very clear in regard to the control that should be allotted to a Provincial Government in its relation to the control of the Central Government?—Distinctly.

10028. Do you wish to see more control on the part of the Provincial Government in the future than has hitherto been the case in regard to industries?—May I ask, do you mean in the control of industries?

10029. Yes, in the development and control of them. Do you wish to see the Provincial Government given more authority in that direction in the future than has hitherto been the case?—Surely, if I may say so, there is a great difference between development and control. I cannot in my own mind—I may be wrong; I have not consulted my colleagues about this—put the two things together. With regard to the development of industries, there cannot be too much enterprise on the part of both the Central and the Provincial Governments. Control of industry is quite another matter. Control of existing industry is a point we are not really touching on in this connection.

10030. No, but it is an important one, is it not?—Quite.

10031. Assuming that there should be some kind of control?—May I ask what is meant by control? Do you mean the control of existing industries?

10032. Yes, the control which is necessary in the interests of the public as distinguished from the company concerned?—Such as administration of the existing Acts,, Factory Acts and labour?

10033. That the general consumer should be protected in accordance with existing Acts?—We quite agee, but that control could be carried out by the Provincial Governments.

10034. That is what I am asking. I am not laying down anything myself. I am asking you what you would like to see as representing the Chambers of Commerce?—I only wanted to get the point quite clear in order to answer it correctly; I think that that could be quite well carried out by the Provincial Governments.

10035. Therefore you would like to see local control over a concern when it started in the hands of the Local Government?—Yes.

10036. But all the operations connected with the starting of an industry, or most of them, in the hands of the Central Government?—In the hands of both. That is to say, certain functions in the hands of the Central Government and certain functions in the hands of the Provincial Governments. We want, in fact, a co-ordination of the work of development of industry all over the country.

10037. In starting a new enterprise, of course, you will want capital assured, will you not? You will want to secure capital?—Yes.

10039. As a business man, looking to the starting of a new enterprise, would you say you would be able to get a new enterprise started successfully and rapidly better by means of assistance from and general intervention by the Government of India, or through the commercial department of the India Office? I will put it that way?—I think that would largely depend upon the nature of the industry. I think the development of industries as we see it—here I am speaking personally—would be largely an Indian matter, and the Government of India would be all-sufficient. I think the requirement of help at the start from the Home Government would only apply in certain industries. But here I am giving my own view. I have no instructions about it.

10040. You are not prepared to give any very decided view?—I have no instructions on the point.

10041. Now, as regards the co-operation with Indians in commercial enterprise and industrial enterprise of the future, I suppose your Chambers regard it as of the first importance to co-operate in every possible way with Indians and to induce them to come into industries with you?—Most undoubtedly.

10042. Would you prefer to see in the future new industries started and carried out and capitalised by the joint efforts of Europeans and Indians?—Distinctly.

10043. That being the case and regarding the whole political situation, do not your Chambers consider that in this new development of government the Indians should have a very definite voice in the proceedings?—I have no definite mandate from the Chambers to speak on that point. My own view is that all the Chambers would welcome development in that respect in India and expect it.

10044. You do not desire to see industries a transferred subject, do you?—No, not at all.

10045. You would like that to be a reserved subject?—Yes.

10046. Would your Chambers be very averse to seeing that subject controlled by the combined effort of both branches of the new Governments, assuming that they came into existence?—That point has not been before us, but speaking for myself, I do not think that they would object. They object to the idea that industries should be made purely a transferred subject, because, as I have said, they consider that the transferring of such subjects is an experiment, and they consider that industries are too important to be experimented with. Provided that there is no danger in the experiment, they would not object to any transfer. They consider that danger exists.

10047. You are prepared to say that you would welcome in every way the co-operation both in the management and control of Indians?—Yes.

Lord Sinha.

10048. You have noticed in the list of the Functions Committee that central agencies and institutions of research and for professional or technical training or promotion of special study are made a central subject. That is left for the Government of India?—Yes, we have noticed that with appreciation.

10049. Beyond that do you desire anything further to be left to the Government of India?—We think there are still functions which should be left to the Government of India beyond that, though there are very important ones.

10050. Supposing there are institutions or agencies for research for purely Provincial industries, you would not advocate control by the Government of India over such agencies, would you?—No, we would not advocate that, but I cannot at this moment realise how there would be necessity of research which would be peculiar to one Province except in very special circumstances.

10051. In so far as they are not peculiar to any Province it would be undertaken by central agencies, would it not?—Yes.

10052. And the whole of that under the scheme proposed would be under the Government of India. Does not that satisfy the requirements which you postulate?—It satisfies them as far as research is concerned.

10053. Also agencies for professional or technical training or promotion of special studies so far as they are to be central, that is to say, so far as they interest the whole of India, are to be left with the Government of India, and it is only, I take it, what concerns an individual Province or at any rate one Province more than another, that will be left to the Provincial Governments. Is not that exactly what you advocate yourself?—If I may so say, do not the last few words rather alter it again—one Province more than another? That is rather a different thing from what concerns one Province alone. If one can conceive research which can possibly affect only one Province in India, and cannot interest any other, it is manifest there could be no objection to that Province carrying out that research; but when it comes to concerning one more than another, that is just the very point where, speaking for Bombay, we consider the Central Government should come in.

10054. Would not that rest very much upon the nature of the subject, or as to how many Provinces or what Provinces it concerned?—I think it would.

10056. So far as technical education is concerned, and apart from what is provided in that article which I read to you, technical training and promotion of technical studies, it is a matter well known and of general complaint, is it not, that the Government of India has done very little for the promotion of technical education?—I have heard it very generally said.

10057. Do you agree?—I am afraid I am not in a position to give a personal opinion on a matter of that kind.

10058. I think you told Lord Islington that you welcomed co-operation in matters of industry and commerce generally as between Indians and Europeans?—Yes.

10059. And I think in Bombay particularly you have got that now?—We have it, yes.

10060. Have you any reason to apprehend that that co-operation would not exist in matters of politics?—None whatever.

10061. May I take it then that the view generally of commercial and mercantile people in India is that a generous scheme of reform will promote the spirit of co-operation between Indians and Europeans in India?—I am afraid I cannot answer for the mercantile opinion of India. I can only answer that in a personal way because we have no instructions.

10062. I should like very much to have your own personal opinion?—My own personal opinion is that reform and progress is necessary and will promote that. I am not prepared to say that this particular scheme will necessarily promote that, at any rate, at once.

10063. But do you know of any other scheme which will promote it better than this one?—I am afraid we are not in a position to put forward alternative schemes nor do I wish it to be understood that we condemn this scheme. I merely say that the attitude of the Bombay Chamber has been that this scheme goes rather further than they would have gone originally, and that the development of the Government of India, the popularising of the Government of India as it exists at present, possibly would have been a better move at the present time. But they also appreciate that it was desirable and necessary that a move should be made, and they are not prepared to condemn this or any other scheme which is put forward to that end.

10064. May I take that to be the opinion of your colleagues also, Mr. Webb and Sir Bernard Hunter?—(Sir Bernard Hunter.) The opinion of Madras is adverse to the proposed diarchy. They fear that that will increase the racial troubles at present. They would much prefer to see a more gradual development, more or less on the present lines. (Mr. Webb.) The Karachi Chamber approve generally of the scheme of constitutional reform, and they do not fear in the least that trade is likely to suffer under the proposals.

10065. Now I want to ask a general question: Have any of you gentlemen noticed any tendency on the part of capital to be scared from India by reason of the proposed reforms?—(Mr. Milne.) Up to this date, do you refer to?

10066. Yes?—I have no knowledge of it. (Sir Bernard Hunter.) I think it is quite impossible to draw any conclusions in view of the general abnormal conditions. Capital has not been able to go to India on account of exchange difficulties, even for ordinary trade, quite apart from industrial enterprise. (Mr. Webb.) I know of no difficulties up to the present.

10067. Is it not a matter of fact that at the present moment many English companies are thinking of setting up in India?—(Mr. Milne.) I do not know.

10068. And large English capital?—I do not know.

10069. I understand they have been discussing this scheme for the last two years?—I do not know of that.

Mr. Montagu.

10070. What are the prospects in your own Province in industrial development, apart from English capital? Is there plenty of capital available?—Indian capital do you refer to?

10071. Yes?—There has been plenty of capital available of recent years.

10072. Is that a new phenomenon?—No, it is increasing. It has been increasing gradually in years past as industry is becoming more popular in the Indian mind.

10073. Are there any cases of inter-provincial industrial activity? When you were answering questions just now I seemed to infer that you thought as soon as a particular subject went beyond a particular Province the only alternative to Provincial action was Government of India action. Are there any instances in the past, let us say of Bengal, Madras, or Bombay, or other Provinces concerned meeting together to discuss inter-provincial matters?—I do not know that I can quote cases in which they have met together at all, but I certainly know of cases in which industries are common to more than one Province and in which possible competition in the early stages between these Provinces is undesirable

10074. It is not controversial, this question. I only want to ask you this: Cannot provincial competition be cured by inter-provincial action, three or four or two or three provinces meeting together to decide on common action, or if there is more than one province involved must it be the Government of India that has to take action?—I do not myself see any objection to a system by which the provinces combine at all if such a scheme be workable. Hitherto in such cases we have known of no method of working except through the Government of India.

10075. With regard to inland waterways is there any existing organisation of inland waterways in India at all?—Not that I know of.

10076. It would be an entirely new thing to make use of inland waterways?—Not to make use of them.

10077. To organise them for use?—With a Central Board such as we have suggested it is quite new.

10078. Provincial boards are in contemplation?—Yes.

10079. They do not exist at present. Now what exactly is it that you visualise by this step in development of industries? It is partly, of course, technical education; it is partly, of course, industrial research. Now, apart from that, what is it that the men in charge of the Development of Industries Department will have to do?—You refer to the provinces?

10080. Yes?—I think the Director of Industries' work, to give him such a title, in the provinces, will largely be in connection with those points you have mentioned. Industrial research, experiment, model factories, and generally the working out of the possible industrial development of such Government departments as exist, such as Forests and that kind of thing. I think on those lines alone he will have a very large field.

10081. But you do not visualise him as being concerned with the raising of capital, do you?—No. I do not visualise that at all.

10082. There has been no industrial development department, has there, in any province up to the present?—Not until recently.

10083. Is there now?—There is a Director of Industries in Bombay at the present moment, I understand. —(Sir Bernard Hunter.) There has been for many years in Madras.

10084. What does he do?—(Sir Bernard Hunter.) Experimental industries. He started an aluminium industry, and after that proved satisfactory it was turned into a public company, and chrome tanning of leather, and other things, and he took up very largely the well irrigation by mechanical power.

10085. Is the Director of Industry in Madras a Civil Servant?—The first Director was a member of the Educational Service. We have had several who have been members of the Civil Service. (Mr. Milne.) In Bombay the present holder, I think, is an Indian Civil Servant.

10086. I do not suppose you can give me an expression of the official view on this subject, but I should be very interested to know whether you think there is any prospect if provision were made for it under the new Bill of a gentleman of Indian commercial experience, who was a member of one of the Chambers of Commerce, agreeing to become a member of the Governor's Executive Council; or in the alternative, if he were a member of the Legislative Council, agreeing to become a Minister?—(Mr. Milne.) Do I understand your question to be whether there is a likelihood of such a person accepting such an appointment.

10087. Yes, provided it was possible under the Bill?—I think so, certainly, speaking personally merely.

10088. Supposing there was in Bombay an Indian gentleman or an English gentleman of commercial experience in the Ministry, would not he be likely to be a better Director of Industries than a Civil Servant?—I cannot conceive that a person in the position that you state could possibly fulfil the functions of a Director of Industries as I visualise the Director of Industries; but I have no objection to the statement that either a European or an Indian who is capable of being a Minister, such as proposed in the Bill, would be better than anybody else. It is quite possible he might be, but I cannot conceive that a person who would be qualified for such a position would become Director of Public Industries.

10089. He might have the Director of Public Industries under him?—Yes.

10090. But he would be better qualified by his experience to look after the development of industries than an official?—He might be better qualified; I do not know that I could say that he would be better qualified. It is purely a personal matter.

10091. Perhaps I have in mind the controversy about business men in the Government here. To go further, would your objection to the transfer of the development of industries be affected at all by the presence in the Government of a man of business experience?—No, it would not be affected at present.

10092. Supposing the development of industry were a transferred subject, it would follow that there would be no expenditure on the development of industry which was not approved by the Legislative Council. Is that one of the reasons why you object to its being transferred?—No; as far as I know that point has not been considered at all. Our reason is exactly what we have stated, that we consider that the government by Ministers is too much in the nature of an experiment to trust industries to it at once, at any rate.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

10093 Lord Sinha asked you whether you had noticed certain tendencies in regard to commerce in the last two or three years. Would you consider the position commercially of India has been normal during the last two or three years?—It has been very far from normal.

10094. In regard to past experience, having regard to the increasing interference with, or absorption of, commercial pursuits by the Government here, do you think it is likely that in India in future the commercial community will be more dependent or less dependent on the Government than they have been up to now?—I find great difficulty in answering that. In some ways one hopes it will be more dependent; in many ways one hopes it will be less dependent. I do not think the Chambers look with equanimity to the Government taking a very active interest in commerce as commerce, but they look to the Government taking a very active interest in the development of new industries, which is quite a different matter.

10095. You consider it more advantageous to commercial men to manage their own affairs than to have them taken over by the Government?—That is personally my view, and, I think, the general view.

10096. At the same time you recognise that there is a tendency for the Government to shoulder some of the burden with regard to commerce, which may affect the commercial world differently from the past?—Do you refer to this country, or to India? In this country I recognise that that is so.

10097. Now that peace is restored and India is, I believe, prosperous, would you look to a considerable commercial development in the near future?—I do.

10098. You represent European Chambers of Commerce. Am I to understand there are really two distinct commercial communities in India—Indians and Europeans?—I do not know that I can say there are distinct communities. In the first place, the Bombay Chamber of Commerce, which I represent, is not purely a European Chamber. As I mentioned before, the members are largely European, but there are Indian members and foreign members; and that applies, perhaps not quite to the same extent, to almost all the Chambers in India.

10099. The reason why I ask is that it has been suggested by some witnesses here that there has been a really serious decline in Indian industries, and the evidence we have had from other quarters has been rather contrary to that. What I wanted to know was were there really two distinct communities. They may meet and merge in an organisation as you express it in Bombay, but can you divide the commercial life of India into two sections?—I do not know that you can divide it into two sections, but I think I can agree that there are two distinct communities. In Bombay in addition to the Bombay Chamber of Commerce, which includes Indian and foreign members, there is also an Indian Chamber—exclusively Indian.

10100. There appears to be one point of agreement according to your evidence this morning and the evidence we had yesterday, and that is with regard to the fact that the Government of India in the past has not done enough in the interests of commercial development?—I, personally, feel that very strongly.

10101. That opinion was expressed here yesterday, too. But still you tell us that it would be wise to leave in the hands of the Government of India the future of industries?—A measure of control over the development of new industries, yes.

10102. Would not you agree it is very much in the interests of the Indian people themselves that their industries should be developed, and that they are likely to put into that work the necessary amount of energy, and certainly that they possess the capacity to do it themselves?—I think they are putting increasing energy into it, but I think they want direction.

10103. Would you agree with the evidence we had yesterday that there has been a decline of Indian industries?—No, I do not agree with that.

10104. Would you agree that there is really more poverty in India to-day, and that there has been an increase in poverty?—I do not think that is true.

10105. I do not know whether you were present when the evidence of Sir Sankaran Nair was given?—No, I was not.

10106. You state in your memorandum here regarding this question of the development of industries, that the industries are far too important a thing to be made the subject of any experimental form of government. By that, of course, you simply mean they are too important to be handed over to an Indian Government?—Not entirely. It would not really matter whether it were Indian or European. The point is we think it should be reserved for the present Government until the new form of government is tried and proved.

10107. You go on in the same paragraph to speak of the danger that might follow unwise legislation, prejudiced taxation and inefficient administration. Are you apprehensive that these will follow if this Bill is passed?—We are certainly apprehensive that they may follow, especially in the earlier stages.

10108. I would like to ask you a further question as to your opinion as to what will be the effect in a few years upon British capital invested in India. Some time ago one of the witnesses who attended the Committee suggested that in the course of time as Indian credit improved there would not be a need for British capital, and that the time would probably arrive when British capital would be altogether eliminated. What is your view of that. Do you think there will be a decline?—My personal view is that there will be an increasing amount of Indian capital available, but that there always will be need and welcome for British capital provided the Government is stable.

10109. I would ask you one last question on the industrial conditions in India. In answering Lord Selborne two of your colleagues preferred that the whole question of industrial conditions should be reserved, and you yourself expressed your opinion that it should be transferred. Might I ask you this: Does your Chamber of Commerce do anything in the interests of the industrial worker?—May I say that I expressed an opinion that the control of labour and such questions might well be transferred? It has nothing to do with the development of industries.

10110. No. I am talking about the industrial question, and by that I mean the labour question?—The present Chambers of Commerce, as bodies, have nothing to do with labour questions at all, but individual members, of course, have a great deal to do with them.

10111. What I wanted to get at is this: Is anything done in the way of initiating improvements in the conditions and lot of the Indian workmen?—Individually?

10112. By organisations attached to your Chambers of Commerce?—No directly perhaps by organisations attached, but I know that individually a very great deal is done.

10113. And do you believe that that ameliorative work is on the increase?—Distinctly so. Sir Bernard Hunter can specially speak to that.

Lord Sydenham.

10114. When you speak of the major ports being under Government of India control you do not mean that Provincial Governments should cease to take any interest in them?—Oh, no.

10115. And you would value the pressure which the Provincial Governments may be able to bear upon the Government of India with their greater knowledge of the local requirements?—Certainly.

10116. You wish, of course, to maintain the existing Port Trusts? Do you think that they require more liberty than they now have?—We do.

10117. You would give them greater freedom of action? You wish to impress upon the Committee the necessity of keeping matters of commerce and of industry in the hands of Government at present?—I am afraid I do not quite follow that.

10118. You wish to impress upon the Committee the necessity of keeping matters of commerce and industry for the present under the control of Government?—As reserved subjects, yes we do.

10119. Is not there a difficulty in getting Indians with large experience of these matters into the Legislative Council?—There is a difficulty.

10120. And except in the special electorates do you think they will have much chance of election?—My own feeling is that they would not certainly at first, but I speak personally there.

10121. Does not that difficulty exist in almost all the big municipalities, which cannot get enough men of business capacity and business experience to enter them?—I am afraid I cannot say from my own knowledge.

10122. Can you say, Mr. Webb?—(Mr. Webb.) That is so.

10123 Is not that a reason for the considerable financial trouble into which some of these popularly governed municipalities very frequently get—the want of business experience upon them?—(Mr. Milne.) I cannot myself answer that. (Mr. Webb.) I should think so.

10124. Now with regard to Mr. Montagu's suggestion that there should be a business Minister or a business Executive Councillor, would it not be impossible for men, either Indians or Europeans of large experience, to give up their business work and devote themselves to the rather exhausting task of being Ministers?—(Mr. Milne.) I do not think it would be impossible; I think they would be difficult to find.

10125. But it would be necessary if ever an Indian or a European man of commerce took up that position that he should sever his connection entirely for the time. from his business.

Lord Sinha.] That is not the Bill; the Bill provides for the contrary.

Lord Sydenham.

10126. I want Mr. Milne's opinion?—That point was raised some years ago, to my recollection, and, speaking entirely from recollection, I think the Chambers were in favour of complete severance, but we have noticed that the Bill does not insist upon that.

10127. Do you think it is reasonable, without considerable scandals, that a Minister should have large financial interest in the town in which he lives?—Speaking personally I am of opinion that such a Minister must sever his connection, but I cannot speak for the Chamber, because I have no authority on that point.

10128. You have seen the proposals of the Franchise Committee. Do you think that British interests, commercial and industrial, and Indian commercial and industrial interests, are adequately represented by those franchise proposals?—We have already in the case of Bombay, and I think I may say in the case of all the Chambers, put forward proposals regarding that representation expressing our agreement, if not satisfaction, with the proposals of the Franchise Committee, provided they are not whittled down in any way. These are the minima.

10129. The Indian piece-goods merchants of Bombay have have complained to us that they have been disfranchised. Do you think that they have a grievance in that matter? You know that body?—I know that body. I did not know that they had been disfranchised.

10130. Do you think that they ought to have a representative of their own?—I am not in a position to answer that. I think a great many of these bodies require representation as a general matter, but I cannot refer to a special case.

10131. Sir Thomas Holland said the other day that the Bill has had no depressing effect whatever on the desire of Europeans to extend their commercial and industrial operations. Do you confirm that opinion?—Speaking personally again, I can only say that I do not think there is any evidence one way or the other at the present moment. I think European capital will be forthcoming in the future provided Europeans are satisfied as to the conditions of government. I think there is an apprehension, but I do not say it has had any effect yet.

10132. Do you think that the very serious rebellion in the Punjab lately had any effect in causing anxiety among the European population?—I think it certainly had.

10133. Sir Sankaran Nair spoke yesterday of the increase in poverty in India. I understand you to say that you do not agree with that view at all?—I do not agree with it.

10134 He also spoke of the destruction of Indian industries. I suppose that you would not quite agree with that point of view?—I do not know of any case of the destruction of Indian industries at all.

10135. I suppose he meant the disappearance of the old hand industries of India which, of course, power has disposed of?—To some extent I think that was inevitable; in other cases I do not think they are disappearing; I think there is an increase.

10136. Is it not true that Indian industries and Indian trade have shown enormous expansion since 1858, when the Crown took over the Government of India?—Distinctly.

10137. Is not the gain of this commerce to India shown by the remarkable drain of the precious metals towards India in recent years?—I believe so.

10138. Sir Sankaran Nair told us that Indian industries had not had fair play: Do you think there has been any discrimination on the part of anybody, Provincial Government or Supreme Government, against Indian industries?—No, I do not think there has been any such discrimination.

10139. Do not you think it would be more true to say that the Government in India generally has been impartially unsympathetic to commerce and industry?—I do. (Sir Bernard Hunter.) If I might intervene, it is commonly said that Presidency banks finance only European trade and industries, and ignore the Indian trade. The Indian Press is constantly making that attack, and I can assure this Committee, speaking from inside knowledge of Madras and Bombay, that that is very far from the facts. At least 70 per cent. of the trade advances that are made by those Presidency banks are to Indians and to Indian industrial affairs, and not to Europeans.

10140. We have it in evidence that there are "very large concessions made to English firms which ought to pass into Indian hands, as they have been built up by the Government with Indian money, by taxation." Have you any idea what that statement means?—(Mr. Milne.) I cannot follow it myself. I know of no such case that could be referred to by the speaker. It is very difficult, of course, to answer without knowing exactly what he was referring to.

10141. The particulars were not given to us; but you think at all events it is extraordinarily improbable?—I think it is extremely improbable, if not untrue.

10142. Do you think that the sudden expansion of Indian industries at the expense of agriculture might be a somewhat serious matter, having regard to the general shortage of labour in India and to the overcrowding in the towns?—No, I cannot say that I look upon that as a danger, but I agree that there is great shortage of labour.

10143. On the whole you would rather see a gradual development of the industries of India than a sudden and violent expansion?—I would not object to the sudden development if it were on sound lines, but I do not think it can possibly be sudden and on sound lines. It must be gradual to be on sound lines.

10144. I understand you leave the encouragement of purely local industries in the hands of the Provincial Governments?—Yes.

10146. Do you recollect the opposition to the Factory Act in Bombay at the time it was introduced?—I remember it.

10147. You remember the disastrous failure of the Swadeshi institutions, and the large amount of fraud which was disclosed in that matter?—Yes.

10148. Had that the effect of making Indian capital shy of such undertakings?—Undoubtedly, in my opinion.

10149. Is it not the fact that Indian capital is always readily attracted to British undertakings?—Generally speaking, I think that might be said.

10150. You have told us that in matters of business in Bombay British and Indians work in complete harmony: Does not that happy result happen elsewhere also?—I think so.

10151. It may be said generally, may it not?—Generally of India, as far as I know.

10152. Now, do you think that the reckless propaganda of the Home Rulers during the period of the war has tended to create racial bitterness, which did not exist before?—I do not think it has tended to create racial bitterness between those particular people you have just spoken of, but, generally speaking, undoubtedly so—that is to say, it has created, I think, distinct racial bitterness in the minds of Indians who had no bitterness before. But as regards the educated or largely educated business population, British and Indian, I think they perhaps realise that working together is possible.

10153. It has affected the masses of the people, you think, but has not penetrated or in any way interfered with the relations between commercial men on both sides?—That is my view.

10154. You have noticed the attacks which have been made in some quarters upon the British commercial community?—Yes.

10155. I suppose we may hope that these are only the attacks of the minority?—Yes, I think these are the attacks of a minority, and they are attacks largely from want of knowledge and want of education as to what the European commercial community has done for India. That is a matter that we feel is not perhaps entirely appreciated by the Government itself.

10156. The result of all this propaganda has been to create an atmosphere which is not exactly favourable to the starting in the best conditions of the new régime?—That is so.

10157. Sir Bernard Hunter, is it not the case that the British-owned mills in Madras are among the best managed in India, having regard to the comfort of the workmen?—(Sir Bernard Hunter.) I think there is no question about that whatever. The management of European mills in Madras have taken a special interest in the welfare of their employees. They have started their own schools inside the mills for the half-timers, and they have also provided restaurants for the workers, who get their meals in, provident funds, and generally are working for the benefit of their employees.

10158. Was it not in these mills that there were labour troubles last year?—That is so.

10159. Now do you agree with the European Association in deprecating the too rapid substitution of Indians for Europeans in the Indian Civil Service?—I agree with that.

10160. Do you Mr. Wardlaw Milne?—(Mr. Milne.) Yes, I do.

10161. And you, Mr. Webb?—(Mr. Webb.) Yes.

10162. You all think that this process should be a gradual one?—(Mr. Milne.) Yes, we do.

10163. Do you see any reason for discarding the proposals of the Services Commission in that matter?—I see none.

10164. Do you agree with the European Association again in regarding it as unsafe to weaken the authority of the Central Government at a time when critical experiments are to be made in the Provinces?—I do.

10165. Do you all agree to that?—(Mr. Webb.) Yes. (Sir Bernard Hunter.) Yes.

10166. Do you expect that the passing of this Bill will cause the cessation of agitation in India?—(Mr. Milne.) I do not personally.

10167. You none of you do?—(Mr. Webb.) No. (Sir Bernard Hunter.) No.

10168. But if the agitation should continue with the violence which we have seen, and if further outbreaks like that in the Punjab and elsewhere were to occur, do you not think the credit of India might be seriously affected?—(Mr. Milne.) It is a very difficult question to answer. It might be seriously affected, undoubtedly.

10169. Speaking generally, you would say that the credit of India must depend upon the acknowledged stability of the Government?—Undoubtedly.

Chairman.

10170. I do not quite understand whether you have any definite instructions from your Chambers of Commerce to make any statement to us about the European representation in the Legislative Councils of the Provinces, or in the Legislative Assembly of India?—I have just received the Bombay Chamber's representations made to the Government of India on that subject. But, speaking generally for the Bombay Chamber, they have accepted the proposals, making a special point of the fact that they should not be reduced in any way. I cannot speak for the other Chambers at all. (Mr. Webb.) The Karachi Chamber have pressed for additional representation on the Supreme Council. They have no representation at present. (Sir Bernard Hunter.) I have no definite instructions from the Madras Chamber on this point.

10171. You have nothing you wish to add on this subject?—(Mr. Milne.) No.

Mr. Bennett.

10172. May I ask you, Mr. Wardlaw Milne, a supplementary question? Lord Sydenham asked you about the representation of the Bombay Piece-Goods Association. They complain not only of being themselves disfranchised, but they associate that complaint with the fact that the Ahmedabad Millowners' Association have, I think for the first time, been given a seat. Now you have got a seat for the Ahmedabad Millowners' Association, and a seat for the Bombay Millowners' Association. Do you regard that as an economic distribution of representative power?—(Mr. Milne.) I am afraid I have not gone sufficiently into the question to reply. You are speaking now of the Provincial Council?

10173. Yes?—I think both the present bodies require to be represented, but I do not think that necessarily means that the other body does not also require representation.

10174. The point is this: is there any distinction of interests between the Ahmedabad millowner and the Bombay millowner? They have practically the same interests, have they not?—Their interests must be largely identical. (Mr. Webb.) May I supplement the remarks of Mr. Milne in two respects? With regard to the development of industries, I think the feeling in Karachi is that the more the Government stands aside, and the less control they exercise in the matter, the better. Our feeling is that if the industries of India cannot develop by the energy and enterprise of the Indians and the Europeans in India, no amount of Government assistance will help them. On the subject of the increasing poverty of India I would like to say from my personal experience and observation that I am convinced that India was never richer than it is at the present day, and I should like to add that never in my knowledge has there been so much capital available for investment in India as at the present day.

Lord Sydenham.

10175. May I ask one more question? As regards the representation of the Millowner's Associations, at the present moment Ahmedabad and Bombay have alternative members, have they not?—(Mr. Milne.) I am not very certain as to the most recent arrangement. I think that is the arrangement.

10176. Therefore, their interests being, as you have said, practically identical, there is something to be said for the separate representation of the Bombay Piece-Goods merchants?—I think there is, distinctly.

Chairman.] We are very much obliged to you, gentlemen.

APPENDIX A.

PAPER handed in by Lord Southborough, G.C.B., G.C.M.G., G.C.V.O., on 23rd July, 1919. (See Question 776).

MEMORANDUM ON GOVERNMENT OF INDIA DESPATCH, DATED THE 23RD APRIL, 1919, CONTAINING ITS VIEWS ON THE REPORT OF LORD SOUTHBOROUGH'S COMMITTEE ON FRANCHISE.

General considerations.

The Franchise Committee consisted of two Hindus, one Muhammedan, one European representative of European commercial and non-official interests, and two European officials, with Lord Southborough as Chairman. It had a most difficult task in adjusting the various conflicting claims advanced by separate races, religions, sects, and other interests. It heard voluminous evidence in all provinces, including representatives of all these interests, considered fully the proposals of the Local Governments, and discussed the problems in conference with those Governments. Its report is unanimous, and we deprecate the reopening of any of these difficult problems unless the necessity can be clearly proved. The Government of India did not hear the evidence, and do not seem to realise the dangers and conflicts that will arise from instituting fresh enquiries and upsetting the decisions reached unanimously by the Committee. Some of these decisions are necessarily based on the practical adjustment of delicate conflicting claims, and should be judged from that standpoint and not on theoretical principles alone. Throughout its enquiry the Committee bore in mind the general principles of franchise, and considered the schemes of Local Governments from that standpoint. It endeavoured to secure some measure of uniformity between province and province in essentials, and did not hesitate to depart from the Local Governments' proposals in some important respects—for instance, in the cases of Madras and Bombay. But general principles had to be interpreted in the light of local conditions, and it was found impossible, and even considered undesirable, to attempt to secure full uniformity in the franchise throughout India.

Period within which revision should be allowed.

2. Para. 2 of Government of India Despatch.—The proposals of the Committee were framed with the expectation that the composition of the Provisional and Indian Legislatures would not be subject to modification until after a full enquiry by the first Statutory Commission. Careful consideration was given to the balancing of the many varied interests requiring representation, and it is undesirable to give immediate opportunities for reopening unanimous decisions, with the certainty of arousing acute contentions between religions and interests.

Subjects of Native States.

3. Para. 3.—The recommendation that subjects of Native States in India should not be disqualified for a vote was made in accordance with the great bulk of the evidence. The class most affected consists of traders from Rajputana States (Marwaris and others) whose business is almost wholly carried on in British India, with which their interests are identified, but who still retain an ancestral home in their Native State. It was considered unfair to debar this important class from the exercise of the vote. No objection was raised on the score that this would constitute interference by the subjects of Native States in the internal affairs of British India; their numbers are small, but in some parts their interests are considerable. The Committee's proposal limits the vote to subjects of Native States who are resident and possess the property qualification in British India, and the objection that they have not divested themselves of their status as subjects of a Native State seems to be purely technical. A subject of a Native State is not ordinarily regarded as a foreigner in British India, and it is doubtful whether the present disqualification for a vote has been strictly enforced in the past.

Comparative effect of various qualifications.

4. Para. 4.—An attempt was made to ascertain the average incomes of persons with the various property qualifications recommended, but was abandoned as impracticable between province and province. In the same province care was taken to secure about the same standard of income for each qualification, and also between the urban and rural elector, whenever this was possible. The general principle, laid down in the Joint Report and followed by the Committee, was to frame as broad an electorate as possible consistently with the avoidance of a breakdown in the available electoral machinery. In fixing the different qualifications we were guided by the opinions of Local Governments and the evidence, and where these qualifications vary in different parts of the same province the differences are justified by different social and economic conditions particularly the circumstances governing the rent of land and the pitch of rates and house-rent in cities.

Income tax qualification.

5. Para. 5.—An important difficulty was experienced in attempting to frame for rural areas a franchise qualification to cover the case of petty traders and persons other than occupiers of land. This problem did not arise in urban areas, where the payment of municipal rates and taxes is available as a qualification. Where a similar system of local taxation is in force in rural areas (e.g., the chaukidari tax in Bengal, Bihar and Orissa and Assam, and school-rate in the Central Provinces) it was adopted, but in other parts the payment of income-tax was taken as the only possible substitute, although it is a higher qualification, because it is impossible to ascertain incomes of any lower amount. The raising of the income-tax level from incomes of Rs. 1,000 to Rs. 2,000 increases the disparity, but there is no practical alternative.

Military qualification.

6. Para. 7.—The opinion of the Government of India on the question of soldiers' votes referred to soldiers serving in the Army, and the Committee followed their view in recommending no exemption from the ordinary qualifications. But it recommended that retired and pensioned officers of the Indian Army, whether of commissioned or non-commissioned rank, should have a vote even if they do not possess the property qualification, because they are men of proved character and intelligence who have deserved well of the country. It did not consider that this should extend to the retired sepoy, because he has not the same qualifications, and it would give too great a privilege to military service.

Title-holders

7. The qualification of certain title-holders has been retained in landholders' constituencies, subject to the condition that the title-holder also holds some land, but has been restricted by excluding the lower classes of titles. Although some title-holders may be small landholders, they are men of status and influence, and often the natural leaders of the landholders. The qualification exists at present, and it was considered inexpedient to deprive them of their vote. The number is so exiguously small that no weight attaches to the objection that new titles have an executive origin.

Size of electorates.

8. Paras. 8 and 9.—It is impracticable to attempt uniformity of standard between province and province in the size of the electorates, consistently with the general principle stated in para. 4 above. Some provinces have a larger electoral machinery available than others. For instance, the Madras Government was very doubtful of its ability to arrange machinery for an election by an electorate more extended than that proposed by the Committee. Indeed, they recommended a substantially higher franchise. If, however, their estimate of the number of voters possessed of the property qualifications recommended for adoption is a serious under-estimate, it may be desirable somewhat to lower the franchise. On the other hand, the Bengal, United Provinces, and Assam Governments were confident of their capacity to manage an election of the size recommended and there seems no good ground for raising the franchise. The Government of India under-estimate the amount of non-official assistance that will be available. In every province the Committee took special care to ascertain that the Local Government would be able to conduct an election with the proposed electorate. Our proposals contemplate that the election should be completed in each constituency in a single day, but not in all constituencies in the province on the same day, so that it may be possible to employ some peripatetic staff. Thus, the total electorate of 122,000 voters in Backerganj district (Bengal) will be divided into five single-member constituencies, which may be polled separately on different days. And the Local Government informed us that in this district the number of voters had been largely over-estimated. As regards Almora (United Provinces) with its 96,000 voters, this includes Muhammedans, who will be polled separately, and in this particular instance the Committee decreased the size of the constituency first recommended by the Local Government. This proposed constituency was specially discussed with the Local Government, who informed us that it could not be conveniently divided, and that the necessary electoral machinery could be provided. There are advantages, as well as disadvantages, in variations of standard between province and province, for they will provide most useful experience when the scheme next comes under review.

Official members.

9. Para. 12.—The Committee has provided such number of official members only as will be sufficient to constitute the Grand Committee in accordance with the proposal of the Joint Report. The Government of India reserves this question for consultation with Local Governments, but in para. 80 of their first Despatch No. 1, dated the 5th March, they criticise the Joint Report proposal as not providing sufficient safeguards for compulsory legislation, and recommend that in each province the Grand Committee shall be so constituted as to reproduce the existing proportions of elected, nominated, and official members in the provincial council. This would give a larger margin of safety in all provinces except Bengal, but in the latter province would actually result in an elected majority in the Grand Committee. The position of the Government in Bengal would thus be weaker than under the scheme of the Joint Report, and there is no justification for such differentiation. The proportions in the existing councils have been fixed at varying periods and under different policies, and cannot reasonably be adopted as the basis for the formation of Grand Committees, which are designed for quite another purpose.

Depressed classes.

10. Para. 13.—The Government of India propose to increase the number of representations by nomination of the "depressed classes" as follows:—

Madras	from	2 to 6
Bombay	,,	1 to 4
Bengal	,,	1 to 4
United Provinces	,,	1 to 4
Punjab	,,	0 to 1
Bihar and Orissa	,,	1 to 4
Central Provinces	,,	1 to 2
Assam	,,	0 to 1
Total		7 to 24

They justify the increase by the population of this class, and the necessity for giving sufficient representation to save them from being entirely submerged and to stimulate some capacity for collective action. Their proposal ignores the nature of the problem in different provinces. It is important in Madras, less important in Bengal, Bihar and Orissa, Bombay and the Central Provinces, and may be said hardly to exist in other provinces. The Committee's proposals are based on considerations very different from those urged by the Government of India. Where they recommend some representation by nomination, they did not take into account the population of the class concerned, nor did they attempt to give any voting strength, but to provide only one or at most two nominated members for the sole purpose of securing that the particular class or interest should be in a position to represent its own views in the council. Again, it will be quite impossible for the depressed classes to provide the number of suitable representatives recommended by the Government of India; indeed, with the much smaller number proposed by the Committee, it was clear that there would be great difficulty in some provinces in obtaining suitable men from that class for nomination, and that it might be necessary to nominate members of the Depressed Classes' Mission or European missionaries to represent their views. Further, there was the strongest desire amongst all classes of witnesses to reduce the number of nominated members to the lowest possible limit. The acceptance of the Government of India proposals would involve the reconsideration of the amount of nomination recommended for other classes, e.g., the aboriginals, the population of excluded tracts, &c.

University representation.

11. Para. 14.—The proposal of the Government of India to abolish separate University representation is contrary to the unanimous opinion of witnesses and of Local Governments. The abolition of this existing privilege, which is supported by British precedent, would be greatly resented. The Committee's intention is that these seats should represent not the interests of the educated classes, but the special interests of University corporations, and the electorate is confined to the members of the Senate and Honorary Fellows. A proposal, widely favoured by the educated classes, to enlarge the electorate by the inclusion of all registered graduates, was rejected in order to avoid the criticism expressed by the Government of India that these constituencies would merely give additional representatives of the professional classes.

Landholders' representation.

12. Para. 15.—The reason for proposing the low limit of Rs. 500 land revenue for the special landholders' electorate in the Punjab is that this is mainly a province of peasant proprietors, in which the few landlords, although not holding very large estates, form a separate class, with problems distinct from those of the peasant proprietors. It received full support from all classes of witnesses, and was strongly advocated by the Lieutenant-Governor. It is not understood on what grounds the Government of India desire to re-examine with the Local Governments the proposals for Assam and Madras, which mainly follow the existing system of representation and were accepted by the Local Governments.

The Government of India desire that the distribution of landholders' seats in the United Provinces Council should be changed from five for the Oudh Talukdars, and one for the Agra landlords, to three for each. The Local Government recommended that none should be allotted to the Agra landlords, but the Committee gave one, mainly because they have one at present. The Oudh Talukdars are an ancient body with special land laws and special privileges, and have been an organised body for a very long period. The Agra landlords have only recently organised an association and are not so important a political body. There are a few ancient families, but many are new purchasers, and none possess special rights and privileges. The acceptance of the Government of India proposal would create discontent amongst the Oudh Talukdars Representation of European interests.

13. Paras. 17 and 18.—We have not seen the Bengal Government's further proposals for the distribution of the 15 seats proposed for European interests in Bengal, and can, therefore, offer no comment. The presence of a large military population has been taken into account in the proposals for the communal representation of Europeans, although no accurate statistics were available.

Muhammedan representation.

14. Paras. 19 to 24.—The majority of the Government of India follow the Committee in supporting the Congress-League compact as to the extent of Muhammedan representation, but their support is nullified by their recommendation that it should be broken in the most important province, Bengal, by increasing the number of Muhammedan seats from 34 to 44. The essence of this compact entered into for all the provinces of India (except Assam) is that the provinces with a Muhammedan majority of the population (Bengal and the Punjab) should forego a portion of their representation justified by numerical strength in exchange for substantial increases of representation for Muhammedans in provinces where they are minorities. The effect of accepting the Government of India's recommendation for Bengal will be the repudiation of it throughout India, which will have a most deplorable effect in reopening a grave controversy now settled by general consent. In Bengal the bulk of the witnesses, including Muhammedan and Hindu asseciations, supported the compact, and it was opposed only by a very few Moslem societies representing the old orthodox section. In the Punjab we were told by the Local Government that Muhammedan voters were in a minority, and in any case it is impracticable to refuse communal representation to them if it is conceded to Sikhs.

Non-Brahmans of Madras.

15. Paras. 25 and 26.—The claim of the large majority of non Brahmans is for a separate communal electorate, and it seems useless to concede the reservation of 30 out of 61 general seats until it is known whether this will be accepted by them as a binding settlement, for such reservation of seats is not justified in principle for a class that possesses a majority of at least four to one in votes. It was also considered that any further efforts to make a settlement of this bitter controversy should not be used as a pretext to delay in the introduction of the scheme into the Madras Presidency, and that the proposal for reservation of seats should only be adopted if the advance came from the non-Brahmans and was acceptable to the communities concerned as an equitable settlement. If such conditions are satisfied, the proportion of reserved seats proposed by the Government of India is not perhaps excessive.

Urban and rural representation.

16. Para. 23.—The Committee has not dealt with the separate representation of towns on a uniform plan in all provinces, because the local conditions varied. There are some large towns with distinct urban and commercial interests, which have been formed into separate constituences in all provinces. Below these is the large class of smaller towns and large villages, whose interests are mainly agricultural, in which it is difficult to draw any clear line of divergent interests from the surrounding country. In some parts it was urged that such towns would dominate the larger number of electors in the rural area; in others that the towns would be overwhelmed. We adopted a different arrangement from province to province according to the weight of evidence, and the great advantage of this diversity of treatment is that much useful experience will be available for the next revision of the scheme. The figures suggested by the Government of India indicate a substantially smaller proportion of urban representation than that given by the Commit ee, and would be most unpopular with the educated classes and town residents. It was repeatedly urged with force that the superior intelligence and public spirit of the urban population should receive even greater recognition than the Committee felt justified in allotting. The adoption of a fixed standard of population such as 50,000, suggested by the Government of India, would result either in a very large increase of urban representation or in the grouping of widely separated towns in a single constituency with no community of interest.

Qualifications of candidates.

17. Para. 29.—The Committee proposes considerable relaxations in the existing disqualifications of candidates for the legislative councils, but the Government of India desire to retain them almost unchanged, a course that will arose bitter opposition. The minority of members of the Committee (Lord Southborough, Mr. Banerjea, and Mr. Sastri) wished to go further and abolish altogether the disqualification of dismissal from Government service, whilst the majority retain it only in cases where such dismissal involves moral turpitude in the opinion of the Governor-General in Council. There are surely many cases in which dismissal from Government service should not operate as a bar, e.g., an official dismissed early in his service for dilatoriness, indiscipline, or the like. Similarly, it was felt that action under the preventive sections of the Criminal Procedure Code should not be a bar. We also took into account the absence of corresponding disqualifications in the United Kingdom.

The Indian Legislative Assembly. Method of election.

18. Paras. 31 to 39.—The duty imposed on the Committee was to frame a constitution for the two chambers of Indian Legislature in accordance with the schemes laid down in the Joint Report, not to discuss the objects and functions of each chamber. The Committee regarded the Council of State primarily as a body designed to secure essential legislation and not as a revising chamber, though it might ultimately develop into a true second chamber. It was fully recognised that the proposal for indirect election to the general seats in the Indian Legislative Assembly is open to criticism, but the Committee was driven to it only after exploring all alternatives for direct election and rejecting them for the reasons stated in para. 34 of the Report. The Committee considered it to be politically unwise to develop provincial legislative councils on the basis of a broad electorate, and to provide only a high franchise for election to the Indian Legislative Assembly, which would restrict its membership to representatives of the rich propertied classes. This would result from the scheme of direct election advocated by Sir William Vincent in his minute of dissent. Election on a broad franchise was regarded by us as open to grave difficulties at the present time. Two or even three elections (if this principle is also conceded for the Council of State) would be a very heavy burden on inexperienced electors, and all Local Governments shrunk from the task of preparing two or three separate electoral rolls and conducting two or three general elections following close on each other. It is true that the Bihar and Orissa Government first recommended direct election on a high franchise, but after our discussion they reconsidered the great difficulties attending direct election and submitted a scheme for indirect election which the Local Government was prepared to accept on the understanding that it is merely a provisional arrangement pending actual experience and that the system of direct elections on the broadest possible basis will be introduced as soon as experience justified this course. Two or three general elections would mean the elective system run to death in a country where general elections on a broad franchise are now unknown. It may be noted that the Bryce Conference for the reform of the House of Lords recommends that the large majority of members should be elected by groups of House of Commons Members, which is a system very similar to that recommended by us. It is true that our recommendation involves the election of members of the Indian Legislative Assembly by a small electorate of members of the provincial legislative councils, but these are themselves direct representatives of a large direct electorate, and will be a more representative body than a very restricted direct electorate.

Composition of the Indian Legislative Assembly.

19. Para. 36.—The Government of India criticise in various respects the proposed composition of the Indian Legislative Assembly. Their scheme was fully considered by the Committee. Our main reason for differing from it was the inadequacy of the Muhammedan representation. In our view the amount of that representation is conditioned by the Congress-League compact, and so long as that is accepted there is no room for variation. We also placed much greater stress than the Government of India upon the number of members from each province being proportionate to their importance; for instance, we could not agree that the United Provinces should have a larger number of members than two of the three presidencies. We do not consider that our proposal gives excessive representation to landholders' interests, and our distribution between provinces was influenced not only by their comparative importance in each province, but by the necessity for providing the full proportion of Muhammedan seats without unduly reducing the number of general seats. This accounts for the extra landholders' seat allotted to four provinces. In criticising the proposal for the representation of European interests by seven instead of nine special seats, the Government of India fails to take into account that the European members of the Bengal Legislative Council will be in a position to return a European for one of the general seats, who can represent European interests outside commerce. The European representative on the Committee (Mr Hogg) accepted our recommendation as giving adequate representation for European interests. The important cities of Calcutta and Bombay will secure representation through the general seats, and their importance does not justify separate constituencies. Following our general principle that election is always to be preferred to nomination when a suitable electorate can be formed, we see no reason why the Delhi Province should be relegated to nomination.

20. On the question of the Indian Legislative Assembly the Government of India remark that the Committee have not referred to their proposals for the constitution of the Assembly and did not accept their suggestion for a conference on the possibility of direct election. In the Government's proposals which were not received until within three weeks of the close of the Committee's labours, no scheme for direct election is suggested. The proposals were, however, circulated to the Committee and very carefully considered. The Committee were informed by the official member (Mr. Muddiman), who had been added to the Committee by the Government of India in December, 1918, for the purpose of assisting their deliberations on these questions, and even at their meeting on the 14th February he had received no instructions from the Government as to their views. The Committee accordingly proceeded to formulate the conclusions which, as the result of discussions commenced in the previous November, and of the evidence which they had taken in the various provinces, they had gradually and unanimously reached as to the composition of the Assembly, and the necessity, for the present, of indirect election. On the very day, the 14th February, on which the portion of the Report dealing with this matter was settled, the Government of India proposed to Lord Southborough that the Committee should hold a conference with the Government on the matter. It appeared, however, from informal communications which Lord Southborough, with the Viceroy's permission, at once initiated with the three members of the Viceroy's Council who were more particularly concerned with the matter in hand, that the Government had no arguments to bring forward which had not already been fully considered and unanimously rejected by the Committee, and had still no suggestions whatever to make as regards any method of direct election. In these circumstances Lord Southborough was not prepared at a stage when the Report, which was in fact signed on the 22nd February, was already in proof print, to call upon the Committee to reopen the question for the purpose of a belated discussion which gave no prospect of any useful result.

The Council of State.

21. Paras. 40 to 44.—The Committee recognised the objections to the election of members of the Council of State by the same electorate of non-official members of the Provincial Legislative Councils who will elect members to the Indian Legislative Council, but here again we could devise no practicable alternative. A possible alternative would have been to constitute it a wholly nominated body, but this could not be considered under our terms of reference, and in any case would be intensely unpopular in India. The Government of India propose a system of direct election on a very high franchise (the details of which are not indicated), giving an electorate of about 1,000 to 1,500 voters for each province. We unhesitatingly condemn this proposal. An electorate of fifteen hundred amongst a population of 40 millions in Madras, for instance, scattered over an area of 123,000 square miles, is a negation of all the principles of direct election; it involves constituencies of exceedingly large area and a minute fraction of voters, with whom it would be impossible for candidates to get into proper touch. The franchise would necessarily be restricted to territorial magnates, plutocrats, and perhaps a small leaven of other distinguished persons. Again there is surely the gravest objection to a system of direct election to the higher chamber combined with its denial to the lower chamber. The scheme now proposed by the Government of India for the composition of the Council of State is open to objection on the same grounds as those stated in para. 19 above. The amount of Muhammedan representation is smaller, whereas we have followed the principle of the Congress-League compact; no separate representation is given to landholders; the various provinces do not receive the same quota of representation. In our scheme Burma is allotted one seat, whereas the Government of India proposes two; this question may perhaps be left open until the Burma constitution is settled. With this exception, we prefer our proposed composition under a system of indirect election.

22. Para. 45.—Finally, we desire to express our disagreement with the proposal of the Government of India for further references to Local Governments. The Committee heard full evidence of representatives of all shades of Indian political opinion, was assisted by an added official member in each province, and held conferences with each Local Government, and we consider that the limits of useful discussion in India have now been reached. There is a general feeling that some finality should now be reached as regards this stage of the constitutional discussion. We believe that however imperfect the proposals of the Franchise Committee may be if measured by an academic standard of constitutional principle, the fact that they represent (save in a few unimportant matters) the unanimous view of a Committee containing many diverse elements justifies their adoption as the basis for the first stage in the development of responsible government in India.

APPENDIX B.

MEMORANDUM handed in by Mrs. Besant on 29th July, 1919. (See Question 1336.)

The National Home Rule League welcomes the announcement of August 20, 1917, declaring that the policy of His Majesty's Government is the realisation of Responsible Government in India, and it accepts the principle that the advance must be by stages. But while conceding that the advance should be greater in the Provincial Governments than in the Government of India, and that the present scheme is transitional it submits that the maintenance of the "machinery of autocracy" in the Centre (Montagu-Chelmsford Report, para. 289) for the declared purpose of passing "permanent measures, to which the majority of members in the Legislative Assembly may be unwilling to assent," and "to perpetuate the official bloc" (para. 276), outside matters directly concerning the peace, tranquillity and defence of the country, Foreign Affairs (excepting relations with the Colonies and Dominions), Army, Navy, and relations with Indian Princes, will cause deep disappointment in India and prejudice the success of the Reforms, and that the principle of responsibility should be introduced into the Government of India by the division of subjects into "reserved" and "transferred," as urged by the National Congresses of Bombay and Delhi, the Muslim League at Bombay, and the Moderate Conference at Bombay, all in 1918. (See Letter from the Government of India, dated March 5, 1919, and enclosures for the Congresses and Conference of 1918, pp. 97, lines 1—7; pp. 140, iii, 3 (a), 4 (a); and 142, 143, "Government of India," (a.) It is not desirable to perpetuate in the Indian Legislative Assembly "criticism unchecked by responsibility" (Moderate Conference) and to turn Indian energies away from the duty of good administration to continued public agitation. Moreover, serious friction is likely to arise between the Indian Legislative Assembly and the Executive Government, endangering the prospect of cordial operation. All this may be avoided by a wise concession to the unanimous desire of the Indian Nation to see the disappearance of autocracy in India, as in all other Nations in the civilised world. Its perpetuation in India alone places her among backward Nations, without even the protection which they will enjoy under a mandate from the League of Nations, and is regarded as showing a distrust of India's capacity and attachment to the British connection which she does not deserve after her sacrifices in men, food, clothing and money.

PART I.—(DRAFT BILL).

LOCAL GOVERNMENTS.

Sec. 1 (1)—Rules made in India, as provided under 122*a* of the Principal Act, will need the very careful attention of Parliament so that they may give all that the British Government intends. The Secretary of State for India stated (Hansard, Vol. 116, No. 73, col. 1304) that "the policy of the Rules if not the actual wording of the Rules" will be submitted to the Joint Committee, and we welcome the statement, reiterated in col. 1356. But we venture to urge that the policy shall be so defined that no power given under the Act can be whittled down by the Rules.

(a) The transferred subjects as given in the Feetham Report are on the whole satisfactory as a beginning, so far as the Provinces are concerned, but we trust that 6, 7, and 8 (Irrigation, Land Revenue and Famine Relief) will be transferred on the application of Provinces at the end of five years under the proposal of the M.C. Report (para. 260, or Appendix 1, 52), if Parliament should refuse to transfer them now. With these should go the power, proposed in the same paragraph, to order that the salary of the Ministers should be voted by the Legislative Council. In this respect the Bill falls short of the M.C. Report, and the proposals of para. 260 should be inserted in the Bill by the Joint Committee. There is no reason why the third Legislative Council should not enjoy complete Provincial Autonomy.

Proviso.—A subject once transferred should not be again reserved. The remedy for maladministration should be the dismissal of the Minister concerned.

Sec. 2 (2)—Principal Act 46 (3). The power to revoke or suspend should be vested only in Parliament.

Sec. 3 (1)—The salaries of Ministers should be the same, whether high or low, as those of members of the Executive Council, so as to secure equality of status. (Passed by National Congresses of Bombay and Delhi, 1918, by Muslim League, 1918, and Moderate Conference, 1918.)

Sec. 4 (1)—A provision should be inserted from the M.C. Report (para. 218, or Appendix 1, 26) that one Executive Councillor must be an Indian. (The United Congress and Muslim League of 1916 asked that half the Executive should be Indians elected by the Legislative Council. The Congresses of Bombay and Delhi, the Muslim League and the Moderate Conference passed the same.)

Sec 5 (2)—We endorse the proposal of the Moderate Conference that the Governor should have no greater power over Ministers than over Executiue Councillors, and that whatever power the Governor in Council has to interfere with decisions of Governor and Ministers on the ground of their possible effects on reserved subjects, corresponding power should be given to Governor and Ministers in regard to decisions of the Governor in Council affecting transferred subjects.

In order to carry out the Secretary of State's statement to the House of Commons on June 5 (Hansards cols. 1310—1312, that "The Provincial Government has got to defer to its Legislature by Statute, that is to say, in transferred subjects you have a Government which is responsible to the Legislature"), it is necessary that the Joint Committee should adopt the principle of the proposal of the Congresses and Muslim League, that the relation of the Governor to the Ministers in regard to the transferred subjects shall be the same as that obtaining in the Self-Governing Dominions, with the difference that the Governor in the present scheme is both representative of the King and the Prime Minister. If, "so far as transferred subjects are concerned, we shall have parted with our trusteeship and surrendered it to the representatives of the people of India" (Hansard, col. 1312), the rules made under 5 (2) must carry out the above policy. This is also rendered necessary by Mr. Montagu's criticism of the alternative scheme of the Local Governments, that "there is no certainty of control by the Legislature [in that scheme] because on all subjects, if the Governor certifies it is in the interests of his province, he can override it" (Hansard, col. 1314). We, therefore, urge on the Joint Committee the clear laying down of the principle endorsed by the House of Commons in the second reading of the Bill.

Sec. 6 (1).—We submit that the proposed Councils are too small; the number should be raised in the major Provinces to at least the 150 suggested in the Bombay and Delhi Congresses and the Bombay Muslim League. The United Kingdom had in 1911 (the last census) 670 members, each representing 67,000 persons. Taking Madras as an example—it has nearly the same population—it would have 600 members in its Council. A Council of 250 would give only one representative to 168,000 of the population, and with this must go a lowering of the franchise, as suggested below under 6 (3) (b). We prefer the 4-5th elected and 1-5th nominated, as agreed to in the United Congress of 1916 and the League, and confirmed since by the Congresses and League to the less convenient figure adopted in the Southborough Report, Schedule I.

(3) (b).—The Rules should provide that no person resident in India who is a subject of a Dominion which puts disabilities on Indians shall be eligible for election or nomination. On this we call the attention of the Committee to the Note to Appendix XI. in the Southborough Report on the Franchise, that "The proposal to enfranchise persons domiciled elsewhere than in the United Kingdom will be subject to any action which may be taken in view of the reciprocity resolution passed at the Imperial Conference held in 1917." In the Southborough report disqualifications, para. 7, women are disqualified; we earnestly beg the Joint Committee to remove a disqualification founded only on sex, now rejected by most civilised countries and alien from Indian traditions. The Congresses of 1918 passed resolutions against such disqualification and many district Conferences have done the same. So far as we know, no Indian conference has voted against woman suffrage. Mr. Hogg (Report, p. 4) pointed out that no strong opposition was shown in the evidence. It is true that the number of women voters would at first be small, but they would be women who are powerful levers in the uplift of their sex. Woman's agitations in India are markedly formidable, as was shown in the removal of indentured labour in Fiji, and in the release of Mrs. Annie Besant and her colleagues from internment in 1917, for they are more indifferent to consequences than men, and public feeling in India would not tolerate any physical violence against women. It will be unwise to invite the agitation which will certainly arise if votes are denied to them, whereas the immediate effect of granting them the franchise will be a stimulus to girls' education and to the already powerful movement against child marriage. It is obviously absurd to grant the franchise to illiterate men labourers and to deny it to women University graduates. We agree with the other disqualifications, but would add one to them by the omission of the words "a ruler or" in 6 (4). The size of electorates as fixed in the Southborough Report, para. 11, p 5, is too small, giving only a total of 5,179,000 out of a population of 245 millions. Supposing that these five millions are all literates, which they certainly are not, at least the remaining three millions of literates should be added to those voting on a property qualification; if the addition would overstrain the electoral machinery, any of them who wrote a demand for a vote, in the presence of the registration officer or his deputy, might be enfranchised. By the end of the term of three years of the first reformed councils it should be possible to be prepared for the registration of a much larger number, and the proposed property qualification should be lowered.

We are not in favour of the extension of communal electorates advocated on pp. 7 and 8 of the Southborough Report, for they perpetuate religious divisions in political life and check the growth of healthy National unity. The Muhammadan communal electorate must remain till Muhammadans themselves demand its abolition. But the Sikhs' interests are not separate from those of other Indians; the Europeans are already sufficiently represented in their separa e electorates; Anglo-Indians are specially favoured by Government, and need no special representation to urge their interests; Christians also are a favoured community, and should unite politically with their fellow-countrymen. The general Hindu communities elect Christians, Parsis, Sikhs and Mussalmans as well as Hindus—a most desirable liberality.

Sec. 7 (1).—After the words "he thinks fit" insert "provided that the intervals between the sessions do not exceed 4 months."

Sec. 9 (2).—Proviso (a), (b), (c), (d) are far less liberal than the M.C. Report Proposals Appendix I. 50. where the budget is to be altered so as to give effect to resolutions of the Legislative Council, unless the Governor certifies, for reasons given, that the restoration of sums for the reserved subjects is necessary for peace and tranquility. We con-ider that control of the purse is essential to responsibility and to the due discharge of the important functions entrusted to Ministers. There should be one purse, its allotments being decided by "consultation and joint deliberation on the same policy"—to borrow Mr. Montagu's phrase (Hansard col. 1311), and where there is a deficit it should be jointly borne, and taxation levied jointly for the reserved and transferred subjects. As the Congresses and League have agreed: "It is essential for the welfare of the Indian people that the Indian Legislature shall have the same measure of fiscal autonomy which the self-governing Dominions of the Empire possess. The Budget shall be under the control of the Legislature, subject to the contribution to the Government of India and the allocation of a fixed sum for the reserved subjects; and should fresh taxation be necessary it should be imposed by the Provincial Government as a whole for both transferred and reserved subjects. (Letter from the Government of India, 5th March, 1919., p. 141. III., ii., 4 a and b.) The Moderate Conference also resolved that, saving the Imperial obligations agreed on, the "Government of India, acting under the control of the Legislature, should enjoy the same policy of regulating the fiscal policy of India as the Governments of the Self Governing Dominions enjoy of regulating their fiscal policy." (Ibid, 13 , under heading "India and Fiscal Freedom.") On this matter all Indian Reformers are unanimous, and its concession is absolutely necessary to give lasting satisfaction to the Indian public.

9 (3).—The Congresses did not approve the institution of Grand Committees, but if they are instituted, they urge that not less than one-half of their number should be elected by the Legislative Council.

Part II.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

Secs. 14, 15.—We do not deny that during the period of transition the Government should have an instrument for passing what it considers to be necessary lesgilation. But the Council of State—which the Congresses would reject—is so constituted as to enable it to pass any measure certified by the Governor-General in Council as essential to . . . "good government," a vague phrase, and held to include "sound financial administration" (M.C. Report, Appendix I., 15). In Sec. 20 (4), the words "interests of British India or any part therefore," are substituted for good government and sound financial administration, but these are equally vague. The Moderate Conference also objects to these words, and would confine certification to foreign and political relations, and "peace and order," and limits its passing of legislation objected to by the Legislative Assembly to "time of war or internal disturbance," without reference to the proposed House of Commons Select Committee, unless the legislation is limited to one year (Letter of March 5, p. 143, Government of India, d. e.).

The Congresses, on similar lines, propose that if the Legislative Assembly does not pass measures on reserved subjects deemed necessary by the Government, the Governor-General in Council may provide for them by Regulations for a year, to be renewed only if 40 per cent. of the members of the Assembly present and voting are in favour of them (Letter of March 5, p. 140.)

We suggest that Grand Committees are more suitable in a condition of transition than a Council of State, which would tend to become permanent. The Grand Committee also implies the introduction of reserved and transferred subjects into the Legislative Assembly, a matter on which all Indian parties are agreed. We urge this for the reasons given in the opening paragraph of this memorandum. Among others, so thoughtful a Moderate leader as the Hon. Mr. S. Srinivasa Sastri has expressed himself strongly on the necessity for agitation if this be not given. Customs, Tariff and Excise Duties at least should be transferred to a Minister, and the Budget should follow the Provincial procedure. The whole prosperity of India depends on its finance being under Indian control, so that the interests of India shall be regarded as primary. The Congresses consider that the reserved subjects should be Foreign Affairs (except relations with the Colonies and Dominions), Army, Navy, and relations with Indian Ruling Princes and matters affecting peace, tranquillity and the defence of the country (Ibid).

As Home Rulers we feel that the solid block of an autocratic Central Government should not be placed on the road of advance to complete Responsible Government, and regret that no indication is given in the Bill that that goal of British policy is ever to be realised. There is no "gradual development of self-governing institutions" herein, as promised on August 20, 1917, nor even any suggestion of its beginning. We respectfully submit that unless a beginning of responsibility is made in the Centre, the announcement in the House of Commons will not be fulfilled.

Sec. 16 (2)—We submit it is desirable that the Legislative Assembly should consist of not less than 150 members, 80 per cent. of whom shall be elected.

Sec. 17 (2)—As in the Provinces, after the words "as he thinks fit," insert, "provided that the intervals between the session do not exceed four months."

Sec 21 (1)—The provision that half the Executive Council should be Indians should be inserted. (See M.C. Report, Appendix I., 7.) Only "to increase the Indian element" is there proposed, but no provision is made in the Bill.

Part III.

SECRETARY OF STATE IN COUNCIL.

As the Report on this matter is not published we refrain from comment, but see with pleasure Sec. 22, transferring the cost of the Department to moneys provided by Parliament.

PART IV.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE IN INDIA.

Sec. 25 (1)—We urge the establishment of simultaneous examinations, without precedent nominations.

We view with alarm any proposals to raise the salaries and pensions of the I.C.S. suggested in Civil Services Commission Report, and endorse the dissenting minute of Mr. Justice Rahim.

PART V.

STATUTORY COMMISSION.

Appendix I., 52 of the M.C. Report, already noted under Part I., Sec. (1) (a) should be inserted, unless recorded previously, and a similar power should be given to the Indian Legislative Assembly.

The Statutory Commission at the end of ten years should recommend such extensions of responsibility in the Central Government as should ensure complete Responsible Government at the end of another period of five years, and it is very desirable that a definite term should be inserted in the Statute so as to put an end to all agitation, and to direct all Indian efforts to the task of efficient Responsible Government. There would thus be three stages outlined in the Statute for the reaching of the goal, and Britain and India would go forward together as partners in the greatest Commonwealth that the world has ever known. Autocracy would be rooted out of its last citadel, and the ideals with which Britain, the Dominions and India entered on the War of 1914 would be realised.

APPENDIX C.

PAPER handed in by the Hon. Mr. V. J. Patel, August 5th, 1919. (See Question 1735.)

MEMORANDUM OF EVIDENCE BY THE DELEGATES OF THE INDIAN NATIONAL CONGRESS.

PART I.

GENERAL STATEMENT.

We appear as delegates of the Indian National Congress. We are appointed under a resolution passed at the Thirty-third Session of the Congress at Delhi in December, 1918, instructing us "to advocate and press for the demands of the Congress as contained in its resolutions."

THE INDIAN NATIONAL CONGRESS.

The Indian National Congress was founded in 1885 to advocate reforms in the government and administration of the country and to bring about an adequate measure of popular representation and control over the legislative and administrative machinery. It has for the past 33 years, at its annual sessions and through its provincial and district affiliated bodies, which hold frequent public conferences and in other ways provide scope for public discussion and development of political opinion, steadily and with increasing force pressed for reforms of such a character. Its object is the attainment of self-government within the Empire on the lines of that now enjoyed by the self-governing Dominions. It represents to-day the overwhelming body of opinion among the people of India. Its constitution and organisation are of the widest democratic kind. Its delegates are elected throughout the country by or through the various affiliated bodies and at public meetings, and membership is open to every British subject in India of either sex, and of any class, creed or race, who is willing to attend its session, provided he or she is 21 years of age and has formally subscribed to its Constitution. The session at Delhi was attended by about 5,400 delegates, who included a large number of culivators. The Resolutions passed at the Delhi session are almost identical with those passed at the meeting of the All-India Moslem Leaugue held at the same time, the two bodies having been in consultation through their committees with a view to working on a common ground with a common object.

INDIA'S DEMAND.

We venture to impress upon the Committee, therefore, that the Resolutions of the Congress, which we are here to press for the acceptance of Parliament by embodiment in amendments to the Bill under consideration, represent the considered opinion, in an overwhelming measure, of the people of India, after the fullest public discussion of the proposals contained in the Report of Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford on Indian reforms; and we feel that we should be failing in our responsibility to the great interests we represent and the trust confided to us, if we were not to point out that, so far as public opinion in India is concerned, we speak with an authority which is indisputable; that we are putting forward demands in the form of amendments to the Bill which are the least that can satisfy the people of the country as a fulfilment, in the popular view, of the terms of the announcement of August 20th, 1917, and lead to the acceptance of the Reform Bill as a measure which would help to restore peace and contentment in the country, and provide the opportunities for self-realisation and national development which are as essential to the interests of Great Britain and the whole Empire as they are vital to those of India. We urge most earnestly the full acceptance by the Committee, having regard to the foregoing considerations, of the amendments to the Bill which we have ventured to propose, to give effect to the demands of the Congress. These are explained as briefly as possible hereunder.

"FITNESS" FOR RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT.

We desire first, however, to state, without reservation, that the Indian National Congress cannot accept the assumption contained in the Report on Indian Constitutional Reforms that the people of India are as yet unfit for full responsible government. The principle of Self-Determination has been accepted by the British Government and its Allies as the essential principle to be applied to all civilised peoples. In the case of India, the immediate grant of responsible government, qualified only by the reservations necessary to its position as an integral part of the British Empire (inclusion in which is a cardinal point in the Constitution of the Congress and is fully adhered to, with insignificant exceptions, by every shade of Indian opinion), is the logical expression of that principle. The question of the fitness of a people to manage their own affairs is not to be decided by such specious considerations as are put forward in the Report on Indian Constitutional Reforms. The principle of the right of every people to govern themselves is the basic fact which must be assaulted if that right is to be withheld; and, while there may be reasons sufficiently strong to remove it from consideration, if attempt is made to apply it to barbaric or semi-civilised peoples or races which may be considered to be otherwise disqualified or unequal to such responsibility, these cannot be advanced in regard to a people whose civilisation is the oldest existing in the world, who managed their own kingdoms and empires as large as the British Empire in India long before the establishment of British rule in the country, who possess ancient traditions of democratic government, among whom municipal institutions of an essentially democratic character only ceased to exist after the advent of British rule, whose country is economically in so large a measure self-contained and in need only of free development, and whose claim to the same Imperial protection as that so long enjoyed by the self-governing Dominions is based on the indisputable ground of the immensity of their past and present contributions to the military power and economic welfare of the Empire.

But apart from these broad and unassailable considerations, it is impossible to accept the reasons which prevented the authors of the Report on Indian Constitutional Reforms from proposing a scheme of immediate, full, responsible government for India and resulted in the embodiment in this Bill of the meagre and unsatisfying proposals now under consideration by the Committee. Briefly these reasons are:—

1. The absence of trained electorates of sufficient dimensions.

2. The setting up of an oligarchy of educated classes to govern the illiterate masses whose interests they would not be so well fitted to represent as an alien bureaucracy.

3. Racial diversities and religious animosities.

These are reasons which have not stood in the way of the achievement of responsible government by any modern State. Under the very limited franchise proposals of the Southborough Committee about 2½ per cent. of the population in the provinces of British India would be enfranchised. In Bombay, Bengal, and the United Provinces the proportion is about 3 per cent. Even in the United Kingdom, three years after the passing of the great Reform Bill of 1832, only 3·3 of the total population enjoyed the franchise, and as late as 1881 the proportion had only grown to 8·9 per cent. In 1880 only 1 per cent. of the population could exercise the vote in Sweden, and until 1882 the Chamber of Deputies in Italy was elected by 2½ per cent. of the population. Large electorates in most self-governing countries have only grown up in recent years. It was not until after the Reform Bill of 1884 was passes in the United Kingdom that 15 per cent. of the population became enfranchised, and in the United States as late as 1888 only 17·6 per cent. of the people enjoyed the right to vote. In all countries responsibility in the beginning has been entrusted to a very small section of the people, and government has been in the hands of a small educated minority, who have naturally cared for the interests of the uneducated masses pending the spread of education and the consequent extension of the franchise. The suggestion that the educated leaders of Indian opinion could not similarly be safely entrusted with the welfare of the masses is entirely falsified by the history of the last fifty years, which has been one of constant struggle between them and the bureaucratic administration for redress of the grievances and extension of the rights of the masses. The extent to which this has been the case is amply borne out in the remarkable memorandum which was presented to Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford by Sir Dinshah Wacha and other leaders of the "Moderate" party in 1918, and in the dissenting Minute of Sir C. Sankaran Nair, annexed to the Despatch of the Government of India of March 5th (East India Constitutional Reforms Cmd. 123). But there can be no possible danger of an educated oligarchy coming into power because the constitution would be democratic from the beginning, and, as the franchise is extended, as it is sure to be in course of time, there would be no danger of a small minority ever assuming or usurping power. Nor have racial diversity or religious animosities ever been a bar to the achievement and successful working of self-governing institutions in other countries. This was notably the case in some of the self-governing Dominions of the British Empire. Canada was granted full responsibility at a time when racial and religious animosities were at the most acute stage, and when the population was certainly far below the standard, in respect of education and training, laid down for India in the Report on Indian Constitutional Reforms; yet what is now held to be a bar in the case of India was regarded, and, as it proved, rightly so, as a solvent in the case of Canada. We believe that equally in India the grant of full responsibility and the removal of all her political fetters would prove the surest solvent of all such problems. At the same time we would point out that the difficulties of this kind to which reference is made in the Report, have been greatly exaggerated. Hindus and Moslems have lived for centuries side by side in social intercourse and mutually helpful brotherhood. Nothing has been more striking in the past few years, and is more evident to-day, than their recognition of and devotion to a common nationhood. This was evidenced by the agreement reached at Lucknow in 1917 on the much-vexed problem of Mahomedan representation. Hindu and Moslem leaders sitting round a table found a solution of a question which bristled with difficulties, and in regard to which it would have been easy to excite jealousies and animosity had not the determination existed on both sides to place the interests of India and the Indian people as a nation above everything. The Lucknow compact has been accepted by the Southborough Committee. Religious disputes and consequent disturbances are only spasmodic and local, as they are in other countries; moreover, they are conspicuous by their absence in the States under Indian rule, and they are not infrequently provoked and aggravated in British India by external causes and interference, which need not be described here.

The delegates of the Congress are thus unable to understand why special and peculiar standards of fitness for responsibility, which have never been applied to other countries, should be erected as a barrier against the immediate grant to the people of India of that right to a government set up by and answerable to the people, which has been so uncompromisingly asserted during the past few years by British statesmen, of every shade of opinion, to be the inalienable right of all civilised peoples.

THE CONGRESS AND THE ANNOUNCEMENT OF AUGUST, 1917.

In accepting with satisfaction the declaration in the Announcement of August 20th, 1917, that self government is the goal of British policy in India, the National Congress, at its Session in Calcutta in the following December, repudiated the claim of others to decide for India the time and measure of the stages by which it should be achieved, as a negation of the recognised principle of self-determination. And when it came to consider, at its special session called for the purpose at Bombay in August, 1918, the proposals contained in the Report on Indian Constitutional Reforms, while adhering to the principles of reform contained in the Congress-League scheme and regarding the proposals in the Report as "unsatisfactory and disappointing," it drew up resolutions for the modification of those proposals and abandoned its own scheme, only in order to facilitate the passage of reforms. But even so, it was found that opinion in the country, subsequently very strongly manifested through Provincial and District Conferences, public meetings and even the Legislative Councils, was so definitely and emphatically determined upon the immediate achievement of full responsibility in the Provinces, that, at the following session at Delhi, in December of last year, an amending resolution, calling for full responsible government in the Provinces at once, without prejudice to the claim for a substantial measure of responsibility in the Central Government, was passed by an overwhelming majority, only a few delegates out of over 5,000 voting in favour of the retention of the Bombay Resolution.

We now put the Congress demands before the Committee in the form of suggested amendments to the Bill. Before proceeding to explain them in detail, we would again urge upon the Committee the representative character in which we appear before them as the accredited delegates of the most representative popular institution in India, with a definite mandate to urge upon the Parliament of the United Kingdom that the Indian people cannot be satisfied with anything else.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE DELHI SESSION OF THE CONGRESS.

The Resolutions passed at the Session of the Congress at Delhi in December last, which embody the demands of the Congress, are annexed hereto as Appendix I. For the convenience of the Committee, however, they are summarised below:

THE INDIA COUNCIL.

1. The Council of India should be abolished and there should be two permanent Under Secretaries to assist the Secretary of State for India, one of whom should be an Indian.

2. The salary of the Secretary of State and all charges in respect of the India Office establishment should be placed on the British Estimates.

3. The Control of Parliament and the Secretary of State should be modified only in proportion to the extent to which the Indian and Provincial Governments are made responsible to the electorate.

THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

1. The principle of responsible Government should be applied to the Central Administration by dividing the subjects into "Reserved" and "Transferred." The Reserved Subjects should be Foreign Affairs (except relations with the Colonies and Dominions), the Army, Navy, and relations with Indian Ruling Princes and, subject to the Declaration of Rights set out below, matters directly affecting the peace, tranquillity and defence of the country.

DECLARATION OF RIGHTS.

(a) That all Indian Subjects of His Majesty and all the subjects naturalised or resident in India are equal before the law, and there shall be no penal nor administrative law in force in this country, whethe substantive or procedural, of a discriminative nature;

(b) That no Indian subject of His Majesty shall be liable to suffer in liberty, life, property or in respect of free speech or writing or of the right of association except under sentence by an ordinary Court of Justice and as a result of lawful and open trial;

(c) That every Indian subject shall be entitled to bear arms, subject to the purchase of a licence as in Great Britain, and that the right shall not be taken away save by a sentence of an ordinary Court of Justice;

(d) That the Press shall be free and that no licence or security shall be demanded on the registration of a press or newspaper;

(e) That corporal punishment shall not be inflicted on any Indian subject of His Majesty save under conditions applying to all other British subjects.

2. The Executive Council should consist partly of Ministers appointed from among the elected members of the Legislative Assembly and in charge of the Transferred Subjects and partly of other members nominated by Government in charge of the Reserved Subjects. When there are two or more members in charge of the Reserved Subjects, half of their number should be Indians.

3. There should be no Council of State, but only one Legislative Assembly composed of 150 members, four-fifths of whom should be elected directly by the people. The franchise should be as broad as possible without distinction of sex.

4. The Legislative Assembly should have the same measure of fiscal autonomy as the self-governing Dominions.

5. The Legislative Assembly should have full control over the Budget, except in respect of the Reserved Subjects, the allotment for which should be fixed and be a first charge on the Revenues.

6. All Bills must be introduced and passed in the Assembly. Provided that in the case of Reserved Subjects, if the Legislative Assembly does not pass any measure desired by Government, the Governor-General in Council may provide for the same by regulations, such regulations to remain in force for one year, and not to be renewed unless 40 per cent. of the Legislative Assembly present and voting are in favour of them.

Provided also that if the Council of State is to be constituted, at least half of its total strength should consist of elected members and the procedure by certification should be confined to the Reserved Subjects.

7. The President and the Vice-President of the Legislative Assembly should be elected by the Assembly.

8. The Legislative Assembly should have power to make or modify its own rules of business and these should not require the sanction of the Governor-General.

9. There should be an obligation to convene meetings of the Assembly at stated intervals or on the requisition of a certain number of members.

The Provincial Governments.

1. There should be complete separation of the Provincial from the Imperial Revenues with certain defined powers of taxation and borrowing in the Provincial Governments.

2. Full responsible Government should be introduced into the Provinces at once.

3. The Executive Council should consist of the Governor and Ministers responsible to the Legislature.

4. At least four-fifths of the members of the Legislative Council should be elected on a broad franchise without distinction of sex.

5. The Legislative Council should elect its own President and Vice-President.

6. The Legislative Council should have power to make or modify its own rules of business, and these should not require the sanction of the Governor.

7. There should be an obligation to convene meetings of the Council at stated intervals or on the requisition of a certain number of members.

8. The Legislative Council should have full control over the Budget except in respect of the Provincial contribution to the Government of India.

9. All Bills must be introduced and passed in the Legislative Council.

10. There should be no Grand Committee.

Public Services.

The Public Services should be recruited in India in a fixed and progressive proportion. The annual recruitment in India for the Indian Civil Service should be 50 per cent. to start with and Indians should be granted at least 25 per cent. of the Commissions in the Army, and this proportion should be gradually increased.

Complete Transfer of Responsibility.

The Congress asks for a statutory guarantee that full responsible Government shall be established in the whole of British India, within a period not exceeding 15 years.

The Determination of the Congress.

We wish again to emphasize one important fact, to which we have already referred in connection with these demands. The Bombay Special Congress, which met to consider the Reform proposals of the Joint Report, resolved that the subjects of Law, Justice and Police should, for a period of six years, be reserved and administered by the Executive Government of each Province. This resolution did not find favour with the people; they pressed for full responsible Government immediately in the Provinces, through the Legislative Councils, Political Associations and public meetings. In response to public opinion, so emphatically expressed throughout the country, the Delhi Congress in December last resolved, in modification of the Bombay Congress Resolution on the subject, that "in view of the expression of opinion in the country since the sitting of the said special Session, this Congress is of opinion that so far as the Provinces are concerned, full responsible Government should be granted at once." The feeling among the Delegates of the Congress was so strong that they, in order to guard against the possible danger of any attempt to minimise their demands on this question, further resolved that the Deputation proceeding to England should advocate and press the demands of the Congress as contained in the resolutions of the Congress."

We submit that the proposals of the Joint Report, intended to solve the political problems of India, have failed to satisfy the aspirations of India as expressed in the Congress resolutions. The Authors of the Report have not carried out substantially the spirit of the Declaration of the 20th August. They have put too narrow and too strict a construction on the wording of that Announcement. They have declined to grant full responsible Government to any Province, and they propose to maintain the Central Government in as bureaucratic a form as ever. The Authors of the Report, in taking this course, have altogether missed the real issue, for the solution of which their task of proposing Constitutional Reforms for India was undertaken. They do not propose to solve the greatest of all problems in India, viz., Fiscal Autonomy, without which all other reforms are almost valueless. We do not find any recommendation in this Report for the abolition of the Indian Council, which is left untouched in the Bill. They do not even suggest the probable period within which the goal of full responsibility can be reached, much less do they recommend the fixing of any such time limit in the Statute to be passed.

The Demand of the Congress for a declaration of the Rights of the people of India as British citizens, viz., that all Indians are equal before the law, equally entitled to a licence to bear arms and to enjoy freedom of speech, writing and meeting, and also the freedom of the Press, and that no one should be punished or deprived of his liberty except by a sentence of a Court of Justice, has been met by the Rowlatt Act, passed in the teeth of the unanimous Indian opinion of the country both in and outside the Legislative Council!

Unsatisfactory Character of the Bill.

Coming to the Bill itself, we regret to say that the proposals contained therein are even less acceptable than the unsatisfactory and disappointing recommendations of the Joint Report. We have carefully gone through its provisions and compared them with the recommendations of the Joint Report. A list of points in which the Bill goes back on this Report is attached herewith and marked Appendix II. We invite the special attention of the Joint Committee to a few of the more important of them; they are points Nos. 7, 10, 12, 13, 14, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 29, 32, 33, 44, 47, 48, 49, 50 in the list.

"Almost Despotic Powers."

In concluding this portion of our Memorandum we desire to impress upon the Committee the danger of allowing the Bill as it stands to pass into law. The salvation of India at this supremely critical juncture, both as regards its individual existence and its position, as one of the basic foundations of the British Empire, lies in the transfer of responsibility and control in the government and administration of the country from the hands of the bureaucracy to those of the representatives of the people. The Bill makes generous provision for the transfer of control, not from the bureaucracy to the people, but from Parliament to the bureaucracy, while allowing only a very limited and tentative experiment in "responsible administration" in order that the people of the country may undergo a training in "responsibility," to be carried out by instructors who have had no such training themselves, but whose mental equipment and experience in the working of forms of government and administration make them singularly ill-fitted to be entrusted with such a task. The limited powers to be granted to the popular representatives are to be surrounded by such an effective entanglement of barbed wire, in the form of checks, safeguards and saving clauses as to leave the Governor of a Province, as Sir Donald Maclean aptly pointed out in the debate on the Second Reading, still in the possession of "almost despotic powers." If this is to be the effect of a Bill which, at the same time, removes to a large extent the control of the Secretary of State and Parliament over executive authority in India, the Indian people will have little for which to be grateful. The speech of the Secretary of State on the Second Reading was the strongest justification of the demand of India for the fullest possible measure of Responsible Government. The Bill gives little more than limited responsibility in municipal affairs, and leaves the people still at the mercy of executive authority in all the departments which vitally affect their interests and without the right to the final voice in the spending of the revenues of the country.

The Government of Bombay make alternative proposals to those of the Joint Report, which show that they are in favour of a scheme for the Provinces which approximates more closely to the demands which we put forward than the proposals of the Bill. In view of the accusation that has been freely made in this country that the Congress has made extreme demands at the bidding of "extremist" leaders, we would emphasize that the Congress, generally speaking, is asking for little more than is proposed by the Government of Bombay under Lord Willingdon. However that may be, we urge that our demands are the least which can be described as a "substantial step" of the kind intended by the terms of the Announcement of 1917, or which can be accepted by the people of India as an adequate measure of justice to them.

V. J. PATEL,
General Secretary.

PART II.

THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA BILL, 1919.

PROPOSED PRINCIPAL AMENDMENTS TO BRING THE BILL IN A LINE WITH THE INDIAN NATIONAL CONGRESS PROPOSALS.

Preamble.—In the first paragraph for the words "progressive realisation" substitute "establishment within a period not exceeding fifteen years." And omit the word "gradually."

Second paragraph should read as follows :—

"And whereas towards that end it is necessary to provide for devolution of powers and responsibility as between the Parliament and the Government of India on the one hand and the Government of India and the Provincial Governments on the other, subject in each case to a simultaneously corresponding devolution of powers and responsibility to the popular Legislatures and also to secure an increasing association of Indians in every branch of administration."

Third para. should be retained as it is.

The whole of the preamble thus amended should be inserted as a preamble to the principal Act.

Section I, Cl. (1) (a) and (b). These should be omitted and provision should be made for classification and devolution by schedules attached to the Act.

(c) May be retained.
(d) Should be omitted.

Cl. (2). May be retained, omitting, however, sub-clause (i.) and the proviso at the end, and making such changes as are necessitated by amendments suggested to clause (1) above.

In sub-clause (v.), line 30, omit the words "or transferred subjects," and in line 35, after word "transfer" and before the word "and" "insert in the Central Government"

Cl. (3). Should be omitted.

Cl. (4), para (2). Should be omitted.

SECTION II, Cl. (1), para (1). For the words "in relation . . . . subjects" substitute "by the Governor and his Executive Council consisting of Ministers appointed under this Act."

After "Central Provinces" add "and Berar."

SECTION III, Cl. (1), para. (1). Substitute this by the following :—

"The Governor of a Governor's Province shall appoint Ministers from among the elected members of the Local Legislative Council to carry on the Executive Government and administration of the Province, and the Ministers so appointed shall hold office during his pleasure."

Para. (2). For this whole para. substitute the following:—"There shall be paid to every Minister so appointed such salary as the Governor with the sanction of the Legislative Council may determine, subject to a maximum stated in the second schedule for the members of his Executive Council."

Cl. (2). May be retained.

Cl. (3 and 4). Should be omitted.

SECTION IV, Cl. (1 and 2). Omit these clauses and read instead :—"Section 47 of the Principal Act is hereby repealed."

SECTION V, Cl. (2), para (1). Omit words "and with his Ministers."

Para. (2). Should be omitted.

SECTION VI, Cl. (1). In proviso (a) read "80 per cent." instead of "70 per cent." and "15 per cent." instead of "20 per cent."

At the end add "but any such variation shall not increase the proportion of members elected by communal electorates to those elected by general electorates as stated in the schedule."

Cl. (1). Proviso (b) may be retained.

Cl. (2). Add at the end "provided that a writ shall be issued for filling the vacancy within two months from the date of such vacancy."

Cl. (3). Sub-clause (a), line 26, insert "the nominated" before the word "members."

Sub-clause (c), line 36, before the word "and" insert the following:—"Provided that no residential qualification is imposed upon candidates for election and that women shall have the same rights and privileges as men under the same conditions for being voters and candidates."

SECTION VII, Cl. (1). At the end add :—"Provided that there shall be at least one meeting of the Legislative Council every quarter, and that the Governor shall be bound to convene a meeting of the Legislative Council on a requisition signed at least by one third of the total number of the members of the Council."

Cl. (4). Substitute "three" for "six," and at the beginning of the clause insert "Every Governor's Legislative Council shall continue for three years from its first meeting, but."

SECTION VIII, Cl. (2). Omit all words after "British India."

SECTION IX, Cl. (1). Omit the words "sub-sections (1) and (3) of."

As a consequential amendment also omit insertion of section 80 (A) proposed to be made in the Principal Act after section 80 in amendments provided by Part 2 of the Third Schedule (page 27, lines 29-35 of the Bill).

Cl. (2), para. (1). Substitute "sanction" for "assent" and at the end add :—"and the Council shall have full powers to deal with them in any manner they like."

Para. (2). Proviso (a) should be omitted.

Proviso (b). At the end omit words "or for carrying on any department," and after the word "authorise" add "with the sanction of the Government of India."

Cl. (2), (d). Should be omitted.

Cl. (6). For the words "as to the person to preside over" substitute "as to the election of the persons to preside," etc.

Line 7. Omit the words "and for . . . . business in Council," and also the words "prohibiting or" in line 11 of page 9.

SECTION XIII, Cl. (3). Should be omitted.

SECTION XIV. Omit the words "and two chambers namely the Council of State."

SECTION XV. Omit the whole section.

SECTION XVI Cl. (1). Add the word "directly" before "elected."

Cl. (2). Should read thus :—"The Legislative Assembly shall consist of 150 members, the number of non-elected members may be 30, of whom 20 may be official members. The number of the elected members shall be at least 120."

Para. (2). Read "four-fifths" for "two-thirds."

SECTION XVII. Omit all references to the "Council of State" and make consequential changes in the wording of the section throughout accordingly ; and also in proviso (b) after word "extended" insert "for not more than six months."

Sub-clause (c) read "three" for "six."

Cl. (2). Add at the end :—"Provided that there shall be a meeting of the Legislative Assembly at least every quarter, and that the Governor-General shall be bound to convene a meeting of the Legislative Assembly on a requisition signed by not less than one-third of the total members of the Assembly."

Cl. (5). At the end add "that a writ shall be issued for filling the vacancy within three months from the date of the creation of the vacancy."

SECTION XVIII. Omit all references to the "Council of State" in this section.

Cl. (1). Add at the end :—"Provided that for the purpose of this section a Minister shall not be deemed to be an official and a person shall not be deemed to accept office on appointment as a Minister."

Cl. (2). Should be omitted

SECTION XIX. Omit references to the "Council of State"

Cl. (1) (c). At the end add "provided that no residential qualification is imposed upon candidates for election and that women shall have the same rights and privileges as men under the same conditions for being voters and candidates."

(d) Line 40. Omit the word "final."

Line 41. At the end add "without prejudice to any remedy at law."

SECTION XX, Cl. (2). Omit references to the "Council of State" and make consequential changes

For "persons to preside" read "persons to be elected to act as president and vice-president."

Cl. (4). For the words "The Council of State," etc., up to the end substitute—"he shall have the power to pass that law without the assent of the Legislative Assembly, such law to be in force for not more than one year, and not to be renewed unless forty per cent. of the members of the Assembly present and voting are in favour thereof.

After Section XX of the Bill add the following as Section XXA (to be inserted as 67A in the Principal Act):—"The proposals of the Government of India for the appropriation of the revenues of India in any year shall be submitted to the Legislative Assembly for its sanction in the form of resolutions, and the Legislative Assembly shall have full power to deal with them in any manner they like."

"The Governor General in Council shall have power in relation to any such resolution to act as if it had been assented to, notwithstanding the withholding of such assent, if the resolution relates to Army, Navy, foreign affairs or directly affects the public peace or tranquillity of defence of the country, and the Governor-General certifies that the expenditure provided for by the resolution is essential to the discharge of his responsibility for the subject."

"The Governor-General shall also have the power, in cases of emergency, to authorise such expenditure as may be in his opinion necessary for the safety or tranquility or defence of the country."

SECTION XXI, Cl. (1). In place of this clause substitute the following:—"Instead of sub-section (3) of Section 36 of the Principal Act, read as follows: Half the number of the members of the Executive Council, if more than one, shall be Indians. In addition to these the Governor-General shall, by notification appoint Ministers to administer subjects other than those relating to Army, Navy, foreign affairs (excepting relations with Colonies and Dominions), relations with Indian Ruling Princes and matters directly affecting public peace, tranquillity and defence of the country.

Such Ministers shall be paid the same salary as that paid to a member of the Council; bnt no Minister shall hold office for a longer period than three months unless he is or becomes an elected member of the Legislative Assembly."

After Section XXI of the Bill insert Section XXIA as follows—"Between Sections 33 and 34 of the Principal Act insert the following new Section as XXXIIIA:—

"The Government of India shall have indisputable authority in matters directly concerning peace tranquillity and defence of the country subject to the following:—

(a) "That all Indians subjects of His Majesty and all the subjects naturalised or resident in India are equal before the law, and there shall be no penal or administrative law in force in India, whether substantive or procedural, of a discriminative nature.

(b) "That no Indian subject of His Majesty shall be liable to suffer in liberty, life, property or in respect of free speech or writing or of the right of association, except under sentence by an ordinary court of justice and as a result of lawful and open trial.

(c) "That every Indian subject shall be entitled to bear arms, subject to the purchase of a licence, and that right shall not be taken away save by sentence of ordinary court of justice.

(d) "That the Press shall be free, and that no licence or security shall be demanded on the registration of a press or a newspaper.

(e) "That corporal punishment shall not be inflicted on any Indian subject of His Majesty save under conditions applying equally to all other British subjects."

SECTION XXII. In line 23 read "shall" instead of "may," and omit at the end "and salary of the Secretary of State, etc."

Also add at the end—"There shall be two permanent Under Secretaries, one of whom shall be an Indian."

After Section XXII add the following:—"The Council called the Council of India is abolished, and provisions relating to such Council in the Principal Act do cease to have any effect. The powers of the said Council under the Act may be exercised by the Secretary of State under rules and regulations made under the Act."

"In Section 67, Cl. (2), sub-clause (a) in the Principal Act shall cease to have any effect."

SECTION XXIV, Cl. (1). In line 10, after the word "employed," insert "in any of the posts mentioned in the third schedule of the Principal Act."

SECTION XXV. After clause (2) add "Provided that not less than 50 per cent. of the total number of the Civil Servants to be appointed in any branch of service in any year shall be recruited in India."

SECTION XXVI. Cl. (2). For "five members" read "six members, three of whom shall be Indians elected by the Indian Legislature."

SECTION XXVIII, Cl. (1). At the end add "Half of whom shall be Indians elected by the Indian Legislature."

Cl. (2). Omit all words after the words "shall report as to whether" and substitute the following—"time had not arrived for granting full responsible government to India."

SECTION XXXII. Omit words "Provided that . . . . officials."

SCHEDULES I, II, and III of the Bill should be amended in the light of and in conformity with the above amendments.

General Secretary.

PART III.

FUNCTIONS AND FRANCHISE.

I. FUNCTIONS.

As we propose that there shall be no division of functions in the Provinces, we do not feel called upon to offer any detailed remarks on the findings of the Functions Committee Report in this respect. The view of the Congress and the terms of reference to the Committee are diametrically opposed. The Congress holds that the people of India are to-day fit for full Responsible Government and that, at least in the provinces, it should be established at once. The terms of reference to the Committee, on the contrary, left them no option but to divide the provincial subjects into "Reserved" and "Transferred" irrespective of the question whether the people are fit or not. Even then, the Committee could have gone much further than they have done. They have chosen, however, to be ill-liberal. They have sacrificed the interests entrusted to them to the securing of unanimity.

Subject, however, to our fundamental disagreement with the terms of reference to the Committee as regards the division of subjects in the Provinces, it is necessary to refer to some points, which are as follows:—

1. Regarding the list of Provincial and all-India subjects on pp. 19–28, we make the following remarks:—

(a) We do not see the necessity, in the Provincial Councils, for the special standing orders required for the passing of Railway and Tramway legislation. The proposal is, in fact, obviously dangerous to public interests.

(b) The powers of borrowing and taxation need not be subject to Indian Legislation (page 82), but should be subject only to fixed statutory rules.

(c) The establishment and control of new Universities should be left to the Provincial Legislatures without interference by the Central Government.

(d) Co-operative societies need not be subject to Indian Legislation.

(e) The control of newspapers and printing presses should be left to the government of each province.

(f) Prisons and reformatories should be under provincial control.

(g) Franchise and Elections for Provincial Council should be left entirely to the Provincial Governments and Legislatures under the rules laid down under the statute.

(h) Control of Members of the Services, other than All-India, should be left to the Provincial Councils.

2. We consider that the list of new taxes which may be raised in the provinces, given in para. 75, should be mentioned in a schedule to be appended to the Bill.

3. The division between Provincial and Indian Finances suggested in paras. 200 to 208 of the Report on Indian Constitutional Reforms should be given statutory effect.

II. FRANCHISE.

With regard to the report of the Franchise Committee, we invite the attention of the Joint Committee to the following points.

1. Although "the Franchise and Electoral Law" has been made a transferred subject, subject to Indian Legislation, the effect of the recommendation is lost by the provision of sub-clause 3 of clause 3, which leaves the determination of questions regarding the Franchise and Election to the rules to be framed under the Principal Act. If the recommendation of the Committee has any meaning, the clause ought to provide that such rules shall be subject to any law made by the Indian or any provincial legislation.

2. We cannot reconcile ourselves to the recommendation which imposes on the women of India sex disqualification. We strongly hold that the disqualification should be removed from the outset. We believe that the vast bulk of informed opinion in India is strongly in support of the removal of sex disqualification in the franchise, and it would appear that the balance of evidence before the Franchise Committee was in favour of it.

3. The franchise could have been made much wider. There is no reason why all those who can read and write should not be allowed to vote. In Madras, Bombay and the Punjab particularly the number of voters should be materially increased. The Bombay Government had estimated figures making up a million voters. The Committee's scheme is for only 653,000. In fact, in the Bombay Presidency as many as three to four lacs of people have been enjoying Municipal and Local Board franchise for the last forty years, and the Committee now proposes the enfranchisement of only six and a half lacs for the Provisional Legislature.

4. The recommendation to treat certain kinds of military services as qualifying for the vote is ill-liberal. There should, in our opinion, be no distinction between one kind of military service and another.

5. The size of the Councils and the proportion of the elected members thereon should be as laid down in the Resolutions of the Delhi Congress. The recommendation of the Committee on this question in regard to Provincial Councils, though it does not go far enough, is fairly satisfactory, but in regard to the Indian Legislative Council it is inadequate and disappointing.

6. The recommendation to constitute the Indian Legislative Council by indirect election is unacceptable, and we are strongly opposed to it.

7. The number of seats allotted to Communal and Special Electorates is more than the necessities of the situation justify. We desire, particularly, to protest against the exaggerated representation proposed to be given to capitalistic and trade interests, chiefly European. We cannot understand why the Calcutta Trades Association, an association of shopkeepers, not confined to British subjects, should be entitled to elect two representatives to the Bengal Provincial Council. We do not know what reasonable claim can be advanced for their representation outside the general European electorate. The Bengal Chamber of Commerce is to have four members, "Jute Interests," two members, and the Indian Mining Association, Indian Tea Association and Tea Planters one member each on the Provincial Council! The absurdity of this is illustrated when it is seen that the people of the province, through their general and communal electorates, representing a population of 45 millions, will return only 78 members, while 11 members will represent foreign trade and capitalistic interests through a handful of commercial and trading firms; while the representation of capitalistic interests in other provinces, if not on so large a scale, is equally objectionable. The proposal to give the Bombay Trades Association, consisting of thirty or forty shopkeepers, representation in the Provincial Council, who are, again, not all British subjects, is, we venture to say, preposterous. We do not know any country in the world where a parallel can be found to these novel proposals for the special representation of capitalists and traders, and we would ask the Committee to recommend its removal altogether.

8. University seats should not be restricted to the Fellows, but all graduates should be allowed a vote.

9. If landholders are to have special representation, a standard of land revenue should be prescribed as entitling them to vote.

10. Dismissal from Government service or conviction for an offence should not operate as a disqualification for membership of the Legislature. The suggestion that the Governor-in-Council should be allowed to decide whether a person has been guilty of moral turpitude or not, in any circumstances, is highly objectionable and dangerous, especially where the individual has been dismissed from Government service, and we strongly urge the removal of these disqualifications.

11. There should be no residential qualification for candidates in any province. The reasons advanced in the Report for the distinctions proposed are unconvincing.

General Secretary

APPENDIX I.

RESOLUTIONS, BEARING ON THE QUESTION OF INDIAN CONSTITUTIONAL REFORMS, PASSED BY THE INDIAN NATIONAL CONGRESS AT ITS THIRTY-THIRD SESSION AT DELHI, DECEMBER, 1918.

III. That this Congress re-affirms resolution numbers 2, 3, 4 and 11 passed at the Special Session of the Indian National Congress held in Bombay.

"No. 2. That this Congress re-affirms the principles of reform contained in the resolutions relating to self-government adopted in the Indian National Congress and the All-India Muslim League held at Lucknow in December, 1916, and at Calcutta in December, 1917, and declares that nothing less than self-government within the Empire can satisfy the Indian people, and, by enabling it to take its rightful place as a free and self-governing nation in the British Commonwealth, strengthen the connection between Great Britain and India."

"No. 3. That this Congress declares that the people of India are fit for responsible government, and repudiates the assumption to the contrary contained in the Report on Indian Constitutional Reforms."

"No. 4. The Government of India shall have undivided administrative authority in matters directly concerning peace, tranquillity and the defence of the country, subject to the following:—

"That the Statute to be passed by the Parliament should include the declaration of the rights of the people of India as British citizens."

"(a) That all Indian subjects of His Majesty and all the subjects naturalised or resident in India are equal before the law, and there shall be no penal nor administrative law in force in this country, whether substantive or procedural, of a discriminative nature;

"(b) That no Indian subject of His Majesty shall be liable to suffer in liberty, life, property or in respect of free speech or writing, or of the right of association, except under sentence by an ordinary Court of Justice and as a result of lawful and open trial;

"(c) That every Indian subject shall be entitled to bear arms, subject to the purchase of a licence, as in Great Britain, and that the right shall not be taken away save by a sentence of an ordinary Court of Justice;

"(d) That the Press shall be free and that no licence or security shall be demanded on the registration of a press or a newspaper;

"(e) That corporal punishment shall not be inflicted on any Indian subject of His Majesty save under conditions applying equally to all other British subjects."

"No 11. This Congress places on record its deep disappointment at the altogether inadequate response made by the Government to the demand for the grant of commissions to Indians in the Army, and is of opinion that steps should be immediately taken so as to enable the grant to Indians at an early date of at least 25 per cent. of the commissions in the Army, the proportion to be gradually increased."

IV. (a) That this Congress also re-affirms Resolution No. 5, relating to self-government, passed at the Special Sessions of the Congress held in Bombay, subject to this, that in view of the expression of opinion in the country since the sitting of the said Special Session, this Congress is of opinion that so far as the provinces are concerned full responsible government should be granted at once, and that no part of British India should be excluded from the benefit of the proposed Constitutional Reforms.

(b) That non-official Europeans should not be allowed to form separate electorates on the ground that they represent the mining or the tea industries, and if they are allowed such representation, they should be limited to their proportion compared to the population of the provinces concerned.

"No. 5. That this Congress appreciates the earnest attempt on the part of the Right Honourable the Secretary of State and His Excellency the Viceroy to inaugurate a system of responsible Government in India, and while it recognises that some of the proposals constitute an advance on the present conditions in some directions it is of opinion that the proposals as a whole are disappointing and unsatisfactory, and suggests the following modifications as absolutely necessary to constitute a substantial step towards respo sible government."

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

(1) That a system of "reserved" and "transferred" subjects similar to that proposed for the provinces shall be adopted for the Central Government.

(2) That the "reserved" subjects shall be Foreign Affairs (excepting relations with the Colonies and the Dominions), the Army, the Navy and the relations with the Indian Ruling Princes, and, subject to the declaration of rights urged in Resolution IV., matters directly affecting peace, tranquillity and the defence of the country, and that all other subjects shall be transferred.

(3) The allotments required for the "reserved" subjects should be the first charge on the revenue.

(4) The procedure for the adoption of the budget should be on the lines laid down for the provinces.

(5) All legislation shall be by bills introduced into the Legislative Assembly, provided that if in the case of the "reserved" subjects, the Legislative Council does not pass such measures as the Government may deem necessary, the Governor-General in Council may provide for the same by regulations, such regulations to be in force for one year, but not to be renewed unless 40 per cent. of the members of the Assembly present and voting are in favour of them.

(6) There shall be no Council of State; but if the Council of State is to be constituted, at least half of its total strength shall consist of elected members, and that the procedure by certification shall be confined to the "reserved" subjects.

(7) At least half the number of the Executive Councillors (if there be more than one) in charge of the reserved subjects should be Indians.

THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

(8) The number of the members of the Legislative Assembly should be raised to 150 and the proportion of elected members should be four-fifths.

(9) The President and the Vice-President of the Legislative Assembly should be elected by the Assembly.

(10) The Legislative Assembly should have power to make or modify its own rules of business, and they shall not require the sanction of the Governor-General.

(11) There should be an obligation to convene meetings of the Council and the Assembly at stated intervals, or on the requisition of a certain proportion of members.

(12) A statutory guarantee should be given that full responsible Government should be established in the whole of British India within a period not exceeding 15 years.

THE PROVINCES.

The Executive.

(1) There should be no additional members of the Executive Government without portfolios.

(2) From the commencement of the first reformed Councils the principle of the responsibility of Ministers to the Legislature shall come into effect.

(3) The status and salary of the Ministers shall be the same as that of the members of the Executive Council.

(4) At least half the number of the Executive Councillors in charge of reserved subjects (if there be more than one) should be Indians.

(5) The budget shall be under the control of the Legislature subject to the contribution to the Government of India and to the allocation of a fixed sum for the "reserved" subjects; and should fresh taxation be necessary, it should be imposed by the Provincial Government as a whole for both transferred and "reserved" subjects.

LEGISLATURE.

(1) While holding that the people are ripe for the introduction of full provincial autonomy, the Congress is yet prepared, with a view to facilitating the passage of the reforms, and to save the time which would otherwise be lost in controversy, to leave the departments of law, police and justice (prisons excepted) in the hands of the Executive Government in all provinces for a period of six years. The Executive and Judicial Departments must be separated at once.

(2) The President and the Vice-President should be elected by the Council.

(3) The proposal to institute a Grand Committee should be dropped. The provincial legislative council shall legislate in respect of all matters within the jurisdiction of the provincial government, including law, justice and police, but where the Government is not satisfied with the decision of the Legislative Council in respect of matters relating to law, justice and police, it shall be open to the Government to refer the matter to the Government of India. The Government of India may refer the matter to the Indian Legislature, and the ordinary procedure shall follow. But if Grand Committees are instituted, this Congress is of opinion that no less than one half of their strength shall be elected by the Legislative Councils.

(4) The proportion of elected members in the Legislative Council shall be four-fifths.

(5) Whenever the Legislative Assembly, the Council of State or the Legislative Council is dissolved, it shall be obligatory on the Governor-General or the Governor, as the case may be, to order the necessary election and to re-summon the body dissolved within a period of three months from the date of dissolution. No dissolution of the Legislature shall take place except by way of appeal to the electorate, and the reason shall be stated in writing and countersigned by the ministers.

PARLIAMENT AND INDIA OFFICE.

(a) The Council of India shall be abolished, and there shall be two permanent under-secretaries to assist the Secretary of State for India, one of whom shall be an Indian.

(b) All the charges in respect of the India Office establishment ahall be placed on the British Estimates.

(c) No financial or administrative powers in regard to the "reserved" subjects should be transferred to the Provincial Governments until such time as they are made responsible regarding them to the electorates, and until then the control of the Parliament and the Secretary of State should continue.

(d) The Committee to be appointed to examine and report on the present constitution of the Council of India shall contain an adequate Indian element.

MUSLIM REPRESENTATION.

The proportion of Mohamedans in the Legislative Councils and the Legislative Assembly, as laid down in the Congress-League Scheme, must be obtained.

FISCAL AUTONOMY.

This Congress is of opinion that, consistently with Imperial interests, the Government of this country should have complete freedom in all fiscal matters, and that the question of provincial contributions to the Imperial Exchequer be referred to the Provincial Congress Committees for opinions to be placed before the next Congress at Delhi.

V. That this Congress re-affirms the resolution No. 6 of the Special Congress demanding that 50 per cent. of the Indian Civil Service should be recruited in India.

IX. Women's Franchise.—That this Congress urges that women possessing the same qualifications as are laid down for men in any part of the scheme shall not be disqualified on account of their sex.

VI. The Punjab.—That this Congress views with grave apprehension the attempt made in certain quarters to assign an inferior position to the Punjab in the Reform Scheme, and urges that having regard to its political, military and historical importance, its wealth, education, social advancement, and its magnificent services during the last war, the Punjab should be placed on a basis of equality with Bengal Madras, Bombay and the United Provinces.

XX. Delhi.—That this Congress strongly recommends that Delhi should be constituted into a Regulation Province, that it should have a Legislative Council to assist the Chief Commissioner and that it should have at least two representatives in the Legislative Assembly

XIV. Ajmer-Merwara.—Having regard to the special importance of Ajmer-Merwara and British Rajputana as a model for the Native States, this Congress supports the claim of that Province that its status should be that of a Regulated Province, and that a council consisting of a majority of elected representatives of the people should be provided in the Reform Scheme, and that two elected representatives of the Province should be allowed on the proposed Legislative Assembly.

VIII. Self-determination.—In view of the pronouncement of President Wilson, Mr. Lloyd George, and other British statesmen, that to ensure the future peace of the world, the principle of self-determination should be applied to all progressive nations.

Be it resolved:—

I. That this Congress claims the recognition of India by the British Parliament and by the Peace Conference as one of the progressive nations to whom the principle of self-determination should be applied.

II. That in the practical application of the principle in India the first step should be:—

(a) The removal of all hindrances to free discussion, and therefore the immediate repeal of all laws, regulations and ordinances restricting the free discussion of political questions whether in the Press, private or public meeting, or otherwise, so that the legitimate aspirations and opinions of all residents in India may be fearlessly expressed; further, the abolition of the laws, regulations and ordinances which confer on the executive the power to arrest, detain, intern, extern or imprison any British subject in India, outside the processes of ordinary civil or criminal law, and the assimilation of the law of sedition to that of England.

(b) The passing of an Act of Parliament which will establish at an early date complete responsible Government in India.

(c) When complete responsible Government shall be thus established, the final authority in all internal affairs shall be the supreme Legislative Assembly as voicing the will of the Indian nation.

Resolved further—

(d) That in the re-construction of Imperial polity, whether in matters affecting the inner relations of the nations constituting it, on questions of foreign policy or in the League of Nations, India shall be accorded the same position as the self-governing Dominions.

XVI. Position of Indians in the Colonies.—That this Congress re-affirms the resolutions passed at previous sessions of the Congress on the subject of the status of British Indians in the self-governing Dominions and the Crown Colonies of the Empire, and once again places on record its sense of resentment and ever-growing dissatisfaction at the continued ill treatment of Indian settlers in the Dominions and Colonies, earnestly hoping that in view of the readjustment of the relations between the component parts of the Empire, the statesmen and people of Great Britain will endeavour to redress the grievances of the Indian settlers.

X. Industrial Development.—While generally welcoming the recommendations of the Industrial Commission and the policy that in future the Government must play an active part in promoting the industrial development of the country, the Congress hopes that in the practical application of this principle the object kept in view will be the encouragement of Indian capital and enterprise and exploitation with the sole aim of making India industrially and economically self-contained and self-dependent.

This Congress placed on record its regret at the exclusion of the tariff question from the scope of the Commission's inquiries, and reiterates its opinion that the industrial development of the country is impossible without fiscal autonomy being granted to her.

This Congress agrees with the Commission that industry should have a separate representation in the Executive Council of the Government of India, but it is of opinion that an Imperial Industrial Executive Board is not necessary.

This Congress welcomes the recommendation of the Commission that the Provincial Department of Industries should be constituted at an early date and urges the same on the Government of India.

This Congress urges that Imperial and Provincial Advisory Boards should be constituted for the purpose of promoting industrial development, and that they should consist of Indians elected by Indian industrial and trades associations and by Chambers of Commerce.

This Congress is of opinion that the proposed Imperial Industrial and Chemical Services should be constituted on a scale of salary and with the objects of having them manned fully by Indians, but that Europeans who are experts in each line should be engaged on short term agreements till they can be replaced by duly qualified Indians.

This Congress is of opinion that the Government should invite the Universities to establish Commercial Colleges, and should help them to do so by substantial grants.

This Congress regrets the absence in the report of recommendations for adequate organisations for financing industries, and urges upon the Government the urgent necessity of starting industrial banks on a scale commensurate with the vast and costly machinery recommended in the report.

XII. Contribution of £45,000,000.—That having regard to the unprecedented economic strain to which India has been subjected during the period of the war, and considering the injury likely to be caused to the infant or nascent industries of the country by the addition of any further burden of heavy taxation, as well as by the facilities enjoyed by competing foreign industries, and in view of the cessation of hostilities, this Congress urges that the Government will, as indicated by Sir William Meyer in his introductory speech, reconsider the matter and relieve India of the burden of the contribution of £45,000,000 for war purposes.

V. J. PATEL,
General Secretary,
INDIAN NATIONAL CONGRESS

APPENDIX II.

IMPORTANT POINTS IN WHICH THE BILL FALLS SHORT OF THE MONTAGU-CHELMSFORD REPORT.

(1) Sec. I (1) cl. b. provides for devolution of authority from the Central to the Provincial Governments in respect of provincial subjects; but it does not provide for the limitations on such devolution contemplated in para. 213 of the Report, viz., "We recognise that, in so far as Provincial Governments of the future will still remain partly bureaucratic in character, there can be no logical reason for relaxing the control of superior official authority over them, nor, indeed, would any general relaxation be approved by Indian opinion."

(2) As regards final devolution, the Report clearly contemplated a clear and well-defined separation of all sources of revenue between the Central and the Provincial Government. (Vide para. 202 of this Report.) The Bill leaves everything to the Government of India (vide sec. I (1) cl. b.).

(3) Sec. I (1) cl. d. leaves the admittedly most important question of the division between reserved and transferred subjects to be determined by the Government of India; but the report in para. 238 clearly contemplated that the list for each province should be settled by the Committee to be appointed for the purpose.

(4) In sec. I (2) (i), the Government of India are given power to make rules to "regulate the extent and conditions of such devolution, allocation and transfer." With regard to all those matters, the Report lays down broad principles which do not find a place in the Bill. In fact, the whole thing is thrown into the melting-pot by the Bill, and the Government of India virtually made the final arbiters.

(5) The proviso to sec. I (2) authorises the revocation or the suspension of the transfer of any subject with the sanction of the Secretary of State in Council, any time after the introduction of the Reforms. The Report in para. 260, clearly contemplated that for the first five years at least the list of transferred subjects was not to be altered.

(6) The Report, in para. 240, provided for powers of intervention by the Government of India in transferred subjects only under certain contingencies which were to be defined exhaustively by the Committee to be appointed for that purpose. But sec. I (3) leaves it to the Government of India to determine when and under what circumstances they will interfere with the administration of transferred subjects. Such limitation as is contemplated in the section is vague, and in practice may be made to mean anything or nothing.

(7) Under the scheme of the joint Report, the relation of the Ministers and the Governor, in respect of transferred departments, was defined thus:—"The portfolios dealing with the transferred subjects would be committed to the Ministers, and on these subjects the Ministers together with the Governor would form the administration. On such subjects, their decisions would be final, subject only to the Governor's advice and control." . . . . "But we do not intend that he should be in a position to refuse assent at discretion to all his Ministers' proposals."

According to the Bill, however, the whole position is reversed, for in sec. 2 (1) it is provided that in respect of transferred subjects, the administration is to consist of the "Governor acting with the Minister." This is not a mere verbal change, for sec. 3 (3) distinctly says, "In relation to a transferred subject the Governor shall be guided by the advice of the Minister in charge. . . . ."

(8) The Report does not contemplate that any of the major provinces, described in the Bill as Governor's provinces, should be administered under the new scheme, without any transferred subjects at all. Yet the Bill says in sec. 3 (1) that even in Governor's provinces the Governor may appoint Ministers, thus making it optional for him to appoint or not to appoint Ministers.

(9) Provision in the Bill that one at least of the members of the Executive Council shall be a person who has been for twelve years in the service of the Crown in India seems opposed to the spirit of the scheme (vide para. 271 of the Report).

(10) Provision in the Bill that a Minister may be dismissed by the Governor, and that his salary may be fixed by him (Governor), is opposed to the spirit of the scheme of the Report.

(11) Provision in the Bill that the Governor may appoint any person not being an elected member of the Legislative Council to be Minister for a period of three months is opposed to the recommendation of the Report in that behalf contained in para. 218.

(12) The Report provided in para. 260 that "the Government of India may, after the first five years, direct that the Ministers' salaries, instead of any longer being treated as a reserved subject, and therefore protected in the last resort by the Governor's order from interference, should be specifically voted each year by the Legislative Council, or failing such direction by the Government of India, it should be open to the Councils at that time or subsequently to demand by resolution that such Ministers' salaries should be voted, and the Government of India should thereupon give effect to such request. The Ministers would in fact become Ministers in the parliamentary sense." These provisions do not find a place in the Bill at all.

(13) Sec. 3 (4) introduces a new provision not found in the joint Report. It is not clear what are the circumstances under which the temporary administration of transferred subjects in the absence of Ministers is to be provided for.

(14) Sec. 5 (2), second part, provides that the Governor may make rules and orders for regulating the relations between his Executive Council and his Ministers for the purpose of the transaction of the business of the Local Government. Now this leaves it open to the Governor to keep the Ministers from having anything to do with the administration of reserved subjects. This does not carry out the ideas contained in the Report, para. 218—"They (the Ministers) would be members of the Executive Government, but not members of the Executive Council." And para. 221, "It is our intention that the Government thus composed and with this distribution of functions shall discharge them as one Government. It is highly desirable that the Executive should cultivate the habit of associated deliberation and essential that it should present a united front to the outside. We would, therefore, suggest that, as a general rule, it should deliberate as a whole. . . "

(15) Proviso (a) to sec. 6 (1) authorises the rule making authority to vary the proportions which the classes of members of Provincial Legislative Councils bear to one another, the only limitation being that at least seventy per cent. of the members shall be elected members. This is against the spirit of the recommendations contained in paras. 227–232 of the Report about Communal representation.

(16) The Report contemplated complete financial devolution to the provinces. In para. 210 it is stated, "We think the best means of freeing the Provincial Governments in this respect will be to schedule certain subjects of taxation as reserved for the provinces. . . ." Sec. 8 (3) (a) leaves it to the rule-making authority, viz., the Government of India, to make the schedule.

(17) In respect of legislative devolution, the Report, in para. 212, specified the purposes for which the Government of India should have a general over-riding power of legislation over the provinces. But sec. 8 (3) (f) leaves it to the Government of India to declare any provincial subject as "subject to Indian legislation," and thus prevent the Provincial Council from legislating on it without the previous sanction of the Governor-General.

(18) Sec. 9 (2) (b) gives the Governor a new power which was not contemplated in the Report. The words are, that "the Governor shall have power in cases of emergency to authorise such expenditure as may be in his opinion necessary . . . . for the carrying on of any department."

(19) Sec. 9 (2) (c) provides that proposals in regard to expenditure and declared by rules to be a permanent charge on provincial revenues shall not be submitted to the Council. This is contrary to what was stated in para. 256 of the Report, viz., that the budget as a whole will be laid before the Council.

(20) The Report, in para. 252, gives the Governor power to nominate to the Grand Committee a bare majority exclusive of himself. Sec. 9 (3) authorises the Governor to nominate an unlimited majority.

(21) The same sub-section gives power to the Grand Committee to "reject" laws. This is against the spirit of the recommendations of the Report about the Grand Committee, an institution proposed merely for the purpose of securing to the Executive Government power of affirmative legislation, under certain contingencies.

(22) Sec. 9 (4) authorising the Governor to certify that a Bill is necessary for the discharge of his responsibility for a reserved subject does not provide for the appeal contemplated in para. 252 of the Report. . . . "It will at this stage be open to the Council by a majority vote to request the Government to refer to the Government of India the question whether the certified Bill deals with a reserved subject."

(23) Sec. 9 (5) evidently refers partly to mixed legislation, treated of in para. 254 of the Report. But the powers of the Governor under this sub-clause are much wider than those contemplated in that paragraph. There the Governor was only to certify in case the Bill trenched on a reserved subject. The sub-section may also refer to proposed legislation on a reserved subject where the Governor may certify that it is essential to the discharge of his responsibility for the peace or tranquillity of the province or of any part thereof. But the Bill provides for the Governor certifying under other circumstances also, which were not contemplated in the Report, viz., "The safety or tranquillity of another province," or "The interests of a specified reserved subject."

(24) There is no provision in the Bill that the elected element on the Grand Committee shall be elected ad hoc by the elected members of the Legislative Council on the system of transferable vote, and that not more than two-thirds of the nominated members shall be officials. (Vide para. 252 of the Report.)

(25) There is no provision that a certificated Bill, after being debated in the Grand Committee and modified as may be determined, will be reported to the whole Council, who will have a right to pass a resolution recording any objection which refers to the principle or details of the measure, and that such resolution will accompany the Act when it is submitted to the Governor-General and the Secretary of State (vide para. 253 of the Report).

(26) Para. 236 of the Report provided that while the existing rules of procedure should continue to govern the Provincial Councils, they should have the power to modify them, with the sanction of the Governor. But sec. 9 (6) and (7) do not carry into effect this recommendation.

(27) Sec. 10 (1) gives new powers to the Governor which do not find a place in the Report, viz., a power of recommending amendments to the Council, and a power of reserving a Bill for the consideration of the Governor-General (see para. 254 of the Report).

(28) Sec. 10 (3) also gives a new power, not found in the Report, to the Governor-General to reserve a provincial Act for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure thereon.

(29) Sec. 12 (1) and (2) authorises the Governor-General in Council to place any part of a Governor's province under a Deputy-Governor, or to declare any territory within a Governor's province a backward tract, and thus exclude those areas from the operation of the Reforms or parts thereof. This is a much more general power than that contemplated in para. 199 of the Report, which concludes thus :—"The typically backward tracts should be excluded from the jurisdiction of the reformed Provincial Governments, and administered by the head of the province."

(30) Although the Report in para. 218 contemplates that members of the Executive Council shall be only two, the Bill does not propose amendment of sec. 47 of the Government of India Act, which permits the appointment of four members.

(31) Although the Report in para. 234 recommends that the term "Additional Members" as applied to all members of the "Legislative Council other than ex-officio" members should be dropped, the Bill makes no provision to carry out that recommendation.

(32) Although the Report in paras. 235 and 285 recommend the appointment of standing Committees of the Legislative bodies both in the provinces and in the Government of India, the Bill makes no provision to carry out that recommendation.

(33) There is no provision in this Bill extending the right of supplementary questions to any member, whether he be the asker of the original question or not, neither is there a provision restricting the existing unlimited discretion of the Governor to disallow questions and resolutions (vide para. 236 of the Report).

(34) There is no provision in the Bill that the Ministers shall be Indians, as contemplated in the Report.

(35) Sec. 16 (2) does not fix any limits on communal representation in the Indian Legislative Assembly such as are contemplated in the Report.

(36) The Report did not give any power to the Governor-General to require the attendance of the Members of the Legislative Assembly to hear him address them. This power is now given by sec. 16 (3).

(37) Sec. 17 (b) authorises the Governor to extend for an unlimited time the life of the Legislative Assembly and the Council of State. He was to have no such power under the Report.

(38) The Report, para. 286, stated ". . . . . We think that the rules of procedure for both bodies should be made in the first instance by the Governor-General in Council. The Assembly and the Council of State should both have power to modify their rules with the sanction of the Governor General. . . . ." Sec. 20 (2) leaves it to the Government of India to make all the rules. And, once they are made, sec. 30 excludes the jurisdiction of the Indian Legislatures to repeal or alter them.

(39) Sec. 20 (3) gives a new power to the Governor-General of returning Bills for re-consideration to the Legislature, which is not found in para. 279 of the Report.

(40) The Report, para. 279, contemplated the passage of laws in the Council of State, without reference to the Legislative Assembly, only in cases of emergency so certified by the Governor-General in Council. But sec. 20 (4) authorises such legislation even in cases other than those of emergency.

(41) Sec. 23 authorises the Secretary of State in Council to divest himself and the Governor-General in Council of the powers of superintendence, direction and control vested in them; but does not give statutory effect to the principles enunciated in the Report, viz., that the devolution should be only in proportion to the development of responsible government in India.

(42) Sec. 28 (2) authorises the periodic Commission to report as to what extent it is desirable to modify the degree of responsible government then existing in any province, without expressing the limitation on that power contained in para. 261 of the Report, viz., that such recommendation should be made only if serious maladministration were established.

(43) Sec. 29 was not contemplated at all in the Report.

(44) There is no provision in favour of the appointment of a Select Committee of the House of Commons on Indian affairs. (Vide para. 295 of the Report.)

(45) Sec. 32 of the Bill gives a new power to the executive in India to treat certain officials as non-officials for the purpose of enabling them to stand as candidates for the Legislative Assemblies.

(46) Sec. 33 (2) gives very wide powers to the Executive not contemplated by the Report

(47) There is no provision, as recommended in paras. 233 and 275 of the Report, that nominated official members shall have freedom of speech and vote except when otherwise directed.

(48) There is no provision in the Bill abolishing all racial distinctions in Acts and Regulations for appointment to public services as recommended in para. 315 of the Report.

(49) There is no provision requiring the establishment of a system of recruitment in India to all public services side by side with recruitment in England, while such a step is recommended in para. 316 of the Report.

(50) There is no provision guaranteeing that in the Indian Civil Service the percentage of recruitment in India shall be 33 per cent. of the superior posts, increasing annually by $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. until the position is reviewed by the proposed Parliamentary Commissions and fixing the definite percentages of recruitment in India with specified rates of increase for all other public services. (Vide paras. 316 and 317 of the Report.)

APPENDIX D.

PAPER handed in by Mrs. Sarojini Naidu on 6th August, 1919. (See Question 2145.)

A PLEA FOR THE FRANCHISE OF INDIAN WOMEN to the Members of the Joint Parliamentary Committee on Indian Reform, by Mrs. SAROJINI NAIDU, K.I.H., Fellow of the Royal Society of Literature, Great Britain and Ireland; Vice-President of the Bombay Branch of the All-India Home Rule League.

Not without a due sense of my great privilege do I venture to lay before this Committee, in briefest outline, some of the reasons on which the women of India base their claim to equal franchise in the scheme of reforms to inaugurate responsible self-government for India.

I may observe that my sole title to be regarded as an All-India representative of my sex on a question of such far-reaching importance lies in the fact that I am intimately aware of every shade of orthodox and progressive opinion alike, throughout the country, and I am closely associated with all the larger public movements of the day, especially in relation to the vital and delicate problem of the Hindu-Muslim unity.

There are two reasons why I desire to dwell for a moment on the ancient and historic Indian tradition of woman's place and purpose in the civic and spiritual life of the nation, and to recall the versatile and illustrious record of her contribution to the national achievement by her wit and wisdom, her valour, devotion and self-sacrifice, as scholar and statesman, soldier, saint; queen of her own social kingdom and compassionate servant of suffering humanity.

Firstly: To refute the reiterated argument of the illiberal or uninstructed opponent of women's suffrage as being too premature, or too novel and radical a departure from accepted custom likely to offend or alarm a sensitive and stationary prejudice.

Secondly: To demonstrate that the Indian woman is essentially conservative in her impulse and inspiration; and so far from demanding an alien standard of emancipation, she desires that her evolution should be no more than an ample and authentic efflorescence of an age long ideal of dedicated service whose roots are deep hidden in the past.

I do not for one instant deny that the story of her progressive development has suffered severe interruption and shared in that general decline—I had almost said decadence—that befalls a nation with so continuous a chronicle of subjection to foreign rule; but of recent years the woman of the Indian renaissance, largely owing to the stimulus of invigorating Western ideas and influences has once more vindicated herself as not wholly unworthy of her own high social and spiritual inheritance. And already she is beginning to recover her natural place and establish her prerogatives as an integral part of the national life.

It is indeed a curious and startling irony of fate that the trend of a doubtless conscientious, but over-cautious, official decision is to withhold from her a formal legislative sanction for a privilege which is already hers in spirit and substance, tacitly acknowledged and widely exercised, for the power of the Indian woman is supreme and her influence incalculable in the inner life of her own people. I do not exaggerate when I assert that there is no summit to which she might not aspire or attain in any sphere of our national energy or enterprise unhampered save by the limitations of her own personal ambition and ability.

Wherein has her sex disqualified the Indian woman, or disinherited her, from the rich honours she has earned in equal emulation and comradeship with her brother in every field of intellectual or patriotic endeavour?

In our older universities she has won brilliant distinction in the arts and sciences, medicine, law, and Oriental learning. She holds office in the courts and senates of our younger universities, like the Hindu University of Benares and the Women's University of Poonah and the National University, as also in the Bombay University.

She has evinced her creative talent in literature and music; she has proved her consummate tact and resource in administering vast properties and intricate affairs, and demonstrated beyond all question her marvellous capacity to organise and sustain great educational institutions and large philanthropic missions for social service. She has been pre-eminently associated with the political life of the country, uplifting the voice of her indignation against all measures of unjust and oppressive legislation, like the Partition of Bengal, the Press Act, and the Rowlatt Bill; she has accorded her cordial support to all beneficent social and economic measures, like Gokhale's Bill for free and compulsory education, the Civil Marriage Bill of Mr. Basu, the Inter-Caste Marriage Bill of Mr. Patel, and the Swadeshei Movement inaugurated by my friend and leader Mahatma Gandhi, and all efforts to ameliorate the condition of the depressed and afflicted members of our Society

Moreover, not only has she participated in the programmes of our great periodic national assemblies, like the National Congress, the Muslim League, the Social Reform and Social Service Conferences, but has not infrequently been called upon to guide their deliberations, direct their policies, harmonise their differences, and unite their ideals towards a common goal of self-realization.

Where then lies the logic of their refusal of a franchise to Pandita Ramabai, or Swarna Kuman Ghosal? To Ramabai Ranade or Kamala Satthianadhan? To Kamini Sen or Shireenbai Cursetji? To Nagutai Joshi or Anasuya Sarabhai? To Abola Bose or Cornelia Serabji? To Indira Devi or Saralei Devi? To Mrs. Chandrasekharier, of Mysore, or Mrs. Sadashiviyer of Madras?

And what of that group of women in the seclusion of the Purdah, whose culture and accomplishment rival the golden age of the Saracens Sultan Jehan of Bhopal and Nazli Raffia of Janjira, Abru Begum, Tyaba Begum, Khujista Sultana Begum; Abadi Banu, the lion-hearted mother of the Ali brothers; the courageous young wife of the poet Hasrat Mohani, the late Suharwardya Begum who, from her sequestered corner, set papers in Oriental Classics for the Calcutta University, and Amina Hydari, who won the Kaiser-i-Hind decoration for her selfless services in a time of tragic distress in the Hyderabad State.

But it is the Purdah which constitutes the chief weapon in the armoury of opposition against franchise for Indian women. I readily concede that it might in its initial stages seriously inconvenience and complicate the electoral system, and perhaps even be attended with temporary danger of fraudulent votes.

Although it is no part of either my mandate or my mission to ask for any concession or preferential treatment for women, I am still constrained to say that I fail to understand, when the interests of small political minorities of men are safeguarded with a scrupulous care, why it might not be possible in course of time to extend a similar chivalrous consideration to the Purdahnashin in those local and limited areas where this custom is rigidly enforced, for I am sure that her vote would usually be exercised with intelligence and discretion and prove a valuable acquisition to the country.

Without discussing the merits or demerits of this old social custom, I am convinced that, like all time-honoured but already obsolete social observances and usages, the Purdah system can no longer remain immutable, but must readjust itself to the needs and demands of a widespread national re-awakening. And after all, the terrors of the polling booth would scarcely daunt the Purdahnashin who in the course of her religious pilgrimages habitually encounters immense multitudes and becomes no more than a casual unit of a heterogeneous pilgrim democracy.

What, however, of the unsequestered women of Malabar and Madras, the Maharashtra and Gujrat; of the enlightened women of the Sikh, Parsi and Christian Communities, of the Arya Samaj of Punjab, and the Brahmo Samaj of Bengal? Whether the franchise be one of literacy or of property, their inclusion would in no wise disturb or deflect the normal electoral arrangements.

In the name of the women of India, I make my appeal to the statesmen of a glorious country whose cherished freedom is broad-based upon a people's will. There is not one citadel of Hindu civilization, or one centre of Islamic culture where I have not scattered broadcast my message of India's duty and destiny among the free nations of the world. I have spoken to the youths in their academies, to the women in their walled gardens, to the merchants in the market place, to the peasants in the shade of their fig and banyan trees, but how shall my prophecy be realised and how shall my country take her pre-destined place worthily in the noble world-federation of liberated peoples until the women of India are themselves free and enfranchised, and stand as the guardians of her national honour and the symbols of her national righteousness?

APPENDIX E.

STATEMENT handed in by Sir Frank Sly. (See Question 2167.)

I am a member of the Indian Civil Service, and have served for 32 years in India, mainly in the Central Provinces, but I have also been employed with the Government of India and on special duty with several committees. I have consequently visited most provinces on several occasions, and have thus enjoyed opportunities for wider experience than usually falls to the lot of an Indian civil servant. My last employment was as Deputy-Chairman of the Franchise Committee presided over by Lord Southborough. In his evidence before the Joint Parliamentary Committee, Lord Southborough has already given a full account of the work of the Franchise Committee, with which I am generally in full agreement, but I should like to supplement it on some important points.

2. I am doubtful whether it was made sufficiently clear that our proposals, which in most cases received the assent of the local governments, varied frequently in material respects from the first schemes put forward by local governments. The first schemes were tested by us during the examination of the official witnesses; we also gave full weight to the evidence of the non-official witnesses and the views of the added members. It was only after consideration of all the material before us that conferences were held with the local governments, and as a result of which final schemes were prepared generally commanding their approval. An examination of the papers will show that our proposals often vary materially from the first scheme of the local government, for instance in such important matters as the franchise qualifications, the proposed constituencies, rural and urban, the extent of the representation allotted to communal and other special interests, the size of the legislative council and the like. Thus we did not follow blindly the first schemes of local governments, but formulated proposals after full consideration of all the available material and after personal discussion of that material with the local government. The Government of India did not favour us with their views on any of the general questions involved, with the exception of the memorandum on the Indian Legislative Assembly (page 21 of the White Paper).

3. We enquired with a considerable amount of detail into the machinery available for the conduct of elections, both in the evidence of witnesses, official and non-official, and in our conferences with local governments. For instance, we enquired into the working of elections to local bodies, municipal and district council; we discussed the classes and numbers of officials suitable for employment as polling officers, the classes and numbers of non-official gentlemen suitable to supplement the official agency, the number of voters that could be polled at each station on the election day, and other similar matters. Not only did we secure the assurance of local governments that elections could be carried out on the franchise proposed by us, but we also satisfied ourselves, so far as we could, that there was a reasonable prospect of this assurance being made good by a suitable election agency.

4. We followed our terms of reference in making the franchise as broad as possible, consistently with the avoidance of any such inordinate extension as might lead to a breakdown of the electoral machinery through sheer weight of numbers. We discussed a proposal for a literacy qualification in addition to a property qualification, but rejected it, partly because we did not see sufficient justification to depart from the principle of a property qualification, and partly because there was no suitable test of literacy. We also endeavoured to find a qualification based on income at a lower level than the income tax limit, but failed except in provinces where there was some form of local taxation on smaller incomes. A qualification based on wages earned would have to rest largely on information supplied by employers under the system of piece-rates usually followed in factories, and under existing conditions such votes would often be at the command of the factory owner. Moreover, much of the factory labour is migratory. It would also involve unfair discrimination in favour of one class of labour.

5. I desire to confirm Lord Southborough's impression that most of the supporters of woman suffrage advocated is more on account of its educative influence for the advancement of women than for its practicability. I also formed the opinion that it was often advocated as a badge of political enlightment likely to influence favourably India's claim for responsible government. An important point is that before us it was urged mainly by men, and not by women. The women witnesses before us represented the All-India Women's Association only, and I am sure that this Association can claim to represent only a very minute fraction of the women of India. I myself tried to induce several educated women to appear before us in support of the claim, and invariably received the reply that they preferred to leave politics to the men and the home to themselves. And I know that one of my Indian colleagues made the same effort on a much larger scale and also failed. We enquired into the working of female suffrage in elections to some local bodies which admit woman suffrage, and our enquiry showed that it is generally exercised very sparingly, except, perhaps, in Bombay City, where the custom of the seclusion of women is not so prevalent as in most other parts of India. In Madras it prevailed until 1897, but was then withdrawn by a new Local Self-Government Act, without attracting much notice or discussion, which shows how little the right was then appreciated. The effective demand for votes for women was not strong in the provinces first visited by us—Bihar and Orissa, United Provinces, and the Punjab, but increased in volume as our enquiry proceeded, and reached its maximum at Bombay. I am opposed to the suggestion that the right might be conceded in some provinces but disallowed in others. Such a course would result in inequality, and in my opinion the question should be decided on the same lines as other general disqualifications. Most of its supporters urged that it would be necessary to arrange separate polling stations for women, and further that female polling officers should be appointed to visit each woman voter in her home and record her vote. We considered that, apart from the danger of personation and other possible abuses, it was quite impracticable to provide an agency of female polling officers on such a scale.

6. In order to assist the Committee in their deliberations on the very important question of communal representation, I wish to give an outline of how the question has presented itself to me during my 32 years of service, even at the risk of mentioning some elementary facts that must be already well known to several members of the Committee We all know that the Indian population is composed of communities of diverse races and religions, who generally live on friendly terms with each other, but liable to burst into antagonism at any moment should a course of real dispute arise. The feeling of antagonism still lies near to the surface, as some recent events have shown. Amongst the Indus the dominant factor is the difference of caste, but even caste is not altogether static. I have seen wealthy and influential individuals force their way into a superior caste. I know a Rajah, whose family was aboriginal but has become Rajput in two generations, and accepted as such by at least some Rajputs. Not infrequently lower castes desired to raise themselves in the social scale of the Hindu religion. A caste, or a section of it which has grown in wealth and importance, discards customs considered impure by a higher caste, and forms itself into a new caste or section of a caste, superior to the old. The later growth of national as apart from communal feeling has somewhat obliterated such separatist tendencies. This growth of a national feeling is most prominent amongst the educated classes, but it permeated to other strata, and amongst backward communities and castes expresses itself not so much as formerly in the desire to raise themselves in the social religious scale, but in trying to raise their status by education, and by taking its place in local affairs. As regards political matters, the backward communities were still largely content to rely on the Government for the protection of their political rights. The politicians found that they could not move forward at the pace they desired, unless they carried the masses with them. Much effort has thus been made to enlist the masses in political propaganda, and to improve their position. The general demand for the extension of primary education and the movement for raising the position of the depressed classes are striking instances. The position was abused by some extremists in the sedition movement. Since the publication of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, separatist tendencies have again become prominent. It is the irony of fate that the publication of this report, with its powerful presentment of the case against communal representation, has evoked the strongest expression of communal feeling that I have experienced throughout my service. Small communities felt that they could no longer rely on Government, but must have separate communal representation, and that not merely in proportion to their numerical strength. This was the position taken up almost without exception by their representatives before the Franchise Committee. Communal representation was opposed in principle by the advanced politicians of the extreme schools whose idealism often seemed to me to overcome their regard for facts, and it must be remembered that they usually belonged to a majority community; but minority communities, backward classes, depressed classes, separate trade interests and associations, all urged their claims to separate representation, often on an extravagant scale. The most striking instance occurred in the Punjab. The Muhammadans, who form 54 per cent. of the population, reiterated their claim for separate communal representation in common with the rest of India. The Sikhs, with only 11 per cent. of the population, claimed one-third of the representation on the plea that they had given one third of the recruits raised in the Punjab; and also demanded the recital of the orthodox Sikh religious creed at the election by every voter claiming to be a Sikh. The Hindus (33 per cent. of the population) urged that they would be squeezed out between the Muhammadan and the Sikh. There were only one or two isolated witnesses who claimed to be Indians with common interests in the Punjab, and ready to entrust them to a general electorate. Another striking instance is the non-Brahman movement in Madras. Although opposed to the admission of their claim for a communal electorate, I fully admit that this seemed to me to be a genuine movement with growing strength behind it, not confined to the principal towns, but extending to some outlying districts. But it is not common to all non-Brahmans. One section appeared before us, and opposed communal representation, although in favour of reservation of seats. Our report states that the non-Brahman exceed the Brahman electors in the proportion of at least 4 to 1. This estimate is taken from the statistics at page 113 et seq. of the Blue Book, the exact figures being 4·77 to 1. It must be remembered that this relates to the franchise proposed by the Madras Government, and that the proportion on the much lower franchise proposed by us will be far greater. The statistics also show that the Braham electors are largely concentrated in five districts (25,541 out of a total of 52,234), so that the voting strength of the non-Brahman will be still more overwhelming in the remaining 20 districts.

7. In regard to the question of direct election to the Council of State, I have examined the outline of the scheme advocated by the Government of India, and find that it results in general constituencies of the average area of 46,600 square miles, or more than one-third of the area of the United Kingdom. It may thus be compared to an arrangement under which England and Wales would return one member, Scotland one, and Ireland one, and that for a country where all kinds of communication are infinitely more backward. The average area of the Mohammedan constituency would be 112,000 square miles, or nearly as large as the whole United Kingdom. The average population of each general constituency would be 15,000,000, which approximates to the combined population of Scotland and Ireland. A scheme under which some 1,500 electors would be scattered over such a large area amongst such a large population is surely a negation of all right principles for direct election. A system under which elections to provincial legislative councils will be conducted under a fairly wide and democratic franchise, whilst election to the Council of State is made by a very restricted electorate, which must be formed on a plutocratic and aristocratic franchise, and under Indian conditions, will be dominated by large territorial magnates, seems to me a dangerous form of political constitution. I also invite attention to the objections of local governments to introducing a system which involves two general elections, and if direct election is also made to the Indian Legislative Assembly, three general elections, at the present juncture in a country where neither the people nor the Government has any experience of even one general election.

MEMORANDUM ON GOVERNMENT OF INDIA DESPATCH, dated 16th April, 1919, commenting on the Report of the Committee on Division of Functions.

Introductory.

1. In dealing with the Government of India's criticisms of the Report of the Functions Committee, contained in their Despatch of 16th April, 1919, it seems convenient to take the points in the same order as that adopted in Mr. Dawson's analysis of the Report and Despatch, i.e., to deal first with the more general criticisms, and to leave the alterations proposed in the lists of subjects (All-India, Provincial and Transferred) to the last.

The general criticisms, apart from the points raised on the lists, are discussed in the first part of this Memorandum under the following heads:—

Administrative Control.
Legislation.
Powers of Governor and Governor in Council in relation to Transferred Subjects.
Public Services.
Finance.

PART I.

General Criticisms.

Administrative Control.

2. Para. 10 of Government of India Despatch.—The intention of the Committee was to avoid any such differentiation between the Ministers and the Executive Council as might be regarded as invidious. It seemed desirable, therefore, to lay down either by instructions or by rule, that personal responsibility is to rest on the Governor for seeing that the orders of the Government of India are given effect to, whether in relation to reserved or transferred subjects.

This recognition of the Governor's personal responsibility is not intended to absolve from responsibility the Members of the Executive Council in the one case or the Ministers in the other. If the Governor's personal responsibility for seeing that the orders of the Government of India are complied with were, by the terms of his instructions or by rule, confined to transferred subjects, this would look like relieving the Ministers of responsibility and subjecting them to a supervision which, if it did not apply also to the other side of the Government, might be regarded as objectionable. In fact, the special personal responsibility of the Governor must in theory be recognised in the case of reserved subjects as well as in the case of transferrred, for it would be his duty in the last resort to overrule his Council if necessary in order to secure compliance with an order of the Government of India.

The question as to the Governor's position in this matter was originally raised in connection with the question of the method of communicating the Government of India's orders (see para. 12, Annexure II, Functions Report). The question of the method of communicating orders, which is merely a question of form, should not be confused with the question of responsibility for seeing that they are carried out. Presumably all orders would be addressed to the Local Government, or to one of their Secretaries, and would be dealt with by the Governor in Council or Governor and Ministers according as they affected a reserved or transferred department.

Legislation.

3. The proposals of the Government of India on the subject of the powers of the Indian and Provincial legislatures are contained in paras. 4, 11–21, 33 and 109 of their Despatch.

4. Para. 4.—In para. 4 they deal with the powers of the Central Government to intervene in transferred subjects, and propose to retain as one of the purposes for which the Government of India may intervene in a tranferred subject the following:—

> "To secure uniformity of legislation where such legislation is considered desirable in the interests of India or of more than one Province."

It appears, however, from what follows, that, when they speak of "securing uniformity," they do not contemplate that such uniformity will be secured by requiring provincial Bills on certain subjects to be submitted for previous sanction, but only recognition of the right of the Indian legislature to legislate on provincial matters in respect of which uniformity of legislation is desirable, coupled with the power of protecting such legislation from provincial amendment except where previous sanction has been obtained. This being so, it seems best to keep this proposal with regard to legislation separate from the question of the purposes for which the Government of India may intervene in a transferred subject by administrative action.

5. Paras. 11–13.—It is not necessary to recapitulate the proposals of the Functions Committee as to the division of legislative powers as stated in the Report, but some explanation appears to be required on two points which have perhaps been treated with undue brevity.

(A) The first head-note to the list of All-India subjects states the intended effect of declaring any provincial matter "subject to Indian legislation" to be that "legislation regulating that matter and powers "reserved by such legislation to the Governor-General in Council are made an All-India subject, and that "the provincial legislature is precluded from legislating thereon without previous sanction." The Government of India remark on the wide powers which might conceivably be conferred on the Governor-General in Council under cover of this provision. It is quite true that the Indian legislature might pass a

Bill on a transferred subject declared to be subject to Indian legislation which would confer on the Governor-General in Council the power of directly administering the subject, but such a proceeding under normal conditions would, of course, be wholly inconsistent with the recognition of the subject as a provincial subject; the real object of the provision is twofold:—

(1) To secure a reserve of ultimate authority in the Government of India, which in abnormal circumstances could be brought temporarily into play for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of Acts passed by the Indian legislature, and thus to meet the objection raised as to separation of legislative and administrative powers; and

(2) to enable the Government of India to exercise limited powers of control in respect of such parts of certain provincial subjects as should be recognised as having more than merely a provincial interest. —For instance, in the case of University legislation certain powers of visitation could be reserved to the Governor-General in Council as is proposed in the Report of the Calcutta University Commission.

(B) With regard to the question of scheduling certain Laws as Laws which may not be repealed or altered by provincial legislatures without previous sanction—the object of this proposal is to prevent tinkering by provincial legislatures with certain Indian Acts of a comprehensive character which, though forming part of or dealing mainly with All-India subjects, also govern or contain provisions affecting provincial subjects.

If the power of the Provinces to legislate on provincial subjects which, though in a sense forming part of All-India subjects, are treated as excluded therefrom for the purposes of the division made, were to be freely exercised in such a way as to alter in its application to these subjects the general framework of the law of the country as laid down in the Indian Codes and other Acts regulating commercial and business relations, serious confusion might result. The reason for the inclusion of particular Acts in the Schedule as proposed by the Functions Committee will appear on reference to the Lists of Subjects; for instance, Civil Law and Criminal Law are made All-India subjects, while the Administration of Justice is made a provincial subject. The Schedule includes the Criminal and Civil Procedure Codes, the Indian Penal Code and the Indian Evidence Act. Again, Commerce (including Banking and Insurance) is an All-India subject, while Industrial Insurance is made a provincial subject. The Schedule includes two general Acts relating to insurance. Trading Companies and other Associations are treated as an All India subject, while Co operative Societies (which are also trading companies of a kind) are made a provincial subject. The Schedule includes the Indian Companies Act. Again, Ports are divided between the Government of India and the provincial governments; the major ports being treated as an All-India subject, and other ports as a provincial subject. The Indian Ports Act (which contains the general law as to the management of ports) is included in the Schedule.

The Schedule thus affords necessary supplementary protection to certain important All-India statutes. The bulk of Indian legislation which requires protection will, however, be safeguarded by the general restrictions proposed, namely:—

(1) By debarring provincial legislatures from legislating on All-India subjects, except with previous sanction, and

(2) By making certain provincial subjects in whole or in part subject to Indian legislation; and to that extent rendering provincial legislation thereon subject to previous sanction.

The Schedule as proposed by the Committee may require some amplification, but in considering this question, the fact that many Acts of the Indian legislature are already fully protected by these general restrictions should be kept in mind.

6. The Government of India's general criticisms of the proposals made by the Functions Committee on the subject of legislation are:—

(1) That they are too complicated.

(2) That, in the case of transferred subjects, the requirement of previous sanction, where applied involves undue interference with the control to be exercised by Ministers over transferred subjects.

The Government of India's alternative proposals are put forward as being at once more simple and more liberal, but it is open to doubt whether this claim to greater simplicity and liberality can in fact be sustained on any single point of importance; while the general effect of these alternative proposals is to blur the line of division between the functions of the Indian and Provincial legislatures, and thus to defeat the main object of the scheme proposed by the Functions Committee.

7. The proposal of the Government of India to retain for the Indian legislature the right to legislate on any provincial subject for the purpose of "securing uniformity" is open to the following objections on general grounds:—

(1) If this right is recognised, the Provinces will not be able to call any portion of the legislative field their own, because, on the plea of uniformity, the Indian legislature may legislate on any subject. It will always be open to question which are the provincial subjects in which uniformity is desirable, and what is the degree of uniformity to be desired in such subjects.

(2) It is to be noted that this power is to be reserved not to the Government of India, but to the Indian legislature. The Government of India discuss the matter in para. 12 as if no legislation would be initiated in the Indian legislature except at the instance of the Government itself, and speak as if the power that is being reserved were a power reserved to the Government, instead of to the legislature. The legislature will claim to put its own interpretation on its own powers, which is not likely to be a restrictive interpretation.

(3) While too comprehensive as applying to all subjects, the power of legislating for the purpose of securing uniformity would be found too narrow when put to the test in respect of particular provincial subjects.

8. Para. 109.—Apart from these general objections, it is necessary to consider the effect of the Government of India's proposals with regard to certain subjects specially affected.

The objection of the Government of India to the proposal of the Functions Committee, that certain provincial subjects should be declared subject to Indian legislation, in so far as that proposal applies to subjects which are to be transferred, might seem to involve an extension of popular control over the subjects affected but the tendency of the alternative proposals put forward by the Government of India is in the result to limit rather than to extend the sphere of popular control.

Their proposals are to retain control of Provincial legislation in relation to transferred subjects in two ways:—

(1) By providing for recognition of the right of the Indian legislature to legislate on any provincial matter in respect of which uniformity of legislation is desirable (para. 12 of Despatch):

(2) By including in the Schedule of Indian Laws which cannot be amended by Provincial legislation without previous sanction certain laws relating to transferred subjects.

Their theoretical objections to giving the power to the Indian legislature to legislate with regard to transferred subjects, and to previous sanction being required for Provincial legislation on transferred subjects, also apply to the two methods of control which they themselves propose.

To take in detail the transferred subjects with reference to which this question arises:—

(1) Local Self-Government.—The Government of India propose that the borrowing power of local authorities shall be regulated by Indian legislation, which will be protected from amendment without previous sanction by Rules framed under the new section 79; and, with regard to taxation by municipal bodies, they propose that the previous consent of the Government of India shall be required for taxation, not included in the provincial schedule, which goes outside the existing scope of local taxation. It is not clear by what machinery effect is to be given to the latter restriction, but it is obvious that the Government of India propose in effect to retain in both these matters the control which, if their objections to the Committee's scheme were well founded, they ought to abandon.

(2) Education.—The Government of India get out of the difficulty by proposing that Secondary and University education shall not be transferred. If Secondary and University education are transferred, then the power to legislate for the purpose of securing uniformity could not reasonably be interpreted as covering, e.g., the legislation which will be required for the purpose of giving effect to the recommendations of the Calcutta University Commission. If the pretext of uniformity were to be used for the purpose of justifying any legislation which it might be thought expedient to pass in relation to Universities and Secondary education, the uncertainty of the title of Provincial Legislatures under this arrangement to any part of the field of legislation would be clearly illustrated.

(3) Registration of Deeds and Documents.—The Government of India propose to include the Indian Registration Act in the Schedule under section 79, so as to protect it from amendment without previous sanction.

In the case of Co-operative Societies, Registration of Births, and Weights and Measures, it is presumed that the Government of India contemplate that any legislation which it is considered expedient to pass would be covered by the proposed provision as to securing uniformity; but in so far as such legislation is passed, and is protected from amendment without previous sanction, the result will be much the same as under the proposals of the Functions Committee.

9. Paras. 14 and 15.—The Government of India object to the proposals with regard to the reservation of Bills as too complex. They seek to simplify them by omitting any provision for compulsory reservation, and propose to give the Governor a general discretionary power of reservation in the exercise of which he is to be guided by his instructions. The reply to this criticism and proposed modification is threefold—

(1) Very little is gained as regards simplicity by eliminating the provision for compulsory reservation:

(2) The requirement that certain classes of Bills shall be reserved is in conformity with precedents established in Colonial constitutions, and is a convenient device for securing special supervision over legislation on certain subjects, and for re-assuring interests affected:

(3) The Government of India recognise that three out of the four classes of Bills which it is proposed to require the Governor to reserve deal with subjects as to which some safeguard is necessary, while they are unwilling to recognise the possible existence of the fourth class.

The Committee's proposal is that the Governor shall be required to reserve—

(a) Bills affecting religion or religious rites and usages;

(b) Bills regulating the constitutions and functions of Universities;

(c) Bills which have the effect of including within a transferred subject matters belonging to reserved subjects;

(d) Bills providing for light railways or tramways other than tramways within municipal areas.

As to (a), the Government of India propose that a portion of the ground at present covered by section 79 (3) (e) of the Government of India Act, under which any Bill affecting the religion or religious rites or usages of any class of British subjects in India requires previous sanction, shall in future be protected by a clause requiring previous sanction to any Bill affecting any fundamental (or general) principle of Hindu or Mohammedan law (para. 19); a wide provision which might be so interpreted as to involve almost as much restriction on provincial initiative as is imposed by the present sub-clause (e); and with regard to religious endowments, they propose to invite the Indian legislature to pass a Bill dealing with the subject, and to provide that provincial legislatures shall be debarred from amending this legislation without previous sanction.

As to (b), the Government of India propose to retain their control of University legislation by making University education a reserved subject. Similarly in the case of (d) they propose that light railways and tramways, other than tramways within municipal areas, shall be a reserved subject.

As to (c), the explanation as to the Bills which the Committee had in view when referring, in para. 37 of their Report, to "Bills which shift the boundaries between transferred and reserved subjects" is to be found in the note against local self-government in the list of Provincial subjects for transfer:—

"It is contemplated that other matters will from time to time be entrusted to local authorities by legislation: where such matters form part of reserved subjects the Bill will be reserved for the consideration of the Govenor-General."

The Committee contemplated that the powers of local authorities might be extended from time to time so as to enable them to deal in their own areas with matters which at present are included in reserved subjects, e.g., Gambling, Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, Control of Motor Vehicles, Fisheries, and Village Forests. As the subtraction of any part of a reserved subject for the purpose of entrusting such part to the control of a local authority has the effect of making such control a part of the transferred subject of local self-government, the change does, incidentally, involve some shifting of the boundaries between reserved and transferred subjects. Any such change involves a reduction in the powers of the Government of India, owing to the fact that its control over transferred subjects is to be much more restricted than its control over reserved subjects, and it therefore seemed proper that any Bill effecting such a change should be reserved for the consideration of the Governor-General. It was not contemplated by the Functions Committee that in any larger sense the boundaries between transferred and reserved subjects would be shifted by provincial legislation.

It may be pointed out that, under the provisions embodied in the Bill with regard to the certification of Bills, it will always be open to the Governor to block any proposed measure which would have the effect of making a portion of a reserved subject a transferred subject.

10. Para. 16.—The Functions Committee contemplated, as is apparent from para. 36 of their report, that the Governor would always have power to return a Bill to his Council for further consideration, apart from any question of reservation.

With regard to the proposal that where a Bill has been reserved, its subsequent return for consideration by the Provincial Legislative Council should be "by the personal Orders of the Governor-General," it seemed to the Committee inexpedient to bring the Governor-General into direct relations with a Provincial Legislative Council. The Committee's proposal, therefore, was that, in the case of a reserved Bill, the Governor himself should be responsible for returning the Bill for further consideration by the Council, with any recommendations as to its amendment, after consultation with the Governor-General, and subject to the Governor-General's consent being obtained. The Governor will, normally, from his acquaintance with the local situation, be in a better position than the Governor-General for judging whether anything is likely to be gained by returning a Bill for further consideration.

11. The latter portion of para. 16 appears to contemplate the return by the Governor-General of a provincial Bill for further consideration by a Provincial Legislative Council in cases where the Governor himself has not reserved the Bill, but has assented to it. This seems contrary to the whole idea of the process of reservation. Once the Governor of the Province has assented to the Bill, the Provincial Council cannot be invited to alter it. If the Governor-General finds himself unable to assent to a Provincial Bill in the form in which it has been assented to by the Governor, it must either be vetoed or reserved for his Majesty's pleasure under clause 10 (3) of the Bill. If a Bill could be returned to the Provincial Council for further consideration after the Governor had given his assent, the distinction between assent and reservation would for practical purposes disappear, and with it the responsibility of the Governor of the province for assent to legislation, which the Government of India are anxious to preserve intact.

12. Para. 17.—It appears from this paragraph that the Government of India contemplate that, under the power which they wish to reserve to the Indian legislature to legislate upon any provincial subject for the purpose of securing uniformity, general laws will be passed dealing with diseases of men, animals and plants, and the destruction of pests, and that such laws will not be subject to amendment by provincial councils without previous sanction. The proposal of the Functions Committee (para. 40) was that in regard to these matters, "It should be definitely recognised that it is open to the Indian legislature to legislate, notwithstanding that they fall within the limits of provincial subjects which are not classified as subject to Indian legislation. The provinces will, however, retain their own freedom to legislate on these subjects without previous sanction, except that, where the Indian legislature passes a law of general application dealing with these subjects, it will be open to that legislature to prescribe that a provincial legislature shall not be competent to amend such a law without obtaining previous sanction."

This plan is objected to as involving "an indeterminate treatment of the question" and as "introducing a complication which the circumstances hardly justify." It may however be remarked that the Government of India's method of dealing with the matter is at least equally indeterminate. Their proposal—that the Indian legislature should retain the right to legislate on any provincial subject for the purpose of securing uniformity—applies this indeterminate treatment to the whole field of provincial legislation. The difficulty with regard to the proposal of the Functions Committee is really one of form rather than of substance. The proposal in itself is simple enough—to leave the Provincial Councils the power of initiating legislation on these various matters without the requirement of previous sanction, but to keep a door open for intervention by the Indian legislature, by using such terms as will prevent the application to these subjects of the convention as to non-intervention in provincial subjects. All that it is necessary to do in order to give formal effect to this proposal is to insert some reference to the powers of the Indian legislature in the description of the provincial subjects in question. For instance, if the description of provincial subject No. 3.—Public Health, Sanitation and Vital Statistics, is amended to read—"Public Health, Sanitation and Vital Statistics, subject to Indian Legislation in respect to infectious and contagious diseases to such an extent as may be declared by any Act of the Indian Legislature"—the object in view will be attained. The descriptions of the other provincial subjects affected can be similarly amended.

13. Para. 18.—In the proposal contained in para. 41 of their report, the Committee simply adopt the suggestion made in para. 212 of the Joint Report, as to the power of the Indian legislature to pass model legislation on provincial subjects, which it should be open to the provinces to adopt. The Committee did not wish to exclude this suggested plan, but they did not attach any great importance to it. There is a precedent for such a provision in the Canadian Constitution (B.N.A. Act, section 94), but it does not appear that any legislation has yet been passed in Canada under this provision. The Committee assumed that a model law passed by the Indian legislature on a provincial subject, not declared subject to Indian legislation, would require a provincial Act to bring it into force in any province; they did not contemplate that it would be open to the Indian legislature to pass laws on any provincial subject, not subject to Indian legislation, which could be brought into effect by executive decision of the local government of a province. Such an arrangement would obviously expose the field of provincial legislation to serious encroachments. The Government of India refer to this subject in terms which might be taken to suggest that such procedure, which has been found convenient under existing conditions, should continue to be available; but the convention against intervention by the Indian legislature in the provincial field should clearly exclude the possibility of its adoption.

14. Para. 19.—The question of requiring previous sanction in the case of provincial Bills which affect the fundamental principles of Hindu or Mohammedan Law has already been referred to in dealing with the question of compulsory reservation.

The proposal in the latter part of para. 19—to substitute the word "affecting" for "regulating" in certain sub-clauses contained in the new version of section 79 of the Government of India Act—must have been put forward without realisation of the results which would ensue from its adoption. It is hardly too much to say that no Secretary of a Provincial Council could ever certify that a Provincial Bill dealing with a provincial subject did not "affect" any All-India subject—the form which his certificate would have to take if he were made responsible for the application of the rule as to previous sanction in the terms proposed by the Government of India. The substitution of the word "affecting" for "regulating" in the sub clauses concerned would, therefore, practically involve the submission of all provincial Bills for previous sanction.

15. Para. 33.—The Government of India take exception to the reference to "Indian Legislation" in items 6 (d), 10 and 20 of the All-India list, and wish the extent of the authority to be exercised by the Government of India in relation to Ports (i.e., the selection of "Major Ports"), inland waterways, and the production and distribution of such supplies as need control by a central authority, to be defined, not by Indian legislation, but by rules made by the Secretary of State, and notifications made thereunder by the Governor-General in Council.

The alternative plan of employing the rule-making power for the purpose of defining the precise extent of the Central Government's authority in the matters referred to may, in some cases, prove preferable, and, when the draft rules are prepared, the extent to which they should include detailed provision on these points will require careful consideration; but the idea that the Indian legislature is to be in no way concerned with this question of division of powers between central and provincial authorities is surely mistaken. The remark of the Government of India that "To require legislation in these cases would not only be inconvenient and pro-"ductive of serious delays, but would also impose on the Indian legislature a function which has never "belonged to it and which it is not well qualified to discharge" seems to betray some failure to recognise the facts of the new situation which the Reforms Scheme will create.

The Indian legislature has in the past had a good deal to do with assigning functions to Local Governments, but under the old system of subordination to the central authority this assignment has not involved any question of constitutional importance.

Under the new condition of things it is inevitable that the Indian legislature should take its share in working out the relations between the central and provincial authorities. Such a share is implied in proposals which the Government of India accepts—e.g., that it shall be open to the Indian legislature to protect its own Acts from provincial amendment, in whole or in part, by requiring that provincial amending Bills shall be submitted for previous sanction, and that Bills shall be introduced in the Indian legislature limiting the references to the Governor-General in Council required under existing statutes.

With regard to the control of supplies, it was contemplated by the Functions Committee, as is indicated by the terms used—"articles in respect of which control by a central authority is declared by or under "Indian legislation essential in the public interest"—that a Bill would be passed in the Indian legislature conferring certain powers on the Governor-General in Council with regard to the control of supplies, and enabling the Governor-General to apply the provisions of the law, by notification, to various commodities from time to time as occasion might require: this seems to be a proper matter for legislation, as it is not merely a question of the division of authority between the central government and the provinces, but of the definition and regulation of the authority to be exercised by the central government in an important matter closely affecting commercial and industrial interests.

Similarly the control of inland waterways by the Government of India must inevitably be the subject of legislation by the Indian legislature, so that the constitution and powers of whatever administrative body may be established for the purpose of exercising such control may be properly defined.

On the other hand, the selection of Major Ports, with regard to which there may be some serious conflicts of opinion between different provinces, and between the central and provincial governments, is perhaps a question which can better be dealt with in the first instance by the Secretary of State rather than by the Indian legislature.

Powers of the Governor and Governor in Council in relation to Transferred Subjects.

16. Para. 87.—The Committee contemplated that a power of retransfer would be vested in the Secretary of State, and one of their objects in providing for temporary administration of a transferred subject in an emergency was to prevent the Secretary of State being forced into sudden action, and to secure a reasonable interval for discussion and adjustment of questions in dispute before the extreme step of retransfer was taken.

From the constitutional point of view, the Governor in Council, as the other branch of the local government, seems the proper alternative authority where, owing to a Ministerial vacancy, a transferred subject can for the time being no longer be administered by the Governor and Minister, and from the practical point of view it seems desirable that the Governor should have the assistance of his Council in the temporary administration of a transferred subject at a time of crisis, and that, as the members of Council will become responsible with him for administration of the subject should the crisis end in retransfer, they should also share with him the responsibility for any interim action.

17. Para. 88.—This paragraph, which has to be read in conjunction with paras. 103—105 of the first Despatch, deals with the procedure to be followed—

(1) in cases of doubtful jurisdiction as between reserved and transferred departments, and

(2) in mixed cases, i.e., cases which affect both a reserved and a transferred department.

It is necessary to keep in mind the distinction between these two classes of cases, which overlap but are not coterminous.

The Committee's proposal is that in "mixed cases," where there is disagreement between the Executive Council and Ministers which joint deliberation has failed to remove, the Governor shall decide the matter. The Government of India prefer that the decision shall nominally be left to the section of the Government which has jurisdiction to take the particular action required, subject to the overruling power of the Governor. Possibly there may not be very much difference between these two proposals in their net result, and it will be easier to judge of the procedure proposed by the Government of India when the draft rules to which they refer are received. It seems clear, however, that in cases where the interests of both reserved and transferred departments are substantially affected—and it is not contemplated that a case would be treated as a "mixed case" unless departments of both categories could claim serious interest in the matter—the real decision must, in case of disagreement, rest with the Governor, who alone is a member of both sections of the Government, and has the responsibility of securing that the two sections work together, and it is desirable that the form of procedure adopted should correspond with the facts of the situation.

18. Para. 89.—The Government of India propose certain alterations in the suggestions for the Governor's Instructions contained in para. 67 of the Committee's Report.

The phrase "peace and tranquillity," in the first suggested clause, was taken from the Joint Report (para. 252), but it is clear that "safety and tranquility," which is the phrase used in the Government of India Act, is preferable, and there can be no objection to the suggested amplification of the clause.

As regards the clauses referring to Education—

(1) The Government of India propose that the instruction should be extended so as to ensure that the Muhammadan community get their fair share of all increased facilities; the wording proposed is that "in all extensions of educational facilities adequate provision is made for the special needs of the "Muslim and any other minority community." The instruction suggested by the Committee was framed because of the fear expressed by some Muhammadan witnesses that the facilities given them by existing local governments would be withdrawn if Education were transferred, and similar protection was not demanded by any other minority community. The instruction as drafted by the Committee raises a clear issue, and one that can be decided by an appeal to facts; it seems undesirable to alter its scope in the way proposed by the Government of India, because the question of what is "adequate provision "for the special needs of the Muslim community" in the case of extension of educational facilities is one that can be hotly contested from different points of view, and the Governor would find himself in a very difficult position if he were bound by a published instruction on which such very different constructions could be placed.

Clause (2) was drafted to meet views expressed on behalf of missionary bodies, whose representatives were anxious at least to secure that the assistance, monetary and other, in reliance upon which they had built up their educational institutions, should not be withdrawn or diminished without an opportunity being given for full consideration of their case. They referred especially to the Despatch of 1854, which is the basis of the Grant-in-Aid system. In para. 89 of their Despatch the Government of India "prefer to lay down that "no changes such as those referred to in the clause shall be adopted 'which are inconsistent with educational "interests'"; but in their draft instructions they do not carry this out. The draft runs that the Governor is to secure "that the interests of existing educational institutions maintained or controlled by religious bodies "are duly protected in the event of any changes of educationalpolicy affecting them adversely." The proposal in the body of the Despatch would only protect these institutions from the effects of changes which are inconsistent with educational interests, and it is clearly not wide enough to give the protection which they legitimately desire. The draft instruction, on the other hand, seems too wide; it is difficult to see what "due "protection" is to be given when once the change of policy adverse to the interests concerned has been adopted, nor is it right that the interests of particular institutions should stand in the way of the development of a policy which is considered to be in the true interests of education as a whole.

In sub clause (3), the Government of India propose to extend the protection given to backward classes in educational matters in Madras to the backward classes in all provinces, and to widen its scope to include their "advancement and social protection." Madras stands by itself in this matter, and the Committee were reluctant, by extending the provision, to give currency to the view that Indians as a whole are not alive to the interests of the backward classes.

Para. 90.—The Committee limited themselves to making certain suggestions for the Govenor's instructions on matters directly arising under their reference; they did not attempt to draft a complete instrument, as this would have involved going beyond the task assigned to them.

The Public Services.

19. Para. 121.—The proposal of the Government of India in regard to which the Committee felt difficulty was that every new permanent post created in the provinces must be added to the cadre of the service to which its duties most closely correspond. The object of this proposal was to protect the All-India services against the creation of appointments similar in purpose to those ordinarily filled by those services, but kept technically outside the cadres. Difficulties must arise under this proposal in all services where there are All-India as well as provincial cadres; e.g., in the Educational Service, to which cadre do the duties of a headmaster of a Zilla school correspond? Some of these appointments are actually held by members of the All-India service and some by members of the provincial service. The Committee proposed to attain the desired end by adopting another suggestion made by the Government of India, that their sanction should be required to all new provincial appointments on a salary of Rs. 1,000 or over; these are the only appointments that are likely to affect seriously the interests of the All-India services. The Government of India are in charge of "All-India services," and they have the right to intervene to protect the interests of this All-India subject; the submission of such new appointments for their sanction will afford them an opportunity of exercising this right when they consider that the interests of an All-India service are endangered.

20. Para. 123.—The Government of India agree that the posting of Indian Medical Service officers should require the Governor's concurrence, but apparently they do not see any necessity for special provision for these officers, because they expect the Governor to interest himself personally in the posting of all officers of the All-India services. The distinction drawn by the Committee does not appear to have been appreciated. By requing the Governor's "personal concurrence" the Committee intended that the Governor should take the responsibilty of the posting, and satisfy himself that it was right; in the case of other services it would be the duty of the Governor to intervene if a posting was obviously unsuitable or involved an injustice, but otherwise he would normally act on the advice of the Minister. In the case of the Indian Medical Service a posting may involve a continuing loss of emoluments as long as an officer is posted to a particular station, and it may be impossible to remedy the injury done to an officer's prospect by any subsequent alteration of the orders. This is not ordinarily the case with other services, and sufficient protection is proposed to be given to them (a) by imposing on the Governor responsibility for the protection of all members of the public services in the legitimate exercise of their functions, and in the enjoyment of all recognised rights and priveleges, and (b) by the individual officer's right of memorialising, and the provision that orders on such memorials require the Governor's personal concurrence, and further provisions as to joint deliberation and right of appeal.

21. Para. 124.—The Government of India object to the provision for joint deliberations by both halves of the Government before any order adversely affecting emoluments or pensions, conveying formal censure, of disposing of a memorial is passed to the disadvantage of any officer of an All-India service, whether serving in a transferred or reserved department. The grounds they put forward are (1) that this provision obscures the respective responsibility of each half of the Government; (2) that in the case of transferred subjects the plan proposed comes near to formal intervention by the Governor in Council; (3) that in the case of reserved subjects there can be no reason for bringing in the Ministers, except as a purely reciprocal arrangement. The first two objections appear to overlook the fact that in joint deliberation there is no voting, and the order issued is the order of the Governor and Minister, or the Governor in Council as the case may be; there is no obscuring of the responsibility, and no intervention by the Governor in Council in a transferred subject. The only effect of the provision is to deprive the Governor of his discretion as to whether he shall summon both sides of his Government for joint deliberation in a particular matter or not. The object which the Committee had in view was to ensure that in all cases the officer concerned shall have the certainty that the facts come before those members of the Government who have been through the mill themselves, and know the difficulties of administration, and are probably better judges of the circumstances; they will place their view of the circumstances on record, and it will be available for the appellate authorities. The Committee have reason to believe that this is a point to which the services attach very great importance. Without this precaution, it would be possible for an officer to be condemned by a Governor new to the country, and a Minister who had no experience of administration; it is true that there would be an appeal, but it would go to men possibly ignorant of the circumstances of the Province, and would, in any case, be weighted by the unanimous adverse verdict of the provincial authorities.

The third objection taken by the Government of India is to the Ministers being brought in when the case arises in a reserved department. But apart from the question of reciprocity, to which some members of the Committee attached considerable importance, there will be cases in which, though an officer's conduct in a reserved department is in question, his conduct in respect of a transferred department may be relevant in explanation or mitigation. There is, further, the important question of unity of policy; it is essential that officers, whether serving in transferred or reserved departments, should be dealt with on uniform principles, and it will be more difficult to obtain this if the Ministers are rigorously excluded from the knowledge of how these questions are dealt with on the reserved side of Government.

The proposal of the Government of India regarding officers serving under both a reserved and a transferred department is that the control for posting, discipline, etc., should vest in one side of the Government only, and that the other side of the Government, if dissatisfied with work done for its department, should represent matters to the Governor, and that for the purpose of deciding which half of the Government should have control, the criterion should be the head under which the officer's salary is provided. The Committee found that for budget purposes an officer's salary is often divided; e.g., the Collector's salary is debited partly to Law and Justice and partly to Land Revenue administration, and the criterion provided might, therefore, prove inapplicable. In any case, it seems necessary to recognise that where both a reserved and a transferred department are availing themselves of the services of the same officer, questions relating to that officer may affect the interests of both departments, and may therefore have to be dealt with in accordance with the procedure provided for mixed cases.

As regards recruitment for the transferred provincial services, the Committee only recommended that alterations in the rules affecting transferred services should be dealt with as mixed cases. The Government of India practically admit that this is necessary, and they only differ from the Committee as to the proper method of dealing with mixed cases, a question which is discussed in paragraph 17 of this memorandum.

Finance.

22. Para. 125.—The Committee wished to give the Governor a discretion as to whether the Finance Department's report should be laid before the Legislature or not, because, while it would clearly be undesirable that the Finance Department should feel itself hampered in its freedom to criticise proposals coming from a transferred department, a very difficult situation might be created in the Legislative Council as between the two sections of the Government, in cases where such criticisms had been disregarded, if the Council had the right to insist on production of the Finance Department's report so as to render its criticisms available for purposes of debate.

The last point, to which the Government of India state that they do not attach much importance, is as to the power of the Governor to override the Finance Department, under section 50 of the Act, if the Department refuses to concur in a transfer of funds, or in unbudgeted expenditure being incurred. The point that the Committee wished to secure was that the Finance Department could not hold up expenditure in a transferred department in opposition to the views of the Governor when the Legislature did not happen to be sitting. The Government of India do not, apparently, contemplate that the Finance Department should have such power, but wish to ensure that where the transfer has been made, or the expenditure incurred, without the concurrence of the Finance Department, the subsequent approval of the Legislature shall be necessary.

PART II.

List of Subjects.

23.—The Government of India accept the main lines of division as laid down in the lists of All-India and Provincial subjects proposed by the Committee, but put forward a number of detailed criticisms and suggestions for additions and alterations. Had time allowed, the Committee would probably have adopted the course of submitting draft lists for Government criticism; and the Committee anticipated, as appears from paragraph 13 of the Report, that their lists would require some amendment in the light of such criticism when received (vide para. 13 of Report). We do not, therefore, wish to appear to claim rigid adherence in detail to the classification as proposed by the Committee, but it is, nevertheless, necessary to examine closely the changes suggested by the Government of India, both with respect to the specific points raised, and for the purpose of seeing how far they are consistent with the Committee's general scheme of division.

Some of the amendments proposed to the lists are drafting amendments only. It is proposed to confine this memorandum in the main to questions of substance, and only to refer briefly to drafting amendments. As to these drafting amendments, one general observation suggests itself—there is a tendency to propose amendments which would have the effect of substituting catalogues of a number of separate items for the general headings contained in the Committee's lists. As a matter of form it seems preferable to use general headings in the lists themselves, and to leave the catalogues of items to be supplied by way of commentary and interpretation. There is always a danger that, where a definition by catalogue is attempted, it will not be complete, and that room may therefore be left for the inference that items not specifically mentioned were intentionally omitted. As conceived by the Committee, the object of the lists is to make a division on general lines with reference primarily to subjects dealt with rather than to specific acts of administration.

In dealing with the lists we propose to take the items as they appear in Mr. Dawson's summary, which shows the lists as proposed by the Committee with the various additions and alterations recommended by the Government of India introduced in their appropriate places.

All-India Subjects.

24. (Items 1 and 1A of List) Para. 28 of Despatch.—The amendments proposed are drafting amendments. It may be better to introduce the general heading "Defence," and to make the first item read—"Defence of India and all matters connected with His Majesty's Naval, Military, and Air Forces in India, etc." It is not clear what forces are intended to be covered by the term "Armed Forces" which would not fall under the other terms of the definition. The reason for specifically including "Naval and Military Works" in the list was in order to negative the possibility of their inclusion in "Public Works" (Item 5 of Provincial List). 1A is open to objection as an attempted catalogue obviously incomplete, as is shown by use of the term "Etcetera."

(3A) Para. 41.—"Political Charges" appears to be an item which deserves separate mention, but, unless usage has attached some special meaning to this term, it is open to objection on the ground of obscurity.

(4A) Para. 43.—There can be no objection to the special mention of the Andaman and Nicobar Islands.

(5A) Excluded Areas.—Paras. 29 and 84.—On this matter the further proposals of the Government of India must be awaited.

(6 (a)) Para. 30.—The Government of India agree that light and feeder railways within the Province should be made a Provincial subject in some form, though railways in general are essentially an All-India subject. The Committee proposed to give the Provinces the "larger voice," admittedly desirable, through their legislatures, while safeguarding the ultimate decision of the Government of India, and the position of the Railway Board as guardian of the general railway policy and the interests of existing railway systems. The Government of India object to the proposed adoption of procedure similar to the private Bill procedure in the British Parliament on the ground that legislation is ordinarily unnecessary, and that such procedure would be dilatory and expensive. Their solution is to provincialise the heading "Light and Feeder Railways," but to reserve it, and make it subject to such general principles as the Governor-General in Council may prescribe. Until these general principles have been formulated, it is impossible to say how far the proposal is an advance upon the present actual practice, which, besides being even more open to the charge of dilatoriness than the Committee's plan, is objected to, in Madras, for instance, very strongly, on the ground that provincial interests and private enterprise are stifled by the dead weight of the existing railway interests represented by the Board. The Government of India do contemplate some provincial legislation on the subject, and would adopt the Committee's proposal that such legislation should be subject to the safeguards of standing orders of the Council, so as to give an opportunity to the Railway Board to inform the Local Government of its views, but the difference between this and the Committee's proposal appears to be that the Government of India contemplate that the Provincial legislature should have no real freedom of initiative, and that its functions should be confined to accepting or rejecting proposals already approved by the Government of India, and that the Railway Board should deal with the local Government, and should not place their case before the Provincial legislature. As regards the first point, the Government of India's proposal seems to conflict, even more than the proposal they criticise, with their unwillingness "to give an unreal appearance of discretion to the Provincial Councils," while as regards the second point, there does not appear to be any reason why the Railway Board should not be prepared to place their case before the Legislative Council for their information and guidance. The Committee fully realised that the final decision must rest with the Government of India (who by the device of compulsory reservation would have an opportunity of securing amendment to the scheme), and assumed that, if there were good reasons for doing so, the veto would be used without hesitation. But they contemplated that these reasons would be published, and publicity was the main object they aimed at. The remark in para. 5 of the Railway Board's note that "the scheme proposed by the Functions Committee would necessitate "the same amount of enquiry and would not in any way secure additional regard to local demands" cannot be accepted as expressing a correct view. The advantage of an enquiry by a Select Committee of the Legislative Council is that it gives an opportunity for all interests concerned to be fully heard, and enables the merits of any scheme to be thoroughly investigated in the light of local conditions; it is obvious that this is a procedure which ensures more attention to "local demands" than an enquiry conducted by correspondence. The essential point of the Committee's proposal is this provision for a full local enquiry; the Government of India have not suggested any alternative plan by which such an enquiry could be secured. It is to be noted that, in the form of their proposed entry in the provincial list, the Government of India go further in the direction of provincialisation than the Committee by making all light and feeder railways and tramways a provincial subject; this method of dealing with the point involves the difficult question of definition of what is meant by "light and feeder railways." Are there not railways which might fairly be taken to fall under this description, but which it is, nevertheless, desirable to deal with as part of the general railway system through the Railway Board instead of through provincial authorities?

(6 (b) and 6 (c)) Paras. 31 and 32.—There can be no objection to making these more comprehensive.

(6 (d)) Para. 33.—See para. 15 of Memorandum.

(8) Para. 34.—Drafting amendment only.

(10) Para. 33.—See para. 15 of Memorandum.

(11) Para. 35.—Drafting amendment only.

(12) Para. 35.—The substitution of the term "taxes on income" for "income tax" may raise difficulties owing to the fact that certain municipal taxes take the form of a tax on income; it may be better to mention specifically the Excess Profits Tax or any other tax similar to income tax which is a source of Indian revenue.

(19A and 20) Para. 36.—The Government of India, in this paragraph, have taken too narrow a view of the Committee's intentions. The Committee intended this entry with regard to the "control of production, "supply and distribution of articles in respect of which control by a central authority is declared essential in the public interest," to cover the control of food supply and fodder in times of scarcity, and also, in the industrial field, to enable the Government of India to control certain materials essential to manufacturing industry, e.g., manganese, wolfram, monazite sand, so that the limited supply available might be distributed to the best advantage. The introduction of a separate heading with reference to food supply, &c., in times of scarcity is a question of drafting. With reference to 20, see also para. 15 of Memorandum.

(20A.) Para. 45.—The Government of India propose that Stores, Stationery, and Government Printing should be added to the All-India list after item 20. The Committee considered the question of stores, but came to the conclusion that stores could not properly be made either an All-India or a Provincial subject. It is not a subject in itself, but a matter that is incidental to the administration of every department. To make "Stores and Stationery" an All India subject would be an extreme step in the direction of centralisation, because it would mean that a provincial Government would have no authority of its own to obtain even a lead pencil or a sheet of note-paper, and whatever liberty it possessed with regard to the obtaining of stores for meeting its own requirements would have to depend upon the delegation of power to it as the agent of the Government of India. This would obviously be an absurd position, and no doubt is not the position which the Government of India contemplate.

The question of the Government purchase of stores is dealt with in the Report of the Industrial Commission. In the Statement which Sir Thomas Holland, who was President of that Commission and of the Indian Munitions Board, supplied to the Committee, the following paragraphs occur :—

> "A possible source of dispute may arise in the purchase of stores, for local officials will naturally wish to suit their own tastes, and, because of the small size of their purchases, will not realise the degree of economy that may be effected by amalgamating all provincial requirements. By the central purchasing of textiles alone in 1918 the Munitions Board obtained prices which, compared with the average market rates for the year, showed a saving of over Rs. 5 crores. But the delays and want of elasticity due to central purchasing create certain disadvantages, and it would be wise to centralise purchases only in certain standardised lines, or in materials for which the Local Governments cannot provide efficient inspection. In the purchase of stores we want voluntary co operation rather than control, and this will come without effort, for the provincial directors of industries will not face the responsibility of buying articles with which they are not familiar."
> "The existing stores rules how permit and even enjoin the purchase in India of anything made or even put together here from imported materials. In actual practice officers almost invariably resort to indenting on the India Office, because the individual officer knows the resources of Indian factories and workshops, and has no means for inspecting his purchases. The Government of India have no stores department to intercept these indents, and the result is a maintenance of the old system of buying at home to the disadvantage of local industries. We want a stores department that is something better than a mere post office; there is no necessity to insist on local governments sending their indents to this department; they will always do so, if only to evade responsibility for price and quality."

Though the Committee did not formulate their views on this question, we think we may state that their intention was to leave it open to the Government of India to establish a central stores agency to be made use of by the provinces in so far as they desired. If such an agency was successfully conducted, it would establish the advantages of central buying, and no province could afford to ignore the opportunities offered. It was understood from Sir Thomas Holland's statement that the establishment of a central agency on a voluntary basis would be in accordance with his views. In special cases, it would, of course, be open to the Government of India to control, under the powers referred to in Item 20, special classes of stores required for Government purposes, and to insist upon Local Governments obtaining their requirements through the central agency.

With regard to Government printing, it seems unnecessary to mention this as a separate subject in the All-India list, as it is a matter incidental to the work of the different departments of Government, in the same way as the purchase of stores. "Government Press" was entered as an item in the Provincial list owing to the necessity of considering whether the control of Government Presses should be "reserved" or "transferred," but it should be understood that this entry was only intended to cover provincial Government presses, and, in order to make this clear, it may be as well to insert "provincial" in the description of the item.

(22A.) Paras. 66, 116–118, Industries.—The Government of India say that they cannot accept the position which they think is created by the entry of the subject "Development of Industries" in the provincial list alone. In paras. 117 and 118 the Government of India indicate the powers which they think it essential that the Government of India should exercise in relation to the development of industries. Firstly, they claim a responsibility for the industrial progress of the country, which they propose to discharge by furnishing advice and help to Local Governments, by co-ordinating their efforts and by working concurrently with them, rather than by direct control. Secondly, they propose to give assistance to large enterprises by loans, guarantees or undertakings to purchase products. Thirdly, they wish to be able to undertake experiments, often on a commercial scale, to close up dangerous gaps in the economic armour and to forge essential links in the industrial chain. Lastly, they intend to maintain a central agency equipped with a full scientific and industrial staff to help and advise Local Governments to co-ordinate their efforts and to pool their experience.

The intention of the Committee was to entrust the provinces with sufficient power to secure development of their own industries, while giving the Government of India full scope in matters which could not be dealt with by individual provinces, and in their proposals they were largely guided by the report of the Indian Industrial Commission and a note forwarded to them by Sir Thomas Holland, whose views are expressed in his formula. "For executive functions decentralise to the fullest extent; prompt action on the spot guided "by an intimate knowledge of local conditions must ordinarily be better than deferred action no matter how "perfect be the advice on which it is based. For advisory functions centralisation in a country like this, "which is practically devoid of technologists, is more than usually important." Munition factories are, of course, an All-India subject under heading 1, but the Committee did not intend to shut out the Government of India from such other activities concerning the development of industries as are mentioned in the Despatch.

Under heading 30 of the Government of India list the Committee provided for industrial research, and they considered that this heading was wide enough to cover experiments on a commercial scale and the maintenance of scientific industrial services, and, under heading 20, they provided for the power of the Government of India to take control not only of the supply and distribution, but also of the production of articles in respect of which control by a central authority is declared essential in the public interest, and this would cover pioneer factories for any articles which are the subject of such declaration. The question of finance in this connection was not dealt with by the Committee, but there is nothing in their proposals to prevent the Govenment of India giving financial assistance to large enterprises, if they have the money to do so, though the "undertakings to purchase products" might be limited by the freedom which the Committee propose the Local Governments should have in the matter of purchasing stores. The Committee agreed with the Government of India that advice and help should take the place of direct control; but it was proposed that the Government of India should rely on the excellence of their staff to ensure that the Local Governments would welcome their advice and help, rather than on definite powers of supervision. To quote Sir Thomas Holland again :—"So long as the Government of India attracts efficient and distinguished "officers, administrative interference with the Provinces will not be necessary, and complaints about central "control will never arise. So long as the Government of India maintains a staff of technical specialists, "Local Governments will always come to them for advice, for the Local Governments will always be nervous "about embarking on costly enterprises merely on the advice of their own officers; they have too many "other outlets for their limited funds. The risk of their acting against, or without, advice is negligible, and "this risk is small beside the evil effect of irritating control."

If it is considered that these intentions of the Committee are not carried out, head 20 or head 30 could be expanded. But the objection to the course proposed by the Government of India is that the addition of the heading "Development of Industries" to the All-India list, even coupled with the proposed safeguard as to the powers of the Local Governments to take up "the development of any industry," would enable the Government of India to exercise wide powers of interference, and might be held to justify them, in the interests of this All-India subject, in claiming to direct the policy, or even the programme, of industrial development in a Province.

(26A) Para. 47.—The Government of India propose to include "pilgrimages beyond India" as a separate All-India subject. This is a matter which would appear to fall partly under the head of External Relations (Item 2), partly under Emigration and Immigration (Item 26), and partly under Shipping (Item 7). It seems doubtful whether a separate heading is necessary.

(27A) Para. 42.—Special mention of "State Prisoners" appears necessary in order to prevent these prisoners from falling under the general heading of "Prisons" in the Provincial list. Perhaps the matter can most conveniently be dealt with by way of an express exception from the Provincial list.

(28) Para. 37.—The Government of India propose that "Railway Police" should be an All-India subject only so far as jurisdiction and cost are concerned; but it does not seem possible to make Railway Police a provincial subject, and leave it to the Government of India to decide questions of jurisdiction and cost, which would apparently also include questions as to the strength of the force to be maintained by each Province. If these matters are left for the Government of India, the real control of Railway Police must be in their hands. The Committee contemplated that the Provinces would continue to act as agents of the Government of India with regard to the local control of Railway Police, and the retention of Railway Police as a central subject, coupled with a wide delegation of powers to the Provinces as agents in dealing with this matter, would appear to be the right method of treatment.

(30) Para. 38.—The Committee intended to include Medical Research.

(30A and 30B) Paras. 48 and 49.—Records and buildings are matters incidental to administration, and it seems doubtful whether it is necessary to enter them as separate headings.

(36) Paras. 22 and 40.—The note in the "Remarks" column against the item "Census and Statistics" was inserted in order to make it clear that the Government of India should have full power to obtain returns and information in such form as they might require, and that they were not to be limited in this matter by their requirements in connection with the census and statistics. Perhaps it may be convenient to make the necessary rule under clause 1 (2) (i) of the Bill as a condition of the devolution of authority to Local Governments in respect of provincial subjects.

(37A) Para. 52 (see also para. 57).—The Government of India wish to add as a separate item to the All-India List "Government Servants' Conduct Rules." In connection with this proposal, Item 43 of the provincial list should be referred to :—

> "Control, subject to Indian legislation, of members of All-India Services serving within the province and of other public services within the province."

One of the objects of the Committee in providing that this subject should be made "subject to Indian legislation" was to enable conduct rules to be made applicable to all public services. It should be noted that, as stated in the Rules of Interpretation at the head of the lists of All-India and Provincial subjects, "the use of the phrase 'subject to Indian legislation' is not intended to exclude the alternative of a "matter being dealt with by Imperial Legislation, i.e., by an Act of Parliament of the United Kingdom or "by rules made under such an Act." Clause 24 (2) of the Bill enables conduct rules to be made applicable to all members of the public services.

(37B) Para. 51.—It seems undesirable to make the regulation of higher language examinations a separate heading. Whatever terms are necessary to cover the work conducted by the Government of India in respect of this matter could perhaps be included in heading 30.

(38A) Para. 44.—Section 60 of the Government of India Act confers on the Governor-General in Council power to alter the boundaries of provinces. It is obvious that this is not a power which could be exercised by any Provincial Government. It is doubtful whether it requires separate mention in the list, but it may be necessary to deal specially with the question of determining the laws which are to apply in respect to territory affected by alterations of provincial boundaries, in order to prevent the point being raised that the Indian legislature would be invading the provincial field of legislation by legislating on this subject.

(38B) Regulation of Ceremonials, &c. Para. 50.—This seems to be a proper item for inclusion in the All-India List.

Provincial Subjects.

25. (1) Paras. 55 and 109.—Local Self-Government. See para. 8 of Memorandum.

(2) Para. 56.—The Government of India propose to separate provision for medical education from medical administration, and to include medical education under item 42. This change is proposed in order to enable medical education to be made a reserved subject, while medical administration is transferred. The point raised can more suitably be dealt with in connection with the list of provincial subjects for transfer.

(3) Para. 17.—See para. 12 of Memorandum.

(3A) Para. 57.—The Government of India propose to make "Pilgrimages within India" a separate provincial subject. It seems likely that confusion may result from making this a separate heading Administrative questions affecting pilgrimages within India, in so far as they do not form part of the subject of "Inter-provincial migration" (All-India subject, 26), would appear to fall partly under Railways (an All-India subject) and partly under Sanitation (a provincial subject).

(4) Para. 58.—The Government of India suggest certain amendments in the description of education as a provincial subject. They propose that in addition to excluding the Benares Hindu University "such other new Universities as may be declared to be All-India by the Governor-General in Council" shall also be excluded from the provincial list. There seems to be no objection to leaving the door open in this way to the foundation of other All-India Universities. They further propose to exclude, in addition to Chief's Colleges, "institutions maintained by the Government of India." It was felt by the Committee that a general phrase of this kind was open to objection, as it would enable the Government of India to establish educational institutions of any kind wherever they thought fit. The Government of India further propose that, if effect is given to the Committee's recommendation as to the transfer of University and Secondary Education, the special provision affecting Bengal, by which legislation with regard to the Calcutta University and the control and organisation of secondary education are made subject to Indian legislation for a period of five years from the date when the Reforms Scheme comes into operation, should be extended to cover the period till the recommendations of the first statutory commission take effect. The Committee thought it desirable to fix a limited period for this exceptional arrangement with regard to Bengal, as they feared that otherwise the necessary legislation might be unduly delayed.

(5*d*) Para. 59.—See comments on proposals with regard to item 6 in All-India list.

(6) Para. 60. Irrigation, Drainage, and Water Storage.—The Committee thought it necessary to provide for Indian legislation on inter-provincial questions connected with these matters. The Government of India prefer to rely solely on administrative control, which may prove sufficient as long as the subject remains a reserved subject, but the way should be left open to the Indian legislature to make laws regulating on a uniform basis all water questions in which the interests of more than one province or territory are concerned. The form of the Committee's definition is perhaps open to objection on the ground that it appears to restrict the exercise of the Government of India's powers of control to matters in respect of which such control is expressly provided by Indian legislation. This objection may be met by omitting from the definition special reference to the control of the Governor-General in Council, and substituting "subject to Indian legislation with regard to matters of inter-provincial concern, or affecting the relations of a province with any other territory." The alternative definition proposed by the Government of India is open to objection not only on the ground that it omits all reference to Indian legislation, but also on the ground that it attempts to define in terms the nature of the control to be exercised by the Governor-General in Council independently of such legislation. As irrigation and cognate matters are to remain a reserved subject, no definition of such control is at present required, and to introduce a reference to "financial sanction" in this definition alone would be specially objectionable, as implying absence of any requirement as to financial sanction in respect of all other reserved subjects in relation to which such sanction is not specially mentioned.

(7) Paras. 20 and 61.—The proposal in these paragraphs that the general principles with regard to the administration of Land Revenue should be laid down by the Government of India, and that the Governor should be required to take such principles into account in dealing with proposals for legislation on the subject of Land Revenue, is consistent with the Committee's general conception as to the treatment of reserved subjects, and the control to be exercised over reserved subjects by the Government of India.

(7A) Para. 61.—The Government of India propose the addition of a new item—"Management of State Properties." It is not clear what kind of State properties are in view, but, presumably, the item is intended to refer to agricultural estates which are Government property. The term requires some definition: "State properties" might be taken as covering forests and land used for departmental purposes by transferred departments such as the Agricultural Department.

(9) and (10) Para. 62.—See para. 12 of Memorandum.

(12) Para. 109.—The Government of India consider that it is unnecessary to make the subject of Co-operative Societies subject to Indian legislation. (See para. 8 of Memorandum.) As it is proposed to protect the Indian Companies Act by including it in the schedule under 79 (3) (h), it is perhaps unnecessary to retain this provision with regard to Co-operative Societies.

(14) Para. 63.—The Committee's proposal was that "Land Acquisition" should be a provincial subject, "subject to Indian legislation" as regards the acquisition of land for public purposes. The Committee considered that, in the case of land required for industrial purposes, it should be open to the parties concerned to promote Bills in the provincial legislatures. The Government of India disapprove of the proposal as to procedure by private Bills, and appear to hold the view that the whole subject of land acquisition should be "subject to Indian legislation." They state, however, that, in the amendments they propose to introduce in the present law, they contemplate providing for bringing applications made on behalf of industrial enterprises "under the cognizance of the legislature." It is not clear what is the exact procedure which they contemplate, and it is difficult to judge of their proposals until fuller particulars are available. It appears that they wish to secure the same object as that which the Committee had in view, but we feel some doubt whether their plan will provide adequate facilities for the acquisition of land for industrial purposes, and will be sufficiently elastic to fit the conditions of the different provinces.

(16) Para. 64. Administration of Justice.—The intention of the Committee was to reserve the constitution and powers of High Courts, which are at present regulated by the Government of India Act and by Letters Patent, as an All-India subject, while leaving the provinces freedom to legislate with regard to other courts, subject to previous sanction as regards courts of criminal jurisdiction. The Government of India propose to put Chief Courts and Courts of Judicial Commissioner on the same footing as the High Courts in this respect (a course to which we see no serious objection), and also to make "organisation" as well as the constitution and powers of all these Courts an All-India subject. Organisation of the High Courts, as distinguished from their constitution, would appear to be a matter which should be dealt with by the province which is responsible for their maintenance, but it is probably best to avoid using these terms for the purpose of making a distinction betwen All-India and provincial powers. The simplest plan would be to make all matters affecting these Courts subject to Indian legislation, and it is suggested that the entry might take the following form :—

"Administration of justice, including the consititution, powers, maintenance and organisation of Courts of civil and criminal jurisdiction within the province, subject to Indian legislation as regards High Courts, Chief Courts, and Courts of Judicial Commissioner, and any Courts of criminal jurisdiction."

There is no intention to affect the provisions of the Government of India Act with regard to High Courts, including those provisions which bring the High Court of Calcutta into special relation with the Government of India ; the rules of classification, of which this list will form part, will necessarily be subject to the provisions of that Act, and there does not seem, therefore, to be any need for a special reference to the Act in this entry. To prevent misconception, the point can be covered by a general statement in the rules.

(19) Para. 65.—As Judicial Stamps are to be a source of provincial revenue, it seems, prima facie, that the provincial legislatures should have freedom to legislate on this subject ; the Committee, therefore, proposed that such powers should be conferred, and that the restriction "subject to Indian legislation" should only apply to Court fees levied in relation to procedure in the High Courts under their original jurisdiction, which the Courts themselves have power to regulate.

(24) Para. 66.—See paras. 24 and 26 (items 22A, All-India List, and 15, Transferred List).

(26) Para. 67.—"Adulteration of foodstuffs and other articles subject to Indian legislation as regards export trade." The latter portion of this entry is objected to on the ground that it is unnecessary to give provincial Governments any power of regulating either export from or import into India of adulterated articles, the customs legislation of the central Government being sufficient on this subject. It is apparent from this comment that the effect of the words objected to has been misconceived. The intention was to restrict the powers of the provinces, so that in dealing with adulteration of foodstuffs and other articles they should not be able to affect export trade unless their measures had been submitted for previous sanction. It may be that a reference to the import trade should have been included so as to make it clear that that was put on the same footing. The object of the entry was to enable the provinces to control adulteration in so far as it was an internal matter affecting the province, while subjecting their measures to supervision in so far as they affected external trade.

(28 and 29) Para. 33.—See para. 15 of Memorandum.

(30) Para. 37.—See comment on 28, All-India List.

(31D) Para. 71.—The Government of India propose that the import of poisons should be subject to Indian legislation. There can be no objection to making provision to this effect, though, apart from specific provision, the matter might be regarded as within the scope of Customs legislation.

(31*f*) The Government of India wish to make certification of films subject to Indian legislation. The existing powers of the Governor-General in Council under the Cinematograph Act will not be subject to alteration by provincial legislatures without previous sanction, but, as the provisions relating to certification of films may require to be supplemented or amended, it seems advisable to adopt the Government of India's suggestion in substance. As "certification" is an indefinite word, it may be better to substitute some phrase which conveys what is the effect of certification—e.g., "subject to Indian legislation in regard to sanction of films for exhibition."

(32) Para. 72.—As it is proposed to give general control over printing presses, there can be no objection to the insertion of the word "books."

(36) Para. 73.—The addition of "prisoners" to the heading is a drafting amendment.

(37) Para. 74.—The Government of India suggest adding "and cattle trespass" to the subject of "pounds." Pounds provide a means of enforcing the law as to cattle trespass ; the addition of "cattle trespass" to this heading will make this item of criminal law a matter for provincial instead of Indian legislation. This may be a desirable arrangement, but the Committee were not satisfied as to the expediency of separating this subject from matters falling under the general criminal law. In any case the administration of the law with regard to cattle trespass will be a provincial matter (items 16 and 30, Provincial List).

(39) Para. 75.—There can be no objection to including the Imperial War Museum among the exceptions.

(39A) Para. 81.—The Government of India contemplate that some European cemeteries will come under the ecclesiastical administration, and, therefore, will form part of an All-India subject (31 of All-India List) ; this being so, it will be necessary to distinguish which are the cemeteries to be dealt with by the provincial government. It is possible that the matter might be left to be dealt with under item 47, or the subject may be so defined as to admit of cemeteries which are to be treated as "historical monuments" being scheduled in each province.

With regard to historical monuments and memorials, apart from special mention, these would, presumably, be included among "provincial buildings," and would be maintained and cared for by the Public Works Department of the Province, subject to the advice of the Archæological Department of the Government of India. The Government of India have in view a special class of historical monuments which may be described generally as "European" ; if these are to be dealt with separately, some such distinguishing term must be used.

(39B) Para. 81.—It is a question whether it is necessary to mention separately "Provincial Records," as these are matters incidental to administration. It may be suggested that the care of Provincial libraries of a general character should be regarded as part of the work of the Education Department, while libraries devoted to special subjects would be the care of the Departments concerned. It seems, therefore, open to doubt whether a separate heading is necessary.

(41) Para. 76.—In this comment there is again a misunderstanding as to the effect of the term "subject to Indian legislation." (See head note I., Lists of All-India and Provincial Subjects.)

(43) Para. 77.—The same comment applies to the remarks on the effect of the words "subject to Indian legislation." (See note on suggested item 37A, All-India List.) The effect of the Government of India's alternative draft for this heading would be that the Local Governments would have no control over members of the All-India services serving within the province, except in so far as such control may be delegated to them as agents of the Government of India.

The intention of the entry as proposed by the Committee is that the authority of the Local Governments over members of All-India services serving within their province should be definitely recognised, but should be exercised subject to laws made by the Indian legislature and to rules made under any Imperial Act.

(44) Para. 78.—This appears to be a drafting amendment only.

(45) Para. 79.—The same comment as that made above on item 41 applies.

(46) Para. 80.—The objection of the Government of India to this item is apparently an objection as to form rather than substance. As criminal law is made an All-India subject (27 of All-India List), it seems necessary that, in the provincial list, some item should be inserted so as to make it clear that it is open to the provincial legislatures to attach penalties to breaches of the laws passed by them on provincial subjects. Compare the similar entry in section 92 (15) of the British North America Act.

TRANSFERRED SUBJECTS.

26. Some of the points raised in connection with the Transferred List have already been dealt with; the questions that remain for consideration are those that relate to the separation of medical education from Medical Administration, with a view to the former being treated as a reserved subject; to the general subject of Education; and the subjects of Public Works and Development of Industries.

(2) Paras. 92 and 107.—The Government of India propose to separate "Provision for Medical Education," including both medical schools and colleges, from the subject of "Medical Administration," which includes hospitals, dispensaries and asylums, and to combine provision for Medical Education with Provincial Subject 42—"Regulation of medical and other professional qualifications and standards subject to Indian legislation," making the whole a reserved subject. The proposals of the Committee with regard to medical administration and education were made after hearing a great deal of evidence bearing on these questions, and were the result of very careful consideration. It appeared to the Committee to be impossible to separate medical education from medical administration. The first and most essential task of the Department charged with medical administration is to secure an adequate supply of doctors trained in western medicine for the purpose of carrying on the different institutions controlled by the provincial government. The efficiency of those institutions depends entirely on the adequacy of the staff to which the medical and surgical work is entrusted, and the most important medical institutions in a province are, therefore, the medical colleges and schools, which have the duty of training that staff, and those hospitals with which they are linked. Some of the smaller provinces have no medical colleges of their own, but all the provinces have medical schools in which the training necessary for the purpose of enabling students to qualify as assistant or sub-assistant surgeons is given. In some provinces there is a strong demand for much more generous provision of Government hospitals and dispensaries, but this demand cannot be met without a great corresponding increase of accommodation in medical colleges and schools.

It was represented to the Committee that, owing to the competition of the indigenous systems of medicine and the popular preference in many parts of the country for practitioners who followed these systems, it would be dangerous to transfer the subject of medical education, and that such a course might lead to futile attempts to combine the indigenous systems with the western system, which would not only be fatal to the professional status of Indian students trained in institutions where such a combination was recognised, but would also tend to bring into disrepute other Indian medical institutions, and to cast a doubt on all Indian medical qualifications. In order to safeguard the position as to the qualifications for the practice of medicine and surgery, the Committee decided to separate the regulation of professional qualifications and standards from the control of medical education, and to treat the former subject, which is dealt with under the Medical Registration Acts of the different provinces, as a reserved subject. Under this arrangement any attempt to introduce the teaching of indigenous systems of medicine into Government medical colleges or schools will be checked by the action of the registration authority, which can refuse to recognise qualifications obtained in colleges where any such combination is permitted. The same authority will also be in a position to prevent any lowering of existing standards, which might result from such shortening of the courses of medical training as is sometimes advocated. Apart from the objections in principle to divorcing from the general work of medical administration the control of the institutions upon which the province depends for the training of its medical staff, there is the further objection that these institutions are themselves staffed by members of the Medical Services, and the separation would, therefore, involve dual control of these services in each province, and the removal from the scope of the transferred department of appointments to the most coveted positions. The recommendations of the Committee on the subject of the Public Services include special provisions for safeguarding the interests of members of the Indian Medical Service.

(4) Paras. 93–108. Education.—The question of the transfer of the general subject of education will be dealt with in a separate note.

(5) Public Works. Para. 111.—The Government of India oppose the proposal that all provincial buildings should be transferred and would limit the transferred head to "buildings connected with transferred department," on the ground that otherwise the provision of funds for reserved buildings would be regulated by the Minister, as provision for expenditure on buildings is made in the Public Works Department budget, which in case of transfer would be controlled by him. Mr. Stephenson has had experience in the framing of budgets in Bengal, and in so far as that Province is concerned the statement in the Despatch requires qualification. In Bengal the Public Works Department estimates to the Finance Department the amount required in the coming year (a) for establishment, (b) for repairs, (c) to complete works already commenced, for which partial provision has been made in the current year. The Finance Department then decides on the total provision for the Public Works Department, and fixes the grant for establishment and repairs; the cost of completing works already commenced is then deducted, and the remainder of the provision is called "unallotted expenditure." The distribution of this unallotted sum is then discussed by the Secretaries and all Heads of Departments; the allotment suggested by them is placed before the Finance Committee of the Legislative Council, and final orders are passed by the Executive Council after considering the recommendations. The Member in charge of the Public Works Department has no special control over the allotment, which in the first instance is made by the Finance Department after consultation with the other Secretaries and Heads of Departments. Where the Public Works Department does obtain some measure of control is by re-appropriation during the year if there are savings on one work, or if a work progresses so slowly that the estimated amount cannot be spent during the financial year; the Department then re-appropriates to some other work to prevent the grant from lapsing, but the new work must be on the sanctioned list, and the Finance Department should be consulted, though this is not always done.

But, under the Reforms scheme, both in Bengal and other Provinces the arrangements will probably be considerably altered. It is suggested that in future each department will budget for its own buildings, in consultation with the Public Works Department, and after the Budget has been passed will transfer the allotment to the Public Works Department, which will not be able to re-appropriate from it without the sanction of the department concerned. The only money over which the Public Works Department will have any control of its own will be the provision for establishment and probably for repairs. The Member or Minister in charge of the Public Works Department will have no power to regulate the provision of funds for erecting the buildings of other departments; the departments will provide the money for their own work, though, of course, they will have to frame the programme in consultation with the Public Works Department, which can alone judge of the amount of work it can undertake. The proposal of the Government of India that only buildings "connected with transferred departments" shall be transferred does not appear to be workable. They contemplate that the staff of the Public Works Department shall be transferred, but that part of their work shall not, so that, under their plan, if the Minister wished to be obstructive, he could always distribute his staff to the detriment of the reserved departments.

Para. 112.—The question of the transfer of "light and feeder railways and tramways other than tramways within municipal areas," must be considered in relation to the decision as to the definition of that subject as a provincial subject (see note on item 6 (a) All-India List). If the wider definition proposed by the Government of India were adopted, the question of transfer would be effected by considerations which do not arise with reference to the Committee's proposal.

(15) Paras. 118–120.—The Government of India dissent from the proposal that "Development of industries, including industrial research and technical education," should be a transferred subject on three main grounds; firstly, because the development of industries is not at present in the provinces an organised department with an established staff and lines of procedure, and it would be impossible for a Minister untrained in administrative work and inevitably devoid of industrial experience to do the initial work of constituting the department on sound lines; secondly, because it is impossible to obtain Indian industrialists practically qualified to fulfil the duties of Ministers of industries; thirdly, because they fear the influence of racial prejudice. In considering the first two grounds it is necessary to distinguish between the position of the Minister as a member of the Government responsible for the policy of the department and that of the Director or Controller of Industries as the head of the department charged with working out that policy in detail, and creating the necessary organisation for the purpose. If this distinction is fully recognised, the weight of the objection based on these two grounds is greatly diminished. In paras. 123-126 of their Report, the Indian Industrial Commission make proposals for the establishment of All India scientific services, and in paras. 333-334 they suggest an All-India industrial service. If these proposals are accepted, the advice of the technical experts maintained by the Government of India will be available to the Provinces, and the All-India industrial service can be indented on for the superior staff necessary to organise and run the department; it does not appear essential that the Minister should himself have had industrial experience, Doubtless it is easier to carry on an organised department, but it may be urged, on the other hand, that it is something of an advantage that if the responsibility for industrial development is to rest upon the representatives of the people, they should be untrammelled by traditions and procedure of which they may not approve, but of which they will find it difficult to get rid. If the Minister disregards the advice of the experts and the Governor does not consider it his duty to intervene, the responsibility for the evil consequences apprehended by the Government of India, if they occur, will rest on the Legislative Council, who have power to control the Minister, and to whom he is responsible for his acts and policy. As regards the third ground of objection, the Committee endeavoured to provide against possible racial discrimination in the field of industrial development by the proposal that the Instrument of Instructions should include a clause making the Governor personally responsible for preventing unfair discrimination in matters affecting commercial or industrial interests.

It would appear, however, from the Government of India's remark at the end of para. 118, "The "importance of this postulate (i.e., the practice of co-operation between the local and central governments) will "be seen when we come to discuss the next question, namely, the Committee's proposal to transfer the "development of industries to the control of Ministers," that the real objection to the transfer of industries is that it limits the influence of the Government of India over the subject. This question has been discussed with reference to the proposal of the Government of India to add a heading "Development of Industries" to the All-India subjects, and it has been shown that the powers which the Government of India desire have been secured to them, and none of these powers involve such interference with the provincial department as would be inadmissible if the provincial department were transferred. In para. 324 of the Industrial Commission's Report, the following list is given of the subjects with which it is proposed that the Government of India Department of Industries should deal:—

(1) Geology and minerals.

(2) Salt

(3) Indian Explosives Act and the Indian Petroleum Act.

(4) Stationery and Printing.

(5) Inventions and designs.

(6) The collection and distribution of commercial and industrial intelligence.

(7) Supply of Stores.

(8) The Indian Factories Act.

(9) The general encouragement of industries, including the grant of assistance or concessions to industrialists in cases of more than provincial importance.

(10) Advice to local governments regarding the improvement of industries and the conduct of technical and industrial education.

(11) The administration of the various Acts relating to steam boilers.

(12) Electricity.

(13) Ordnance factories.

(14) Inspection of Ordnance manufactures.

(15) General direction and application of chemical research and the control of the proposed chemical service.

(16) Imperial factors for research and demonstration.

Most of these subjects are included under headings in the All-India List, and in so far as the proposed activities involve control over a provincial subject it will be found that such subject has been reserved, and that the legislative powers of the provinces have been restricted. The Committee were impressed by the strength of the desire that industrial development, on which the future of India so much depends, should be in the hands of the representatives of the people. Industries are admittedly a subject "in need "of development" (Joint Report para. 238), for which large sums of money will be required, and the Committee considered that there would be more prospect of the necessary funds being available if industrial development, in so far as it could properly be dealt with as a provincial subject, were placed as far as possible under the control of the Legislative Councils.

Addendum to Memorandum on Government of India Despatch dated 16th April, 1919, commenting on the Report of the Committee on Division of Functions

EDUCATION.

Paragraphs 93–108 of Despatch.

1. The proposal of the Government of India is that primary education should be transferred, and that secondary, technical and university education should be reserved. They explain in para. 102 the sense in which they use the terms "primary" and "secondary":—

> "We use the words (primary and secondary) for the sake of brevity, in a compendious sense; the former including middle vernacular, and the latter middle English or Anglo-vernacular. But the distinction we draw is not between vernacular and English. It is between types of schools and the purposes of their work. By primary schools we mean schools which cater for the masses of the people, and in which the great bulk of the pupils are not intended to go further than a middle test of some sort. In such schools the teaching is naturally in the local vernacular. There is a tendency, more pronounced in some parts of India than in others, to add instruction in English, but this does not alter the self-contained character of the schools or their purpose, which is to prepare the pupils for the ordinary avocations of their own class of life and not for higher education or professional pursuits. By secondary schools, on the other hand, we mean those which aim at an English education as the passport to the university or to skilled clerical or technical employment. Schools of this type may include primary sections, in order that their course may be continuous; but this does not detract from their character or well-recognised purpose."

2. The Government of India consider that there is already in existence a clear line of demarcation between secondary and primary education, as above defined, and that no "serious administrative "complications" are inherent in the proposed division (para. 105).

The difficulty of supporting this position is apparent from the remarks which the Government of India make in the course of their discussion of the subject. The "clear line of demarcation" is stated to rest "on differences of finance and controlling agency" (para. 105); this refers to the existing arrangement whereby primary schools are in most provinces placed under the administrative control of local authorities, while the secondary schools are in direct relations with the provincial government and the university; but it is one thing to divide education for the purpose of entrusting a measure of administrative control to local authorities, and quite another to divide it for the purpose of allotting separate spheres to two Government authorities of equal standing. To-day the provincial government is itself the supreme authority, and is in a position to determine the character of the education to be given in primary schools, and to decide any question which arises as to the limits within which local authorities are to exercise their delegated powers. In order to appreciate the difficulties which are likely to arise when the educational field is divided between two Government education authorities, each supreme within its own sphere, it is only necessary to refer to the definition which the Government of India themselves give of what they mean by "primary schools"—"schools which cater for the masses of the people, and in which the great bulk of the pupils are not "intended to go further than a middle test of some sort." This may be a workable definition for the purpose of a provincial government which is itself controlling the whole field of education, but is obviously too indefinite to mark the boundary between two separate fields controlled by different authorities.

3. Apart from this weakness in the theoretical basis of the proposed division, the following practical considerations have to be taken into account :—

(1) Most secondary schools include primary sections. It is contemplated that this arrangement shall continue ; to the extent to which it does continue the Governor in Council, as the authority controlling secondary education, will be a permanent invader of the field allotted to the Governor and Minister controlling primary education.

(2) While a large proportion of the secondary school pupils under the present system receive their primary education in the primary section of secondary schools, there is, nevertheless, a steady stream of students from the primary to the secondary schools. Mr. Sharpe, Educational Commissioner with the Government of India, said : "The number of students who go from the private vernacular schools to the "secondary schools is remarkable." He added : "A boy of the cultivating class who does not want English "education will stick to the middle vernacular school, but if his father wants him to study English, the Local "Governments have provided bridges as well as scholarships so that the boys may be able to get English "educafion without any great difficulty. . . . Generally speaking, therefore, there are bridges at various "stages to enable boys to pass from one stage to another." The proposed division involves the control of the two ends of these bridges by different authorities." Mr. Ritchie, Director of Public Instruction, Punjab, said : "I think the majority of boys in this province are taught in vernacular schools and proceed to "Anglo-vernacular schools afterwards, and therefore you must co ordinate." Mr. De La Fosse, Director of Public Instruction, United Provinces, laid emphasis on the contact between the technical schools and the vernacular schools which supply a large number of their pupils, and said that it would be necessary to adapt the course in the vernacular schools to meet the needs of the technical schools.

It is apparent from these quotations that it is impossible to regard the system of vernacular primary schools as a self-contained unit which can be separately dealt with in isolation from the rest of the educational system. It may be added that most of the secondary schools are in the towns, and failure to provide for the passing on of pupils from vernacular schools to secondary schools would be bound to have a serious effect on the opportunities of higher education available to the country boy.

(3) Under existing arrangements local authorities do not control the schools for the training of teachers. It is recognised, however, that any division of education which allotted primary education to Ministers without enabling Ministers also to control the training of teachers for primary schools, would be meaningless and absurd ; but this involves—or should involve, unless the training of primary teachers is to be kept within very narrow limits—the establishment of higher educational institutions for their benefit, which would be controlled, not by the Governor in Council as the authority responsible for higher education, but by the Governor and Minister.

(4) A great deal turns on the question of the teaching of English. English is taught in the primary sections of secondary schools, but, generally speaking, is not taught in primary schools ; there is, however, a strong movement in some provinces for the introduction of English in vernacular primary schools (see para. 284 of the Seventh Quinquennial Review of the Progress of Education), and this movement has received support from those who regard a knowledge of English as essential to the education of the voter. The introduction of English into vernacular schools will involve important changes in the primary system, especially as regards staff requirements, and will almost inevitably bring the primary schools into much closer contact with secondary schools, and obscure the line of demarcation.

4. Enough has been said to show that the difficulties of drawing any clear line of demarcation between primary and secondary education are very real. These difficulties will serve as some indication of the "administrative complications" involved in the proposed division. The Government of India contemplate, apparently, a separate directorate and a separate inspecting organisation for primary schools (see para. 105). Under the existing arrangement, the Director of Public Instruction is respo sible for all the educational work of the provincial government, and the Inspectors and Deputy Inspectors deal both with English and vernacular schools ; the Sub-Inspectors, on the other hand, deal only with vernacular schools, but they are drawn from the same cadre as teachers in secondary schools. A very considerable change, therefore, would be involved in the creation of a completely separate organisation for primary schools, and it is difficult to see how such a change could be made without involving both a substantial increase in expenditure and a serious loss of efficiency. The extra officials necessary for the purpose of separate administration of primary education can, of course, be provided if sufficient money is forthcoming, and "administrative complications" may thus, in a sense, be removed, but it can hardly be contended that education will benefit by the resulting isolation of primary schools.

5. The Government of India remark on the "discriminating treatment" of the subject of education, and say that this treatment "shows that the Committee realised the great risks involved in transferring "higher education entirely to the control of Ministers at this critical stage in its history" (para. 93). The Committee listened to a great deal of evidence on the subject of education—it would probably be correct to say that the evidence on this single subject equalled in bulk the evidence on all the rest of the subjects put together. It was the one subject which almost every non-official witness selected as that to which he attached most importance. The vast majority of the non-official witnesses were strongly in favour of transfer of the whole subject of education ; the principal dissentients were representatives of the more conservative section of the Muhammadan community. Generally speaking, the non-official witnesses who urged the transfer of education were not prepared to recognise the necessity for limiting the transfer by reserving powers to the Government of India or to the Indian Legislature, and wished University legislation to be entrusted entirely to the Provincial Councils. Official opinion on the subject of education was much divided. Objections to transfer, similar to those quoted by the Government of India, based on the grave risks involved were urged at length before the Committee. On the other hand, some educational experts of high standing expressed opinion in favour of transfer of the subject as a whole. The Committee did not recommend transfer without full appreciation of the risks involved, but they came to the conclusion that in this case the course which apparently involves less risk at the outset will not in fact prove the safest.

6. There are three points in the Committee's recommendation on which stress should be laid :—

(1) In accordance with the advice of the Calcutta University Commission, the control of University legislation is reserved to the Government of India and the Indian legislature. This control is secured :—

(a) by making the foundation of new Universities subject to Indian legislation, and (b) by requiring compulsory reservation in the case of Bills altering the constitution of existing Universities.

(2) The case of Bengal is specially dealt with so as to enable the Indian legislature to pass the legislation, both with regard to the Calcutta University and secondary education in Bengal, which is recommended by the Calcutta University Commission.

(3) Under the proposals with regard to the Public Service the position of the Indian Educational Service is safeguarded.

The existence of an All-India Educational Service, recruited and controlled by the Secretary of State, and in charge of the Government of India as an All-India subject, must have a steadying effect on the administration of education. It is from this service that the Minister's principal advisers will be drawn, and also an important portion of the academic body in each University, to which, if effect is given to the recommendations of the Commission, the control of the University's educational policy will be entrusted.

In the view of the Committee these are important limitations on transfer. The Committee throughout recognised that the question of the control of education was the most critical question to be dealt with under the second part of their reference (as to the division of subjects into reserved and transferred categories), and succeeded in arriving at their unanimous conclusion only after prolonged discussion.

7. In putting forward their case for the reservation of University and secondary education, the Government of India take little account of the political effect of reservation ; they dismiss as an "extreme "presentation of the case" the suggestion that political conditions generally may be seriously altered for the worse by a decision in favour of reserving higher education ; they ignore the difficulty in which an official government, dealing with secondary education as a reserved subject, is certain to find itself in attempting to resume control over secondary schools, which has for long been in great measure deliberately abandoned, but without which any Government will be powerless to effect reforms ; and no reference is made to the fundamental question of finance. How is an official government to get the money it wants for carrying out the essential reforms of University and secondary education, and financing the new institutions which are recognised as necessary for the purpose of development ? Unless it is able to command large additiona funds, its work will be hampered and its policy doomed to failure. Will Ministers support, and legislative councils vote, increased taxation for the purpose of financing reforms of higher education as long as the control remains in the hands of official governments ?

LISTS OF CENTRAL AND PROVINCIAL SUBJECTS PROPOSED BY FUNCTIONS COMMITTEE, AS REVISED BY INDIA OFFICE REFORMS COMMITTEE, 31ST JULY, 1919.

Note.—In order to facilitate reference the numbering of subjects as in the Report of the Functions Committee has been retained, additional subjects being distinguished by a number followed by a capital letter, e.g., 20A.

CENTRAL SUBJECTS.

1. Defence of India, and all matters connected with His Majesty's Naval, Military, and Air Forces in India, including Royal Indian Marine, volunteers, cadets and armed forces other than military and armed police maintained by provincial Governments.

Naval and military works and cantonments.

2. External relations, including naturalisation and aliens, and pilgrimages beyond India.

3. Relations with Native States.

6. Communications—to the extent described under the following heads :—

(a) Railways and tramways, except tramways within municipal areas, and except in so far as provision may be made for construction and management of light and feeder railways and tramways other than tramways within municipal areas, by provincial legislation enacted in accordance with procedure to be prescribed by standing orders of the provincial Legislative Council.

(b) Such roads, bridges, ferries, tunnels, ropeways, causeways, and other means of communication as are declared by the Governor-General in Council to be of military importance.

(c) Aircraft and all matters connected therewith.

(d) Inland waterways, to an extent to be declared by rule or by or under Indian legislation.

7. Shipping and Navigation (including shipping and navigation on inland waterways in so far as declared to be under Indian control in accordance with 6 (d)).

8. Light-houses (including their approaches), beacons, lightships, and buoys.

9. Port quarantine and marine hospitals.

10. Ports declared to be major ports by rule or by or under Indian legislation.

11. Posts, telegraphs and telephones, including wireless installations.

12. Customs, cotton excise duties, income tax, salt, stamps (non-judicial), and other sources of All-India revenue.

13. Currency and coinage.

14. Public debt of India.

15. Savings banks.

16. Department of the Comptroller and Auditor-General.

17. Civil law, including laws regarding status, property, civil rights and liabilities, and civil procedure.

18. Commerce, including banking and insurance.

19. Trading companies and other associations.

20. Control of production, supply and distribution of any articles in respect of which control by a central authority is declared by rule or by or under Indian legislation essential in the public interest.

20A. Development of industries in cases where such development by a central authority is declared by order of the Governor-General in Council expedient in the public interest.

20B. Control of cultivation and manufacture of opium, and sale of opium for export.
21. Control of petroleum and explosives.
22. Geological survey.
23. Control of mineral development, in so far as such control is reserved to the Governor-General in Council under rules made or sanctioned by the Secretary of State, and regulation of mines.
24. Inventions and designs.
25. Copyright.
26. Emigration and immigration and inter provincial migration.
27. Criminal Law, including criminal procedure.
28. Central police organisation.
29. Control of possession and use of arms.
30. Central agencies and institutions for research (including observatories) and for professional or technical training or promotion of special studies.
31. Ecclesiastical administration.
32. Survey of India.
33. Archæology.
34. Zoological Survey.
35. Meteorology.
36. Census and Statistics.
37. All-India Services.
38. Legislation in regard to any provincial subject, in so far as such subject is stated in the Provincial List to be subject to Indian legislation, and any powers relating to such subject reserved by legislation to the Governor-General in Council.
38A. Territorial changes, other than intra provincial, and declaration of laws in connection therewith.
38B. Regulation of ceremonial, titles, orders, precedence and civil uniform.
38C. Immovable property acquired by, or maintained at, the cost of the Governor-General in Council.
39. All matters expressly excepted from inclusion in the Provincial List.
40. All other matters not included in the list of provincial subjects.

PROVINCIAL SUBJECTS.

1. Local self-government, that is to say matters relating to the constitution and powers of municipal corporations, improvement trusts, district boards, mining boards of health and other local authorities established in the province for the purpose of local self-government, exclusive of matters arising under the Cantonments Act, and subject to Indian legislation (a) as regards powers of such authorities to borrow otherwise than from a provincial government, and (b) as regards the levying by such authorities of taxation not included in the schedule of provincial taxation framed under section 79 (3) (a) of the Act.
2. Medical administration, including hospitals, dispensaries and asylums and provision for medical education.
3. Public health and sanitation and vital statistics, subject to Indian legislation in respect to infectious and contagious diseases to such extent as may be declared by any Act of the Indian legislature.
4. Education (excluding—
(1) The Benares Hindu University, and such other new Universities as may be declared to be All-India by the Govenor-General in Council.
(2) Chiefs' Colleges and any institution maintained by the Govenor-General in Council for the benefit of members of His Majesty's Forces or other public servants or their children.)
subject to Indian legislation—
(a) controlling the establishment and regulating the constitutions and functions of new universities; and (b) defining the jurisdiction of any university outside its own province; and, in the case of Bengal, for a period of five years from the date when the reforms scheme comes into operation, subject to Indian legislation with regard to the Calcutta University and the control and organisation of secondary education.
5. Public works included under the following heads:—
(a) Construction and maintenance of provincial buildings used or intended for any purpose in connection with the administration of the Province; and care of historical monuments, with the exception of monuments and burial places included in Schedule;

APPENDIX G.

MEMORANDUM addressed to the Committee by Sir Claude Hill, K.C.S.I., C.I.E., received on 8th August, 1919. (For Evidence, see Question 612.)

There are certain recommendations of the Government of India, to which I was not a consenting party, and which were decided upon after I had left India in April, in which I am unable to concur.

The more important of these are the following:—

(a) Their recommendation that the proportion for Mahommedan representation fixed in accordance with the Congress Moslem League agreement, and adopted by the Southborough Committee with the consent of the local Governments concerned, should be modified in the case of Bengal. The Government of India, rightly as I think, endorse the wisdom of the policy of adopting the general proportions agreed upon between the League and the Congress; and they claim that, in advising a slight departure from the percentage fixed in the case of Bengal, they must not be understood as desiring to throw aside the compact. It is this claim which I am unable to follow. It is quite true that, in arriving at the Lucknow agreement, the contracting parties failed to satisfy the whole of Mahommedan opinion in Bengal—especially Eastern Bengal. But the agreement then subscribed to by the Mahommedan representatives aimed at making good this deficiency in Bengal by securing a stronger representation of Mahommedan interests in other provinces than was otherwise permissible on a population basis. This, it is true, does not satisfy Muslim opinion in Eastern Bengal, nor does it meet the claims which they consider just. But, if we are going to make good the deficiency inherent in the contract in relation to one province, we ought to make a corresponding change in other provinces in reduction of Mahommedan representation. In other words, it seems to me that it is impossible for the Government of India to ignore the general settlement in relation to one province, without revising it throughout. It seems to me impossible, then, to contend that we are adhering to the principles of an agreed policy, admittedly based upon compromise in relation to the whole of India, if we ask for a modification of that policy in any given part of India. The pact may be right or wrong; but it has at least the merit claimed for it by the Southborough Franchise Committee; and we must either accept it in toto or discard it in toto. I prefer—as the Government of India evidently also prefer—to abide by it; but if so it must be accepted as it stands.

(b) In respect of Education, the Government of India advise, differing from the Subjects Committee's conclusions, that education be a divided subject, higher, technical, and University education being reserved, while primary education is transferred. I am unable to agree in this conclusion. I was in charge of the education portfolio for three years in Bombay, and officiated as Member-in-Charge of the department of education in the Government of India for three months in 1915. My experience in Bombay convinces me that the subdivision of education, under which a portion would be administered by a member of the Executive Council, while the remainder would be in the control of a minister, is impracticable and could only result in divided policy and unco-ordinated effort. That experience is fortified by what I learned of the condition of education in Bengal during three months in 1915. The Calcutta University is not under the control of the local Government, while the rest of the provincial education is in the local Government's hands. One result of this was, not unnaturally, an indifference on the part of local Government to University affairs, while another was to fix a gulf between University interests and the interests of school education. It was a realisation of this, to my mind, hopeless condition of affairs, which led me to suggest an investigation into the organisation of University administration in Bengal—a recommendation which the Viceroy approved and Lord Chelmsford wisely expanded into the Commission presided over by Dr. Michael Sadler which has recently submitted its report.

I feel therefore that the whole field of education, being inextricably interwoven, must be the care of one undivided authority. The Government of India have given strong reasons for holding that in view of admitted mistakes and shortcomings in the past, that authority, in respect of University and higher education, should be the official side of the Government. On the other hand, there are admittedly equally urgent reasons for the transfer of vernacular education. Therefore if it be admitted, as I hold strongly, that the whole field of education is impartible, it remains to face the issue and determine which side of the Government is to be responsible for the whole field of education. On this issue, the arguments advanced by the Government of India in favour of the reservation of higher education seem to me to be double edged. If the errors of the past are so frankly admitted, then there is some force in the claim that the experiment should be made of transferring; and although my own preference would be to reserve the whole field of education, with a view to its transfer at the earliest possible opportunity, reorganised and more efficiently planned, I am frankly doubtful whether the official side of the Government could guarantee the attainment of such reorganisation within a reasonable period. Accepting, therefore, as very cogent the argument (universally agreed in) that primary education must be transferred, and being persuaded that the whole field of education is one and indivisible, I am, somewhat reluctantly, driven to the conclusion that it must all be transferred. I would only add that I hope such transfer will be accompanied by steps, on the lines recommended by the Sadler Commission, designed to secure co operation of all sections of the community, official and non-official, in future development.

(c) There is one other matter upon which I am not in complete accord with the later views of the Government of India. I refer to the question of the Joint or Separate Purse. I refer to this matter with great diffidence. I have already said in my evidence that I have had no experience of the administration of the Finance Department; and there are several rather technical considerations bearing upon the decision of this question with which I am not closely familiar. Another reason for diffidence lies in the fact that I was party to the decision come to in March 1918 on the advice of the then Finance Member, Sir W. Meyer, to advise the adoption of the Joint Purse system; while I was also a signatory of the Despatch of the Government of India dated 5th March 1919 in which the contrary counsel is given. In such circumstances I feel that my final views in favour of the Joint Purse system may not be entitled to special weight. But the reasons for my present view are partly political and have been arrived at after consideration of the criticisms which have been levelled at both schemes.

The Joint Report scheme (joint purse) was, as Sir J. Meston has observed, criticised, especially at first, on the ground that Ministers would only get the "crumbs that fell" from the reserved table. I believe that criticism, partly at least, suggested Sir James' alternative. But the chief reason for the change was, as the Committee has already been told, that under the Joint Purse scheme there would be an annual wrangle as to allotment, while this could be avoided by periodic settlement under the separate purse scheme. The latter scheme also claims, rightly, the virtue that it places upon both halves of the Government an interest in developing their own sources of revenue.

On the other hand the Separate Purse scheme, as outlined and described by the Government of India Despatch, contemplates depriving the Legislative Councils of the power to pass resolutions, other than purely advisory, in regard to budget allotments; while the Joint Report scheme recognised the validity of such resolutions in relation to the budget, subject only to the Governor's powers of veto and replacement. To my mind there is, in practice, little difference between the two sets of powers in point of practical effectiveness; but on paper, and in relation to the great principle of responsibility, there is a very important distinction. And it is mainly because, on a full consideration of the criticism which has been levelled at the two schemes, I feel that the powers of the Legislative Council, contemplated under the Joint Purse scheme, should not be reduced, that I prefer that scheme. I am inclined too, to the opinion that what has been described as the annual wrangle will be preferable to possible discontent, the causes of which will only be removable at longer intervals. If the budget procedure, contemplated in the Joint Report, can be restored and applied to the Separate Purse scheme, then I should regard the issue as between the two schemes as one purely for financial experts; but if the separation of purses necessitates a departure from the procedure in the Legislative Council which was agreed upon in 1918, then I am strongly of the opinion that the Joint Purse scheme should be adopted. Sir James Meston can give a more authoratitive opinion than I can as to the feasibility of adopting the budget procedure of the Joint Purse to the case of the Separate Purse system.

APPENDIX H.

MEMORANDUM on Communal Representation, handed in by Rai Bahadur K. V. Reddi, on 12th August, 1919. (See Question 2816.)

The Province of Madras, more than any other Province in India, presents the most glaring instance of the truth of the observation of the distinguished authors of the Joint Report that "there runs through Indian Society a series of cleavages—of religion, race and caste—which certainly threaten its solidarity, and which any wise political scheme must take serious heed." The conditions obtaining in that Presidency are in a sense peculiar, and perhaps without a parallel in any other part of India. The spirit of Sectarianism among certain castes is greatest there. This Presidency has given birth not only to the Home Rule Movement, which the joint authors have noted in their Report, but also to another movement, which they have not noted, styled the Varnashrama Dharma Movement, which seeks to re-establish the ethics of the Code of Manu, and to aggravate the influence of the highest caste, the Brahmins. There is also the fact that most of the politicians connected with the Home Rule Movement are closely associated with this new socially reactionary movement, that the organising secretary of the Home Rule Movement was also at one time the secretary of the Varnashrama Dharma Movement, and that the political conferences of the Home-Rulers in Madras were followed by the conferences of the Varnashrama Dharmists, at both of which the delegates were composed mostly of the same members. The Non-Brahmins of the presidency have generally kept aloof from both movements.

2. In Madras, therefore, the cleavage between the Brahmins and the Non-Brahmins is widest. They belong to different castes which make it impossible for them to interdine or intermarry—an impossibility which has all the sanction of the law of the land. Their customs and manners are essentially different, and even in the matter of food the two classes differ widely. Their interests are often not identical. Over and above all this there is the fundamental difference which goes to the root of the whole problem—the two people belong to two different races. The Brahmins claim to be the Aryans while the Non-Brahmins claim to be, and are treated as, Dravidians. There is only one thing in common between these two vitally different and vitally hostile races—their religion, if that sacred appellation could be given to a set of inflexible and unjust customs and usages, culminating in a system of social tyranny. The Brahmins, as a class, are clever and well-educated, while the Non-Brahmins are almost entirely illiterate. The one class is politically minded, while the other has not so far shown any aptitude for politics. To quote the joint authors of the Report "the enormous masses of the population have little to spare for more than the necessaries of life" (Para. 135). "They form an enormous country population, for the most part poor, ignorant, non-politically minded, and unused to any system of elections—immersed indeed in the struggle for existence. They are poorly equipped for politics, and do not at pretent wish to take part in them." Where the average Ryot does take part in politics, "his mind is made up for him by his landlord or banker, or his priest or his relatives, or the nearest official," and yet these "rural classes have the greatest stake in the country because they contribute most to its revenues." We do not desire to dwell at greater length on the social inequalities and injustice that prevail in the Presidency—a fact which everyone connected with it is well aware of.

3. The population of the Madras Presidency, amounting to 41,405,404, very nearly the same as that of the United Kingdom, is distributed as follows :—

Agency Tracts	1,577,519
European British subjects	12,692
Anglo-Indians	25,965
Indian Christians	1,137,208
Mohammedans	2,735,673
Depressed Classes	6,377,168
Brahmins...	1,221,907
Non-Brahmins	27,716,306
Others	600,966
Total	41,405,404

4. It will be seen that the Brahmins form a very small percentage—about 3 per cent.—of the population; but owing to a variety of causes almost all the power and influence has, under the present system of administration of the province, become concentrated in their hands. We shall show how this single community has secured a power and an influence out of all proportion to its strength or intellectual ability. In appreciating these conditions it must be borne in mind that in the Madras Presidency, in spite of the influence of Western education, and of more than a century of benign British rule, the rigour and exclusiveness of the caste system has not weakened to any appreciable extent, with the inevitable result that there is little in common between those who chiefly wield the power at present, and others who are now left behind in the race. We shall show first how the Brahmin occupies a unique position in the Legislative Councils of the country, and then show what his place is in the public services. Time and space forbid us to give more than a few glaring instances of Brahmin monopoly in the Councils and services.

5. As the joint Authors of the Report point out, it was in 1892 under Lord Cross's Act that the elective system was first introduced in India, though in an indirect form. Twenty seven long years have rolled by since that Act was passed, and during all this time, in spite of several elections, not a single Non-Brahmin has been returned to the Madras Legislative Councils from the six coast districts known as the Northern Circars by the General or Territorial electorates. These districts contain a population of 11,736,744, of which the Brahmins form only 345,071 againt 7,585,035 Non-Brahmins, and yet a series of Brahmin candidates has been returned for over a generation without any interruption or intrusion on the part of the Non-Brahmins.

In the last Legislative Council Elections held in 1916, out of ten seats thrown open to General or Territorial electorates (Local Boards and Municipalities) in the whole Presidency, nine seats were captured by the Brahmins, and only one went to a Non-Brahmin. In the Finance Committee of their Council not a single Non-Brahmin member is to be found. In the Imperial Legislative Council all the three seats open to Indians of the Province are at present held by Brahmins. Two of these members were elected by the non official members of the local Legislative Council, while the third member was elected by the landholders of the Province. Such, in short, is the position, so far as the Legislative Councils are concerned. Let us draw the attention of the Committee to the exact state of affairs, so far as the public services are concerned, and show how the Brahmin has monopolised all the important posts.

6. The following table is an analysis of the latest Madras Civil Service List.

7. The figures speak for themselves. "When in the years 1893 to 1905," says Sir Alexander Cardew, the first member of the Executive Council of Madras, "Deputy collectors were selected by open competition 15 out of 16 appointments went to Brahmins. . . . In the Madras Public Works Department, where one appointment is given annually by competition, there have been 17 successful Brahmins out of 21 appointments, a ratio of 81 per cent." Nor is this excessive preponderence of the Brahmin confined to appointments recruited by a competitive test. We find exactly the same result in branches of the public services which are recruited from candidates possessing certain general qualifications. To quote Sir Alexander again, "Out of 390 higher appointments in the educational department, 310 are held by Brahmins; in the Judicial Department 118 out of 171; in the Revenue Department 394 out of 679." We note that Sir Alexander remarks that this result has ensued in spite of all efforts of the Government to secure a due representation of all castes in the public services. We may be permitted to enter a caveat against this statement. We can show by facts and figures that if the Government had taken sufficient trouble to bring about an even distribution of official patronage it could have done so. There are qualified candidates among the Non-Brahmins and Indian Christians who could have filled the appointments in Government service many times over, with credit to themselves and advantage to the Administration. The policy of the Government in the past has been such that no other result was possible. We are not, however, concerned with an investigation of the past causes, nor in apportioning the blame. We take note of the solid fact that the control of the services by the Brahmins is out of all proportion to their numbers or intelligence. It is impossible to find a parallel to this state of affairs in any civilised country.

8. The above facts clearly show how the Brahmins have taken advantage of the existing conditions, and secured for themselves a predominant place in politics, in the public services, and in the councils of the country out of all proportions to their numbers or intelligence. It has already been pointed out that their population is about 3 per cent. of the total population, while the Non-Brahmins form nearly 70 per cent., that is, excluding the Panchamas. The Brahmins own considerable property, some landed, but mostly personal. Almost the entire land held by the Brahmins, however, is either Agraharam land or Inam land, both of which are Revenue free. They do not pay even the irrigation cess, because their lands are, to a great extent, what are known as "mamul wet." They do not thus contribute anything worth mentioning to the coffers of the State. The Non-Brahmins, who are the landholders, farm proprietors, and producers, pay almost the entire taxes of the country. The annual expenditure of the Madras Presidency is about 8 crores of rupees, and the land revenue alone of the Province, including the irrigation cess, is over 6 crores of rupees, nearly the whole of which is paid by Non-Brahmins alone. In other words, almost the entire cost of the Administration of the Province is borne by the Non-Brahmins. One of the Madras Representatives in the present Imperial Legislative Council—a Brahmin, of course, elected by the non-official members of the Madras Legislative Council—made the following admission in a speech in the Council Chamber: "I do not represent the landed interest, and what other interest I represent it is difficult even for me to say. I own no land and pay no land tax. I have no income which comes within the honourable, the finance members sweep. I pay no income tax, I contribute, so far as I can see, nothing to the State, except a certain amount of agitation which I am firmly persuaded is entirely wholesome." Many Brahmins do own land, but pay no taxes. Thus owning property, but paying no Taxes to the State, and being only 3 per cent. of the population, the Brahmins still occupy 80 per cent. of the places in the public services and the Councils of the country.

9. So long as the non-official members of the Legislative Council had no practical control over the executive body, and could only indulge in "the habits of irresponsible criticism, which have been the bane of the Minto-Morley councils," the Non-Brahmins generally were not very much perturbed at the ascendancy which the Brahmins had secured in these Councils. They felt the inequality, but they tolerated it; they saw the injustice, and they resented it. But the inequality and injustice not being armed with power, did not provoke them to open revolt. Above the Brahmin, who exercised only influence, was the Britisher in India, who wielded power. After all, the Britisher ruled till now. He has been at the top of the public services, and in the majority in the Legislative Councils. Not that this is a desirable state of affairs in itself, but that "his integrity, fair play and detachment" qualities, which are essentially and absolutely lacking in the Brahmin, enabled him to hold the scales even between Indian and Indian. The Non-Brahmin need not, and did not, apprehend much danger. "The country people have, and always have had, confidence in the English official. He has given them peace and justice, and made life easier for them, and the vast majority of people ask for little more." But such a state of affairs is no longer to continue. A great change is impending. That the scheme of reforms now promulgated is a "colossal enterprise," and that "the welfare or misery" of 250 millions of the people "hangs upon its success or failure" is admitted by the eminent authors of the Report. That "it is one of the greatest political experiments ever undertaken in the world's history" is clear to every student of politics. That the system of administration proposed is "unfamiliar to Oriental ideas" is conceded. There is no doubt that there will be an entire change. From the sphere of influence, Indians will be lifted to the field of power, and the impartial Britisher will occupy a place of minor importance in the public services, and will be in a minority in the Legislative Councils, eventually to be effaced out of any appreciable existence in India.

10. When Non-Brahmin leaders in Madras contemplated these changes, when they remembered what the Brahmins have hitherto been, how they monopolised all the places of influence in the public services and the Councils of the country, how they utilised that influence for their own ends, for their own aggrandisement, to broad-base their own power and position to the entire detriment and exclusion of the Non-Brahmins they naturally apprehended danger ahead. When a self-seeking hand secures influence, danger is serious enough, but when that influence is converted into power, disaster can be the only consequence.

11. It is an apprehension based on the above facts and logical conclusions that induced the confederation of the Non-Brahmins of South India, which met in Madras in December, 1917, and was attended by over 1,500 delegates from all parts of the Presidency to unanimously pass the following resolution :—

> "This Confederation emphatically urges upon the Viceroy and Secretary of State for India that any step taken for introducing responsible government in this country which does not provide for the full representation of the Non-Brahmins on a communal basis, having regard to their numbers, their tax-paying capacity and their property qualifications, is bound to end in failure and disaster, and this Confederation would strongly oppose the introduction of any reforms in which such provision is not made."

12. At the Extraordinary Session of the South Indian Non-Brahmin Confederation, held in October, 1918, for considering the Joint Report, the following resolution was unanimously passed :—

> "This Confederation is emphatically of opinion that any scheme of constitutional reforms which does not provide for the separate representation through communal electorates of Non-Brahmin classes will arrest the progress and irretrievably injure the interests of these classes, which form the bulk of the population, besides effectually undermining British rule, which is so essential to India's welfare, and for that reason this Confederation does not consider it necessary to express any opinion at present on the proposed scheme of reforms."

13. At the Six Coast Northern Districts' Non-Brahmin Conference held at Bezwada in November, 1917, at which some two thousand non-Brahmins were present, the following resolution was unanimously passed :—

> "That the strength of the Madras Legislative Council should be so enlarged as to provide due representation of all communities and interests, regard being had to (a) the numbers of the several communities; (b) the aggregate of taxes paid by them; and (c) the extent of property owned by them. In view of the fact that power and influence are at present chiefly centred in a single community, and that the other communities have only a slender chance of securing due representation in the Councils, unless proper safeguards are provided, and in view also of the fact that in the near future the powers of the Councils are expected to be enhanced, this Conference declares that any scheme of reforms either of the Councils of the country or of the public services in which due and adequate representation is not provided for the large Non-Brahmin communities of this Province on the three bases above mentioned, is bound to result in failure, and consequent discontent and disharmony."

14. Non-Brahmin Conferences all over the Presidency have expressed the same opinion. It would weary the Committee if we were to give the resolutions passed at these Conferences, but they are all to the same effect. We give below a short list of some of the more important of these Conferences :—

The Coimbatore Non-Brahmin Conference held at Coimbatore in August, 1917.
The Godavary District Non-Brahmin Conference at Biccavole in October, 1917.
The Madura, Ramnad, Tinnevelly Group Conference held at Tinnevelly in November, 1917.
The Ceded Districts Non-Brahmin Conference at Pulivendla in November, 1917.
The Salem Non-Brahmin Conference in December, 1917.
The Tanjore Trichinopoly Non-Brahmin Conference in March, 1918.
The Chittore District Non-Brahmin Conference in March, 1918, at Kalahasti.
The Guntur District Non-Brahmin Conference held in May, 1918, at Kollur.
The Sivaganga Zanindary Non-Brahmin Conference in August, 1918.
The Godavary District Special Conference at Rajahmudy in September, 1918.

The Trichinopoly District Special Conference in September, 1918.
The Coimbatore District Non-Brahmin Special Conference at Palladum in October, 1918.
The Coimbatore Second Non-Brahmin Conference at Udumalpet in 1918.
The Kistna District Non-Brahmin Conference at Masulipatam.
And the Second Session of the South Indian Non-Brahmin Confederation held at Madras in January, 1919.

These form a short list of the more important Conferences of Non-Brahmins in the Madras Presidency.

The latest Non-Brahmin Conference was held at Trichinopoly so late as the 22nd June, 1919, when the following resolution was unanimously passed :—

"That this Conference regards the equal distribution of political power among the different classes of the people as the first necessary substantial step towards responsible Government in this country, and while expressing gratification at the special representation of the Mohammedans, Sikhs, Indian Christians, Europeans, Anglo-Indians, and the depressed classes, urges the creation of a Non-Brahmin Hindu electorate as the indispensable foundation for popular Government, in the absence of which any Constitutional Reform will be unreal, dangerous, unworkable and sure to give rise to grave discontent."

15. The state of feeling among the Non-Brahmins and the condition of the community was correctly gauged by the Government of Madras, when in their letter No. 1146, dated 31-12-1918 to the Government of India (Home Department) they observed as follows :—

"In the case of the Non-Brahmin Caste Hindus, to which category the great majority of voters will belong, there is a general feeling of apprehension that under any scheme of purely territorial electorates, most of the seats would be captured by Brahmins, as the exclusive spirit of the Brahmin would secure a solid Brahmin vote in favour of Brahmin candidates. Their experience and their educational superiority would give the Brahmins great advantages in canvassing, while their traditional, social and religious pre eminence and their talents for organisation would be utilised to extend their political influence outside their own class. While it is difficult to predict how the electorates of the future, if territorially constituted, will behave in respect of choosing their representatives, the Governor in Council cannot ignore the fact that the apprehensions above referred to are honestly entertained.

* * * * *

"In any case so long as these apprehensions are widely and strongly felt, as at present, it is impracticable to constitute territorial electorates, which will be generally acceptable, and will ensure representation of all important sections of the population.

* * * * *

"The method of achieving this end that is most likely to meet the apprehensions above referred to, though it is recognised to be open to theoretical objections, will be to provide communal electorates freely wherever this can be done, nomination being resorted to only where such electorates cannot be constituted."

Sir Alexander Cardew, in an enclosure to the despatch referred to above, states as follows :—

"With such predominance in most walks of life, it is not surprising that the Brahmin has easily secured control in politics. . . . This experience strongly suggests that the political machine in the future, as in the past, will be under the control of the Brahmins, unless special measures are resorted to, to secure adequate representation of other classes."

Sitting on the Committee on Division of Functions, Mr. M. E. Couchman (Member of the Madras Board of Revenue :—

"After examining the proposals of the Franchise Committee for Madras, which were supplied to him on the 22nd February, feels unable to recommend the transfer of any subject in Madras. He feels that without :—

(1) Communal Representation for Non-Brahmin Caste Hindus ;

(2) Adequate Representation of Panchamas and Rural Areas, and

(3) Residential qualifications for Candidates ;

it is inevitable that the Brahmin minority will capture a large majority of the seats, and that the interests of the masses will not be safe in their hands." (Para. 51 of the Report on Division of Functions).

16. It is impossible to find greater authorities than those quoted above. The whole of the Madras Government have supported our claim. That Government had long been known to have encouraged Brahmins in every department. Examine the Civil List again, and you will find that numerous appointments have been conferred by the Government on Brahmins. There are numerous instances in which Non-Brahmins of approved ability aud unblemished character have been passed over by the Government. If ever the the Government of Madras was partial it was all on the side of the Brahmins. There never was any question of over-tenderness towards the Non-Brahmin classes. The opinion of such a Government, therefore, must carry special weight when it happens to be favourable to the Non-Brahmins. At the time the memorandum referred to above was submitted, the Government of Madras was presided over by Lord Pentland, who spent a longer time in the province than any other Governor. Sir Alexander Cardew had only a few months to complete his long term of office, the whole of which he had spent in the Province. Mr. Davidson, the other European Member, had also served nearly 30 years in the Presidency. The Indian Member of the Executive Council, himself a Brahmin, did not think it necessary to submit a dissenting note, or contradict any of the statements of facts mentioned in the despatch, or in Sir Alexander's separate note. It must, therefore, be presumed that he has acquiesced in the opinions of the Madras Government above quoted. That opinion, I may be permitted to add, was not merely the result of long experience, but was also the consequence of a heated debate of full two days between the picked representatives of the Brahmins and of the Non-Brahmins at an informal, private, Franchise Conference, called by the Madras Government, and presided over by the Governor. The opinion of the above high and impartial authorities ought not to be lightly cast aside. They are the men on the spot who have followed closely the political and social conditions of the people, and we appeal to the Joint Committee to treat this mass of unimpeachable testimony as beyond cavil or criticism, and to accept it whole-heartedly.

17. Having brought to the notice of the Joint Committee the Non-Brahmin opinion and feeling in the matter, and the views of the Authorities on the spot, we shall now proceed to discuss the views of the Government of India, and the Secretary of State. Before doing so, however, we may be permitted to submit, with great respect, that these two high functionaries have treated the Non Brahmin, most unkindly. Immediately after the declaration of the 20th August, and at the very commencement of the enquiry, they wanted to attain a calm atmosphere in India. To achieve that end they had to pacify the extremists. The people, the real people, the people that formed the backbone of the country, did not count. These never gave any trouble, and were not expected to give any trouble at any time. Nothing need be done for them. At a time when the very foundations of the Empire were tottering, when German gold was on its way to India from San Francisco, when extremists in India thought that England's danger was India's opportunity, the Non-Brahmins in that country were splendidly responding to the call of the Empire by subscribing liberally to the war funds and war loans, and recruiting themselves in thousands and tens of thousands. The rich Non-Brahmins were contributing beyond their might, and the poor peasants were pouring into the recruiting camps. I was a member of the recruiting board, and I and my friend know who it was that came to be recruited to the Army and to the several Labour Corps. Examine the recruiting registers and you will find that 9,999 out of every 10,000 recruits that were enlisted in our Province were Non-Brahmins. Examine the lists of those who fought in Mesopotamia, or of those who were taken prisoners in Kut-el-Amara, and see if there is a single Brahmin therein. Examine the lists of the several thousands who joined the Labour Corps from Madras, and see if you can find a Brahmin there. And yet these Non-Brahmins counted for little. It looks as if it never occurred to the authorities that those who rendered such valuable services, those who pay almost the entire taxes that go for the maintenance of the administration of the country, might feel the great injustice done to them. Read the Joint Report as casually as you like, you cannot fail to be impressed at every turn of a constant and irresistible desire to pacify the limited intelligentsia, the politically minded classes. It is also said that during his stay at Delhi, the Secretary of State gave private interviews to Brahmin politicians. No leader of Madras—not even the late Dr. Nair—was accorded that privilege. On the publication of the Joint Report, Mrs. Besant openly boasted in her daily paper that she had the privilege of seeing "an earlier draft" of it at Delhi, and it is commonly believed in Madras that Mr. C. P. Ramaswami iyer, the Brahmin Home-ruler of Madras, was shown the draft. No Non-Brahmin had even the slightest inkling of what the Report was likely to be, and certainly none were shown any drafts at all. In the Joint Report itself a whole chapter is devoted to a criticism of the Congress-League Scheme, but save for a very casual and passing reference the joint authors have not dealt with the Non Brahmin movement and their demands. On the other hand, elaborate arguments have been found to defeat the claim for communal representation. But the question was vital to us, and on its solution depended the welfare or misery of vast millions, and so thanks to the agitation in England, the Secretary of State left the question open to be decided by the Franchise Committee, which he proposed to appoint. But unfortunately he added, if we remember right, that speaking for himself, he was still against it, and that he would not withdraw an hair's breadth from the position he had taken up.

His Excellency the Viceroy, in an important speech in the Imperial Legislative Council, assured the Mohammedans and the Civil Service that their interests will be protected, but had not a word of sympathy or encouragement to offer to the Non-Brahmins. When our great leader, Dr. Nair, landed in England last year he was promptly muzzled, though the extremist politician, Mr. Baptista, was enjoying freedom of speech in Free England. It was only after the matter was made a subject of discussion in Parliament that he was unmuzzled. But the crowning act of injustice had yet to come. It was in the constitution of the Franchise Committee. So much has been said about the impartiality of this Committee, and so many claims have been put forward on its behalf, and so vitally important are its recommendations that we may be excused if we were to dwell shortly on its constitution. The Committee was composed of six members besides the President who was, of course, new to India, and its conditions. The three European members were strangers to the conditions prevailing in Madras, and so was the Mohammedan member. We have nothing to complain against these four members. We have and have always had the highest respect for them and the Chairman. Our objection was to the remaining two. These two other members were Brahmins, and Brahmins who were known to be hostile to our interests. Mr. Srivivasa Sastri, the Madras Brahmin, had in fact used his position in the Imperial Council to level an attack against us and our movement, and had the boldness to declare that Non-Brahmins would prefer a Brahmin oligarchy to a British bureaucracy. As against these avowed opponents there was not a single Non-Brahmin to counteract their views, and to interpret correctly to the other members of the Committee the wishes of the people.

The announcement of the composition of the Committee spread consternation among the Non-Brahmins. In almost every district meetings were held protesting against the constitution and praying that a Non-Brahmin might be appointed to the Committee. Over twenty-five protest meetings were held, and the resolutions were communicated to His Excellency the Viceroy, or His Excellency the Governor, by wire. Finally the gathering of all the Non-Brahmins of Madras—the Extraordinary Session of the South Indian Non-Brahmin Federation—was held on the 20th October, and a lengthy resolution was unanimously adopted requesting the personnel of the Committee to be altered. The resolution was communicated by wire to His Excellency the Viceroy, and by cable to the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for India, and other Cabinet Ministers. A Memorandum was prepared by the South Indian Liberal Federation, and sent to His Excellency the Viceroy. We are sorry to point out that these wires, cables and Memoranda were not even acknowledged, that we were not vouchsafed even the short reply that "the matter will receive due consideration." Our cry was a cry in the wilderness. It was under these circumstances that the Second Non-Brahmin Confederation held at Madras in January, 1919, passed a resolution enjoining its members not to appear or give evidence before the Franchise Committee, and resolving to appear directly before the Joint Committee and ask for justice at its hands. We accordingly found ourselves unable to give evidence before the Lord Southborough's Committee.

18. We mention these facts not as a complaint before this High Tribunal, but to make our own position clear and to show that the Authorities connected with India are not championing the cause of the Non-Brahmins. If, therefore, a favourable opinion comes from such a quarter, the very greatest weight should have to be given to it. Let us now see what the Government of India have to say on this important question of communal representation to the Non-Brahmins of Madras.

In the fifth despatch on Indian Constitutional Reform they say: "We confess to the greatest difficulty in accepting their (the Franchise Committee's) proposals in regard to Non-Brahmins in Madras. If, contrary to theoretical principles, communal electorates are to be conceded to three communities in addition to the Mohammedans and the Sikhs, then it appears to us that there is a very strong practical need for finding some means of dealing specially with the Non-Brahmins also. . . . If the reforms scheme is not to start under a very heavy handicap in Madras, the bitter feelings which have been aroused by this controversy must be allayed. We cannot expect co-operation and good will from the Non-Brahmins so long as no provision is made to secure their interests. . . . Our own responsibility for the contentment of the country makes it incumbent upon us to make every attempt to arrive at a settlement which will satisfy the reasonable claims of both parties before reforms are introduced. .. . . Recent experience in Madras has shown how inadequately Non-Brahmins are likely to be represented in the Council, unless some special provision for them is made. Numbers count for little in India at present against social, educational and especially religious superiority, which has behind it the sanction of centuries. We shall find it hard to meet the charge that we are acquiescing in the establishment of an oligarchy in Madras, unless something is done to secure to the Non-Brahmins a fair share in the legislature." The need for communal representation for Non-Brahmins cannot be put in stronger or more convincing language.

19. So far we have pointed out that all the Non-Brahmin Conferences of Madras, the Government of that Province, and the Government of India support our claim to separate representation. We shall next show that even associations organised and controlled by Brahmins, associations in which Brahmins are in an overwhelming majority, could not, and did not, oppose our claims, and practically admitted them.

(1) The Andra Conference, a political organisation of the people of the Andra or Telugu districts of the Madras Presidency, in which the Brahmins have a deciding voice and which is organised and controlled by Brahmins, passed the following resolution at its session held on the 30th September, 1917 :—

" This Conference approves of the principle of communal representation to the Legislative Councils on the following lines :—

(i.) The Non-Brahmin Hindu communities should have an irreducible minimum of representation fixed, having regard to their numbers, wealth and tax-paying capacity.

(ii.) The Brahmins should have a representation fixed, having regard to their education, culture and population.

(iii.) Similiar representation should be given to (Indian) Christians.

(iv.) The interests of the Panchamas should be safeguarded.

(v.) Voting should be direct.

(vi.) Franchise should be extended.

(vii.) Non-Brahmins should have a fair share in the public services."

—The Hindu, 2nd October, 1917.

(2) We find that the Mahajana Sabha, of Madras, supposed to represent the political aspirations of the people of the Presidency, but almost exclusively composed of Brahmins, in the address which it presented to the Secretary of State, and the Viceroy in December, 1917, practically admitted the need for communal representation for all communities.—The Hindu, December, 1917.

(3) The Madras Provincial Congress Committee, another political organisation, whose members are the Congressmen of Madras, and mostly Brahmins, also, in the address presented to the same high functionaries, in December, 1917, practically admitted the need for communal representation for Non-Brahmins of the Presidency.—The Hindu, December, 1917.

(4) Nor did the matter stop here. Some time after the Non Brahmin movement was started, and its daily organ, The Justice, began to be published, the Brahmins felt the necessity of counteracting the influence of the movement for their own sake, and began to manipulate the formation of a rival organisation of the Non-Brahmins. Many Brahmin leaders took an active part in bringing into existence an association styled the Madras Presidency Association (vide correspondence published in the Hindu, 10th and 12th September, 1917). Even this Brahmin-controlled organisation, in the address which it presented to the Secretary of State and His Excellency the Viceroy in December, 1917, demanded Communal representation. Further, when on the 21st December, 1917, this Association held a joint session with the Madras Provincial Conference, the Madras Branch of the Congress and a Brahmin body (a further circumstance showing the control of the Brahmins over the Association), and when a few Brahmins wanted to avoid the passing of a resolution on the question of Communal representation, the following speech was made by Mr. V. Chakkarai, B.A., B.L., a Non Brahmin, of that Association : " The Madras Presidency Association joined the Provincial Congress Committee in convening this Special Conference on the express understanding that communal representation would be embodied in the self-government resolution as an integral part of the Congress scheme. Otherwise the Madras Presidency Association would not have come in. The Madras Mahajana Sabha and the Madras Provincial Congress Committee had given their adherence to the principle of communal representation. At this juncture of their national history they should not go back upon the resolution placed before the Conference. If they did so, they would wreck the Congress on this very platform." (The Hindu, 22-12-1917.) The demand of the Madras Presidency Association for Communal representation to the Non-Brahmins could not have been put in stronger terms. The resolution above referred to "insists on adequate representation of all communities other than Brahmins."—(The Hindu, 22-12-1917.)

(5) Finally, the All-India Conference of the Moderate Party at its first session held in Bombay, on the 1st and 2nd of November, 1918, under the Presidency of the Honble. M. Surendranath Bannerjee, passed the following amended resolution : Resolution viii. (c) : " The Franchise should be so broad and the electorates so devised as to secure to all classes of taxpayers their due representation by election, and the interests of those communities or groups of communities in Madras and the Bombay Deccan and elsewhere, who at present demand special electoral protection, should be adequately safeguarded by introducing a system of plural constituencies in which a reasonable number of seats should be reserved for those communities."

(6) The following two extracts from two pamphlets, published by the Honble. Mr. V. Sreenivasasastry, one entitled, " Self Government for India under the British Flag " (pp. 36, 37), and the other, " The Congress League scheme—an Exposition " (p. 13), respectively, though somewhat coloured light by a facile pen will give an idea of the extent of the injustice done to Non-Brahmins and of their feeling in the matter, and also of the recognition thereof, even against their will, by the Brahmins themselves :—

" In Madras and parts of the Bombay Deccan the Brahmin class has created a feeling of jealousy and distrust against itself. The Non-Brahmin, though in an overwhelming majority, finds his class without adequate representation in the Services or in the professions, and believes that this result is due to the caste instinct of the Brahmin, who, having selfishly monopolised the advantages of education and social precedence in the past, is now equally selfishly enjoying its fruits by keeping members of other castes from approaching all modern avenues to preferment and distinction. . . . The sense of injustice and long-continued wrong rankles equally. . . . The ill-feeling came out in an ugly form when the Public Services Commission visited Madras and has since passed into an acute phase. . . . One duty rests on the Brahmin, as being the party having the advantage at present. He must recognise that the attitude of the Non-Brahmin is not only the natural but inevitable consequence of the past, and must be ready and willing in social relations to pay tender heed to the feelings of the Non-Brahmin."—December, 1916.

"It is unusual to make special arrangements for the protection of an immense and overwhelming majority, but it is also unusual for a numerically small caste to enjoy a decisive ascendency over most other classes in culture and social and political influence. The framers of the Congress League scheme failed to foresee this contingency. But some way must be found of overcoming it. So far the proposals that have been made for the purpose aim at securing a minimum representation for the majority and as a special electorate. It would seem easier and more natural to fix a maximum for the Brahmin minority."—November, 1917.

It will thus be seen that every shade of Non-Brahmin opinion in our Province demands Communal representation, that the Brahmins themselves have agreed to it though in a modified form, and that even the "moderate" leaders of all India have recognised the need for it and that both the Local and India Governments support it.

20. In para. 24 of the joint Report it was observed :—

"The speeches of English and American statesmen proclaiming the necessity for destroying German militarism and for conceding the right of self-determination to the nations, have had much effect upon political opinion in India, and have contributed to give new force and vitality to the demand for self-government, which was making itself more widely heard among the progressive section of the people."

If this was advanced as one of the grounds for granting a substantial measure of self-government, it is impossible to conceive how Communal representation could be refused to the Non-Brahmins of Madras, when all the representative members of that community without a single exception demand it, when the Local Government and the Government of India support it, and when the Brahmin associations themselves could not but concede it. If Ulster, representing a minority in Ireland, could be excluded from the operation of the Government of Ireland Act (which, if nothing happens meanwhile, will come into operation in a few months) because Ulster wanted it, it seems to be an irony of fate, that what is wanted by all the Non Brahmins in Madras, should be refused to them. Ulster was excluded against the will of Nationalist Ireland. Communal representation is not to be given to Non-Brahmins even though all Non-Brahmins clamour for it, most of the Brahmins conceded it, and the Local and India Governments support it.

21. Having brought to the notice of the Joint Committee the concensus of opinion in India, on this all-important question, we shall now meet the objections raised against the grant of Communal representation. In dealing with this question we desire it to be understood that the advocates of Communal representation do not put it forward as an end in itself, but only as a means to an end, the end or object being the adequate representation of all important communities in the councils of the country. We desire it to be further understood that the principle ought to be applied under the present conditions of society, that, like the reforms suggested, it is also a tentative measure, subject to revision by the periodic commissions which may set aside the principle when and if they find that it has worked injury to the State or has outgrown its period of usefulness. It is under these limitations and with this understanding that we approaeh the question.

22. The objections raised to the grant of Communal representation are contained in paragraphs 228 to 230 of the Joint Report. We would not have troubled this Committee with the discussion of these objections and the principles enunciated, considering that they are more honoured in the breach than in the observance, in the Southborough Report, which gave Communal representation to four communities besides the Mohammedans. But we find from the evidence before this Committee that these principles and objections must have weighed a good deal with the Southborough Committee. Lord Southborough in one place (Q. 758) said "But the Madras question is one of those things where the onus is still left upon us," and made that a ground of a somewhat long statement on the subject. Later on (813), his lordship was pleased to shift the onus on to us. We confess we were not able to follow his lordship, but Sir F. Sly made the question clear when he said (1020), "We had as Committee, you will recollect, some onus thrown upon us to justify—peculiarly justify—Communal representation in consequence of the terms of the Montague-Chelmsford Report, telling the world through the Cabinet here, that Communal representation was a thing to be shy of. That prounouncement, although it was relaxed to a great extent by the Viceroy's speech, was bound to tincture our method of dealing with the subject, because we had really to show that in India the thing could only be dealt with otherwise." It is thus clear that these objections and principles have weighed a good deal with the Southborough Committee, and have a bearing on the question of "onus." We shall therefore deal with them at some length.

23. It is said that "Communal electorates are opposed to the teachings of history," and that they involve a "divided allegiance," which the State cannot admit. It is not clear what history is referred to. Nor can there be any historic parallel, for the simplest of reasons, that in no country in the world is there such a social system of caste as that which exists in India, and especially in Madras, where its rigour is of the utmost. There are no Brahmins in Austria or Cyprus or in the smaller German States. The Magyars of Hungary are nothing when compared with the Brahmins of Madras. The only precedent, so far as we could see, is furnished by India alone. Communal representation was granted to the Mohammedans under the Minto-Morley Scheme. Prior to that the Mohammedans were hostile to the Hindus. When it was granted the Hindus in their Congres met, agitated, resented and protested year after year, and passed lengthy resolutions against it, condemning the principle most passionately. But within a few years not only did they reconcile themselves to it, but actually entered into a defensive and offensive alliance with the Moslems in 1916. This was the Lucknow Agreement, which was—according to the Joint Report—"a beginning of which note must be taken, and which marks a change in the situation." The rapprochement of the two communities has become possible only because the interests of the Mohammedans were safeguarded, and they were given equality of political status with the Hindus by the grant of Communal representation. The only instance available therefore shows that Communal representation is not opposed to the teachings of history.

24. It has also been urged in the joint report in this connection that by the granting of Communal representation, the allegiance of the citizen is divided between the State and the community, and that no State can admit it. By the grant of Communal representation to Mohammedans, Sikhs, Indian Christians, Europeans and Anglo-Indians, and to various interests, it will not be admitted, we expect, that there was any such division. If not, why should there be such division if it be granted to a sixth community, after five communities are granted. Let us leave alone this invidious distinction. It is impossible, at the very outset to understand the objection itself, except on the hypothesis that the allegiance to the community is necessarily opposed to the allegiance to the State, and that the interests of the community are antithetical to those of the State. We fail to see the correctness of the hypothesis. Communal representation is required to protect the interests of one community as against another community. Where the State is concerned all communities owe equal allegiance, and there cannot arise any question of divided allegiance. The question of national citizenship does not at all arise in the matter of elections and the electorate. All the world over every voter goes to the polling booth just to vote for a particular party or a member of a particular community or interest, and even the member that is elected goes and votes for his party. To-day, the Mother of Parliaments is divided here on the important question of the Nationalisation of the Coal Mines, the Labourites demanding it and the Government, with its vast majority, opposing it. Is there any divided allegiance to the State, of the Labourites or of the supporters of the Government? What about the Irish Nationalists and the Ulsterites. What about the Republicans, Democrats or Populists of America? Do they vote or do they not vote for a party? And wherein does the question of national citizenship come in, except, of course, in the face of a foreign crisis or a great war, like the one just closed? Can we not say with equal reason that, to whatever party or caste we may belong in our country, whether Brahmins or Non-Brahmins, Hindus or Mohammedans, Anglo Indians or Sikhs, Indian Christians or Panchams, when a national crisis occurs we all would join together. Can anyone think that a member of a Legislative Council would not be able to sink his caste or private differences into the national cause simply because he is come from a particular electorate? The objection of divided allegiance, therefore, has no force in it.

25. We are perfectly willing and prepared to abide by the "crucial test" prescribed by the illustrious authors in the paragraph (228) of the Joint Report, in which the above objection is stated. That test is "whether they (all proposals) will or will not help to carry India towards responsible Government." Responsible Government, as we understand, means that an executive Government shall continue to exist so long as it carries out the will of the representatives, and through them of the electorate or the people at large. Now, our contention is that if our Legislative Council is not constituted on a Communal basis our Councils will be largely filled with members of only one community, or with their creatures. An executive, responsible to such a body, can never be said to be responsible to the electorate or the whole people. The will of the electorate is not carried out. It is the will of a particular community that prevails. In other words, the proposed constitution creates an Indian Oligarchy in the place of a British Bureaucracy. The reforms whose only result is such, cannot claim to introduce responsible Government. The object of the reforms is lost; an exactly contrary result will be produced.

26. The second objection raised in the Report (229) against communal representation is that it "perpetuates class division" and that if it is granted, the charge will be levelled against the British Government "of dividing men in order to govern them," and "of hypocrisy and short-sightedness." This objection also loses its force when Communal representation is to be granted for five communities. The first portion of the objection is also put forth by some Brahmins in Madras in different language, viz., that Communal representation stands in the way of "Indian Nationality." We all know, and we freely admit, that it is very desirable to have one nationality for our great land. Nationality, like patriotism, however, is a mere catch word. And, like the cant of Patriotism, the cant of Nationality is the worst of its kind. In that vast Indian Continent there is nothing like one nationality, or one people. In a country where there are several races of people, speaking innumerable languages and belonging to countless castes and professing conflicting religions, the ideal of nationality, however desirable, is not easily attainable. Where the Brahmin does not dine with a Non-Brahmin, nor in his own house if a Non-Brahmin is within sight, and where there are no inter-marriages between the one caste and the other, where it is pollution to touch a fifth of the population, there can be no question of a unity of race. So long as the present inequality based on the accident of birth continues in India, a common race and a single nationality seems an impossibility. By a system of Communal representation and by the gradual evolution of responsible Government we expect to create equality, which in its turn renders inter-marriage possible and feasible, and with it in fullness of time a common race and perhaps a nationality. If Communal representation be not granted the Non-Brahmins will continue to be where they are, or more likely will be driven further into the background; the Brahmins concentrating their power more and more and weakening the resources of the Non-Brahmins. It is the refusal of Communal representation, in my humble opinion, that tends to perpetuate class divisions. This answers the first part of the objection above referred to.

27. As regards the apprehensions entertained regarding the charge of dividing men in order to govern them, and of being hypocritical or short-sighted, the answer is equally plain. It is, perhaps, best answered by, what I may be permitted to call, a process of inversion. Suppose the Non-Brahmins turn round and say "The Government are against Communal representation because they see that that way lies the possibility of a United India. They saw that prior to the Minto-Morley scheme of reforms the Hindu and Mohammedan were at arm's length, that the rival organisations bitterly disliked each other, that the Congress was anathema to the League, and there was no fusion possible between the two. Every election added its own bitterness, and the rivalry between the two communities was perpetually kept up. Lord Morley, by a political blunder, gave the Mohammedans Communal representation through Communal electorates and made a steady rapprochement possible between the two parties, so that to-day, with their interests severally safeguarded, with no danger of the one community swamping the other in any election, they are one in their politics, one in their objects and aims. Their deputies meet together and draw up schemes which are binding on both communities, and it is no longer possible to treat them as mutually antagonistic classes. With this object lesson before them, the Government do not wish to bring a rapprochement between the Brahmin and the Non-Brahmin, and would rather keep them apart by refusing to them Communal representation by Communal electorates. If they are so kept, every election will see the spectacle of the candidates appealing to the communal instincts and asking the elector to vote for him on the plea that he is a Brahmin or Non-Brahmin, and whether a candidate succeeds or fails, intense caste hatred will be fostered as against the rival caste. It will be easy, then, when the castes are so divided to govern them all." Supposing Non-Brahmins were to argue thus, what answer could be reasonably given to it. Will the Government be afraid of any such charge, even though it may come from 27 millions of people, while the charge referred to in the Joint Report could come only from 1½ millions. If, therefore, we are to consider charges that may be brought against the Government and the possible defences open to them, we would unhesitatingly say that their position would be more vulnerable when they decline to grant Communal representation to Non-Brahmins.

28. The third objection mentioned in the Report (para. 230) is that Communal representation will encourage communities "to settle down into a feeling of satisfied security," and that it will stereotype existing conditions without scope for emulation and improvement. The objection is stated in dealing with minorities. It was evidently not meant to apply to vast majorities. In any case this objection, like the first two, has lost its force when five communities are already granted separate representation by the Southborough Committee, and provision is made for it in the Bill. We would, however, prefer to meet it on the merits. Rivalry is possible only as between communities which have more or less the same advantages, and to ask the Non-Brahmin communities to compete with the highly organised, highly equipped and highly influential Brahmin community, is like asking a child to race with an adult. We need only quote the parallel of the industries of our country which, it is conceded, need protection at present, so that they may live, and thrive before they can be called upon to compete with foreign industries. The Non-Brahmin communities ought, therefore, to be first nurtured politically, and must acquire political influence before they can be expected to compete, otherwise it is not a healthy rivalry that will be the result, but the practical extinction in the political field of the communities concerned. Nor is there absence of scope for rivalry between different communities (with an aggregate population of nearly 28 millions) in the Communal system. The different sub-sects amongst the Non-Brahmins themselves which are more or less in the same stage of development will have ample opportunities for healthy competition, not to speak of the part that is likely to be played by individual ambition. There is thus no force in the third objection of the Joint Report.

29. Having met the objections mentioned in the Report, I may proceed to meet one or two other objections that were put forward in India. It is said that Communal representation may be claimed by a minority, with some show of reason, but that it is unthinkable that a majority and that a vast majority should demand it. The obvious answer to this kind of objection is that the Mohammedans in the Punjab and in Bengal had already been given Communal electorates, though they happen to be in the majority. In the Punjab even the number of Mohammedan voters is larger than that of the Hindus, especially so if Sikhs are excluded. But we wish to place it on a higher ground, and in doing so we may be permitted to revert to an argument already advanced, viz., that Communal representation is not an end in itself, but only a means to an end. That end is to secure by a special device, an adequate share to those who cannot by ordinary means receive their due share of representation. This, no doubt, frequently happens in the case of minorities, who, being liable to be swamped by majorities, require special protection. But why should there be any objection to extend the principle to majorities—even vast majorities—where, by the peculiar circumstances of the country, and the extraordinary conditions thereof, those majorities find themselves unable to successfully compete with a minority therein? After all, the object is to protect those who, for certain well-known reasons, cannot secure their due share of reprsentation. What difference does it make whether they are in a minority or in a majority?

30. The same objection is sometimes urged in other woeds. It is said that in the proposed electorates, the Non-Brahmins will be in a vast majority, and as such rthey are sure to secure the majority of seats. This argument is sufficiently met by the Government of India, when they said "Recent experience in Madras has shown how inadequately Non-Brahmins are likely to be represented in the Council, unless some special provision for them is made. Numbers count for little in India at present against social, educational, and especially religious superiority, which has behind it the sanction of centuries. We shall find it very hard to meet the charge that we are acquiescing in the establishment of an Oligarchy in Madras, unless something is done to secure to the Non-Brahmins a fair share in the Legislature." That the Brahmins in Southern India possess all the advantages of social, educational and religious superiority can never be disputed. That the Public Services and the Bar are almost entirely manned by the Brahmins has been shown in an earlier portion of this Memorandum. The voting qualification is based upon payment of land tax, or in other words, the voters will be mostly small peasant proprietors. That litigation is at its height in the Madras Presidency is notorious. These peasant proprietors cannot, therefore, easily get out of the clutches of the Vakils, of the Magistrate and Civil Judges, Subordinate Judges and District Munsiffs, 80 per cent. of whom are Brahmins. Even in the Revenue Department the Brahmin preponderance is supreme; out of 160 Deputy Collectors in the Presidency, 84 are Brahmins and only 34 are Non-Brahmins coming lower down to Tahsildars and Revenue Inspectors, the proportion is by no means appreciably reduced. At the bottom we have the village Curman and the village priest, without whose assistance a village ryot cannot get on even for a single day. It is a notorious fact that almost all the Brahmin officers take part in legislative elections, and naturally support the Brahmin candidates. It is impossible to get evidence of this undue official interference, if we go to Courts. The same reason which makes one yield to official wishes and pressure operates as a deterrent to give evidence against such officials. The average ryot is illiterate. He has his own weaknesses which constantly place him under obligations to officials. He does not know the value of the right to vote which you propose to confer upon him. He thinks that if a Revenue Officer should excuse or promise to save him a few rupees by not bringing a little encroachment or a little bit of unauthorised cultivation to the notice of the higher authorities, and by thus avoiding any penal assessment, it is a greater benefit to him than the election of one of his community, who, with identical interests, is expected to best represent him; for he knows not the importance of a Seat in the Legislative Council. I can assure the Committee that 75 per cent. of the voters in the new lists are of that type. I saw it asked in this Committee (Q.) that these peasants are substantial men. I beg respectfully to state that they are not. Under the Southborough Scheme a payment of Rs.20 gives a vote In the districts of Godavery, Krishna and Gunter, a man with two acres of land pays Rs.20. These districts contribute the largest number of votes. To my knowledge no two-acred man is a substantial peasant. In municipal areas, even poorer men are voters, for they have only to pay Rs.3 as a local rate. It is no use asking Non-Brahmin leaders to get themselves elected against such odds and resources which the Brahmins can command and bring into operation.

31. We are very often asked to educate these illiterate voters, and bring them into line, and make them understand the value of the vote. We are asked to concentrate our attention and energies in that direction. We shall do our best in the matter. It is the duty of every patriotic Non-Brahmin who loves his mother-land and his community to undertake the task. But past experience clearly shows that a very long time will be required to realise all the expectations in this matter. One hundred and fifty years of benign British rule has not been able to make the Non-Brahmins produce 15 per cent. of the graduates turned out by the University, with equal facilities and opportunities. While centuries of inherited aptitude for receiving education have enabled the Brahmin to progress daily under British administration, centuries of denial of education and social tyranny have created a state of stagnation and despondency among the Non-Brahmins, which is not easy for anyone to get over within the space of a generation. Meanwhile, the Brahmin Oligarchy, which will surely be created, if Communal representation is denied to the Non-Brahmins, will concentrate the power which the reform scheme will place in their hands, and long before the Non-Brahmins are educated and come to understand the value of their vote the Brahmins will increase the distance between themselves and the Non-Brahmins in the race for political power. That power the Brahmins naturally, and as proved by previous experience, will utilise for their benefit and aggrandisement of their own community, and begin to oppress and tyrannise over those below. The days of Mann may not return and Mann's code may not be re-enacted, but a stage is sure to be reached, it may be not long before the goal of ultimate self-government is attained, when the only way to equalise power and to secure equal justice may be something unthinkable.

32. If instead of making calculations upon the entire body of literate and illiterate voters we take into account only the English educated voters, we find from the table given on page 119 of the Southborough Report that there will be 10,396 voters literate in English. These really are the persons who are most interested in the elections in the near future. These are the politically-minded classes. These are the limited intelligentia. These will naturally bring into play all their resources at every election. The result of elections will surely depend upon the will and exertions of these 10,396 men. A closer examination of the same table will show that amongst these there are only 3,387 Non-Brahmins against 6,405 Brahmins, the remaining few being Indian Christians and Anglo-Indians. These numbers give the crucial test or index to show where the real power lies. For every intelligent Non-Brahmin voter who understands the value of his vote there are two Brahmins. These are the numbers that count. Mere illiterate voters and voters who do not know English we may have in lakhs. So long as the Brahmins preponderate amongst voters literate in English, the Non-Brahmins can have no chance of securing their due share in the Legislatures of the country. Our only hope lies in Communal representation through Communal electorates.

33. The argument that a separate electorate for Non-Brahmins would force the Brahmins into a separate electorate against their will has been sufficiently met by the Government of India's observation that "this argument may be discounted by the fact that in the eyes of many Hindus, this is what has already been done in the case of the Hindus." Under the Minto-Morley Reforms a separate electorate was given to the Moslems. In December, 1909, when Congress met in Lahore, in the Bradlaugh Hall, the following resolution was moved by no other than Mr. Surendranath Bannerji:—"That this Congress, while gratefully appreciating the earnest and arduous endeavours of Lord Morley and Lord Minto . . . deems it its duty to place on record its strong sense of disapproval of the creation of separate electorates on the basis of religion, &c. In particular, the regulations have caused widespread dissatisfaction throughout the country by reason of (a) the excessive and unfairly preponderant share of representation given to the followers of one particular religion; (b) the unjust, invidious and humiliating distinctions made between Moslem and Non-Moslem subjects of His Majesty in the matter of the electorates, the franchise and the qualifications of candidates." This was reiterated in more or less similar language in the Congress of each year till 1914. Yet the separate electorate for the Moslems continued. The plea that the Hindus were forced into a separate electorate did not count then. Why should it count now?

34. There is a strong argument which naturally suggests itself to us in this connection. It is noticed that the Brahmins in the Madras Presidency constitute a very small minority, not being more than 3 per cent. of the total population, the Non-Brahmins forming nearly 80 per cent. It is also seen from the statement given on page 119 of the Southborough Report, that the total number of Brahmin voters comes to only 39,865, against 206,760 Non-Brahmin voters. In the Southborough scheme each district is allotted one or more seats. Now, the figures for each district are also given at page 119. If we examine the figures for each district closely, and compare the figures in column 16 with those in column 20, it will be found that in every district, except South Canara, the Non-Brahmin majority of voters is overwhelmingly large. If the theory that because Non-Brahmin voters are in vast majority therefore the Non-Brahmins are sure to secure most of the seats be correct, then the Brahmins can secure only one seat, that provided for South Canara (please see page 25 of the Southborough Report), out of the 61 seats allotted for the so-called general electorates, and all the rest, that is, 60 seats, must go to the Non-Brahmins. Now, are we to understand that the Brahmins will be satisfied with a single seat out of 61 seats. Why, then, do they not ask for Communal Representation on the ground of their being in a small minority, when almost every other community is asking for it at this juncture? Where in history do we find a small minority not merely satisfied with, but actually enthusiastic about merging itself in a very large electorate, and content to take the off chance of securing one, and only one, seat out of 61? Can it be that it wants to efface itself in the interests of nation building, or is it that it is content to be represented by candidates from other communities? To those who would like to answer these questions in the affirmative our reply is that the days of millenium are not yet come. The true reason is merely this. The Brahmins are opposed to Communal representation, because they feel certain that with the influences at present at their command they can capture more seats than they can hope to get through Communal representation. They know that they can conveniently put their finger in other people's pie. It is in these baneful influences in the Brahminical power to fetter the discretion of the general voter that the disability of the Non-Brahmin candidate consists. Even in the existing electorates, in which 9 seats out of 10 were secured by the Brahmins, the Non-Brahmin votes preponderate in the proportion of two to one.

35. We find that a point seems to have been made on the alleged ground of the Non-Brahmin movement being new. The allegation, however, is not true. The relations between Brahmins and Non-Brahmins have never been cordial. Apart from the racial antagonism between the two, the great predominance of the Brahmins in the public services had long ago excited the jealousy of Non-Brahmins, and complaints were made on their behalf to the authorities on the spot. It has always been smouldering and never dead. Of course, owing to the lack of organisation amongst the Non-Brahmins and the Press and the platform being entirely in the hands of the Brahmins, the disabilities and the grievances of the former could not find adequate expression. But the authorities on the spot knew it. There is a standing order of the Board of Revenue of Madras (B.S.O., No. 128, Cl. 2) which laid down that in making appointments in the subordinate services care should be taken that all communities are fairly represented. This rule was more honoured in the breach than in the observance, owing to the influence wielded by the Brahmins in the headquarters of each district and in the Metropolis. But the fact remains that nearly twenty-five years ago it was noticed that Brahmins preponderated in the public services, and that something should be done to check it.

36. We are really surprised to find that Mr. Surendranath Bannerjie has deposed before you that the Non-Brahmin movement dated only from the discussion about the Montague-Chelmsford Report. The facts mentioned above will prove the contrary. But the wonder is that Mr. Bannerjie could not have known it. The South Indian Liberal Federation itself was started in 1916. Mr. P. Theagaroyachetty's manifesto was issued in November, 1916. Our daily newspaper Justice first came out in February, 1917. Mr. Bannerjie, as the editor of the Bengalee must have been receiving Justice in exchange for the Bengalee. From the very first Leader in the Justice of the 27th February, 1917, he could have seen that our grievances were many, and long remained unredressed. The Montague-Chelmsford Report was published in India only on the 7th of July, 1918. How, then, can it be said that we came into existence with the Joint Report. Again there were numerous Non-Brahmin Conferences held in different places in the Provinces, long before Mr. Montague arrived in India. The well-known Coimbatore Non-Brahmin Conference was held on the very day on which the famous declaration of August 20th was made by him. It is absolutely incorrect to say that we came into existence with the Joint Report, whereas it was his Liberal League (whose witness he was) that came into existence with the Joint Report, until the publication of which Mr. Surendranath was known to hold the Congress League Scheme as his irreducible minimum. Again the Public Service Commission, on which Lord Islington presided, took evidence in Madras in the year 1913, and though the evidence was confined to the services, sufficient material was placed before the Committee, which clearly brought out the "Non-Brahmin trouble," and proved its existence by that time. I need only refer to the evidence of Rao Bahadur P. Theagaroyachetty, Rao Sahib (now Rao Bahadur), T. Balaji Rao Naidu, Mr. Kumaraswami Tampoe, I.C.S., and Dewan Bahadur L. D. Swamikannu Pillai, for some time Home Secretary to the Government of Madras. The last two gentlemen are Indian Christians by birth and faith, and Mr. Tampoe is a native of Ceylon. Their evidence is unquestionably disinterested and impartial. I do not propose to quote it here. It is found printed in Vol. II., Appendix to the Report of the Royal Commission on the public services of India. It is impossible to understand why Mr. Bannerjie thought that the Non-Brahmin trouble in Madras dated from the Montague-Chelmsford Report. The quotation from Mr. Svinivasa Sartri's publication also proves our contention. (At the end of Para. 19 supra.)

37. But assuming for a moment, without in the least admitting it, that the Non-Brahmin trouble dated since the Joint Report, we fail to see why it should be belittled on that account. The domination of a majority by a minority has long been there. Several acts of the Brahmins will be found mentioned lower down—acts which are calculated to place the Non Brahmins at a disadvantage, and to advance the position of the Brahmins. Their own overwhelming preponderance in the public services and in the Councils of the country is injurious enough in the existing state of things. But till now, as has been pointed out elsewhere, the Brahmins are only in a sphere of influence. Under the Reform Scheme, however, power —actual power—will be given to Indians, and if this power also is captured by Brahmins (as they are sure to do if Communal representation is not given) as they managed to secure all the influence hitherto, where will the Non-Brahmins be, and what will be their fate? The Brahmins will become ministers with great powers. The councils will have vast powers in the Reform Scheme. Apart from the control of the administration of transferred subjects, the Brahmin minister and his Brahmin Legislative Councillors will have the great power of raising taxation. It is a notorious fact that Brahmins do not pay any appreciable amount of taxes. The admission of a Brahmin member of the Imperial Legislative Council has been quoted in a previous paragraph of the evidence. These therefore, need not hesitate to increase taxes in any direction. Now it is the grant of powers such as these that created an impression in the minds of the Non-Brahmins that if this power is wielded by Brahmins (as past experience has shown when they were wielding only influence) bad days are in store for Non-Brahmins. Is it wrong then to wake up not merely to defend oneself against possible and probable dangers, but to a sense of one's own rights even? Up till now the the European element is in the majority in the Legislative Councils. The non-official Indian members were only in the position of mere advisers. They could indulge in, as it is admitted they did, "the habits of irresponsible criticism, which have been the bane of the Minto-Morley Councils." Their resolutions were not binding on the Government. It was very rarely that resolutions were ever allowed to pass. The en bloc vote of the official very often backed up by the nominated non-officials, was there. No serious harm, even if they attempted, could have been done by the elected Brahmin Legislative Councillors. They did attempt on several occasions, but their attempts were easily foiled. The European members, including the bureaucracy, whatever be their faults, and they had many, could hold the scales evenly between Indian and Indian. It will be ungrateful on the part of the masses of India if they do not acknowledge the protection which they have received from the British Civil Service in India. "The country people," to quote again from the Joint Report, "have, and always have had, confidence in the British official, because of his integrity, fair play and detachment." We deny that the Brahmins in Madras have any of these qualities. Past experience proves the truth of my statement. Now under the new scheme this British element will be wanting there. They will be in a microscopic minority. The power hitherto held by them will be transferred to the Brahmins, who will naturally use it to their own advantage, and to the detriment of the Non-Brahmins. No wonder that the Non-Brahmin leaders should wake up, organise themselves as well as they could with the limited resources at their command, and make genuine attempts to protect their own interests and those of whom they are the natural and accredited leaders. Again the slight increase in wealth and intelligence among the great Non-Brahmin communities, the assembling of Communal conferences, the natural, though imperceptible, combination of these various communities against the monopoly of power and influence of a particular caste, the spread of Democracy, the unfolding of new ideas and hopes, all these and many more causes of a like nature, while forming the fundamental motives and objects of social and political growth in our Province, have at once made the Non-Brahmin leaders try to rise equal to the occasion. The social and political conditions of to-day resulting from changes of years of benign British rule and chastened by the all-embracing influence of the recent world-war, have made thoughtful Non-Brahmin leaders ponder over the situation and brought them to the conclusion that Communal representation alone can save their community from stagnation, neglect, political depression, excessive inequality and domination by a minority. No wonder that Non-Brahmin leaders had to cast off their sloth and be up and doing. It is no reproach to them. It would have been criminal on their part if they did not awake and do their duty by themselves, and by the great masses to which they belong by birth, association and existence. What does it matter, then, that our movement as at present organised is new ?

38. I see an attempt made by some of the witnesses before this Committee to belittle the magnitude of the power and influence of the Brahmins and the consequences thereof. Elsewhere it is even asked, " How have the interests of the Non-Brahmins been injured by the Brahmin representatives in the councils in the past to claim and desire Communal representation for themselves." In the first place, the question really does not arise. For it that were the criterion on which popular representation is to be based, the Government cannot find any reason for granting more of popular representation except on the hypothesis that their representatives have injured directly or indirectly the interests of the people of India. I shall illustrate my meaning by a counter-question. Suppose the British officials in India repeat the question, substituting themselves for the Brahmins, and ask my countrymen, " Who gave you peace and order, who guaranteed the safety of your person and security of your property, who constructed your anicuts and gave you the canals and irrigation systems which account and account so much for your present prosperity. Who gave you the telegraph, the post and the railway ? We, the Britishers, never injured your interests ; we are the best representatives of Indians in the councils of the country. Why do you Indians demand elected majorities of yourselves therein." Now, I ask, would any Indian approve of such arguments He is immediately reminded of what one of your great Prime Ministers, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, once said, and would reply by saying " Good government is no substitute for Self-government, and no European can represent the Indians in the Councils." May we not in our turn repeat the argument that if good government by the British is no substitute for self government by Indians, any good government by the Brahmins is no substitute for self government by Non-Brahmins. How can the substitution of Brahmin rule for the British rule be welcomed by classes who received so many benefits from the latter ? Again, when separate representation was given to the Mohammedans in 1909, and when it was proposed to be given to the Sikhs, Indian Christians, Anglo-Indians and Europeans, it is not because the existing Hindu representatives in the Councils did in any way injure the interests of those five communities, but because ordinary fair play and justice demand that all communities shall have a fair and reasonable share in the councils of their country. So far I have assumed that the Brahmin representatives in the existing councils conducted themselves in a most impartial manner, never attempting to advance the cause of their own communities, but always with an eye towards the national advancement. That is by no means a fact. Apart from the fact of many of their relatives being given decent appointments and promotion to the detriment of Non-Brahmins seeking service and already in service, there are numerous instances in which they tried to benefit their community to the disadvantage of the Non-Brahmins. The resolution moved in 1911 by the Honble. Mr. L. A. Govindaraghava Iyer in the Madras Legislative Council, regarding the recruitment to public services by open competition, the same resolution moved by the Honble. Mr. Ramachandra Rau Pantulu in 1912, the resolution regarding the recruitment of sub-magistrates from the Bar, which is almost exclusively monopolised by the Brahmins, moved by the Honble. Mr. B. V. Narasinha-Iyer; the resolution regarding the amendment of the Civil Courts Act, so as to transfer to the High Court (where three out of the four Indian Judges were Brahmins, the fourth being a Mohammedan) the power of appointing sub-judges and small cause Court judges, from the Government, moved by the Honble. Mr. T. Rangachariar; and the resolution, notice of which was given by the Honble. Mr. V. K. Ramanujachari regarding the deletion of the Board Standing Order No. 128 cl. 2, which provided for the representation of all communities in the appointments within the power of that Board and of their subordinate officers, are only a few of the instances which I could bring to your notice. All the above five gentlemen are Brahmins. When the newspaper Justice was started by the Non-Brahmins, a story was invented and freely circulated that the Madras Government subsidised the paper, and was purchasing hundreds of copies. Five Brahmin Members of the Legislative Councils simultaneously gave notice of interpellations regarding the newspapers subsidised by the Madras Government. Notice was also given by another Brahmin member of a resolution demanding the Government to publish a list of the journals subsidised by them. It was found after all that not only did the Madras Government not subsidise anything to the paper Justice, but as a matter of fact subscribed to a fewer number of copies than The Hindu of the Brahmins. The late Dr. Nair, in whom our community lost its ablest leader, had to publish an editorial, in which he not only contemptuously denied the charges, but pointed out how such false stories were invented and circulated by the Brahmins, and also how the Madras Government did not give facilities which they were affording to other newspapers. To come back to the instances we were pointing out, there were several resolutions moved by a Brahmin representative of Madras Presidency in the Imperial Legislative Council regarding the report of the Public Service Commission. The Madras Government took up and has been maintaining at public cost a Brahmin widows' home in Madras, to which none but Brahmins are admitted. Not a little finger was raised, not a voice whispered at this special treatment, but when a grant was made to the proposed Rajkumar College, a great noise was raised. A Brahmin Member moved, and the Government of Madras accepted, a resolution to appoint more Indians as District Board Engineers, with the result that within the space of a few years 18 Indian engineers were appointed, of whom 15 are Brahmins and only three are Non-Brahmins. This result is complacently accepted with supreme satisfaction, and not a voice was raised protesting against the inequality and injustice involved. The injury to non-Brahmins can be due to acts of both omission and commission. The Brahmins could not do much injury to us as members of the existing Legislative Councils, for they have only influence but no power, and they are in the minority as against officials. At present they could not harm us much, though I am certain they would have done if they could. Government recently appointed four non-official Indians as Presidents of District Boards, three out of whom are Brahmins. Within the jurisdiction of one of the Brahmin presidents there is a big choultry founded by ancient non-Brahmin Zamindars, at which pilgrims are freely fed. A rule was passed that in this choultry ghee (clarified butter) and buttermilk should be served only to Brahmins and not to the Non-Brahmin visitors. A complaint was made to the Brahmin president, and he decided that buttermilk may be given to Non-Brahmins, but not ghee. Now, when Brahmin contempt towards Non-Brahmins could go so far as that, further comment seems to be superfluous. The immense funds of the Timpati Temple were diverted to a Sanskrit College, where a dead language is to be taught for the benefit of the Brahmins. Several temples and charitable institutions, too numerous to be mentioned, were founded by Non-Brahmins, and are now under the management and trusteeship of the Brahmins. The Pachaiappas College in Madras was founded with the funds devised by a non-Brahmin gentleman, has till recently been almost exclusively under the trusteeship of Brahmins, and to this day Panchamas are not admitted into the college. The most notorious recent incident is, perhaps, what is known as the Kallada-Kurichi affair. In that place there is a charitable institution founded by a Non-Brahmin intended to feed the poor. It was being managed by the Taluq Board (corresponding, perhaps, to a County Council within whose jurisdiction the village lies. Quite recently a Brahmin I.C.S. officer happened to be the Revenue Divisional Officer, and ex-officio he was also the president of the Taluq Board A resolution was proposed and carried in the Taluq Board, resolving that the funds of the c aritable institution should be diverted to convert a local Sanskrit school into a big Sanskrit college open only to Brahmins. As the president happened to be a Brahmin and also the Revenue Divisional Officer, no Non-Brahmin member of the Board dared to raise a voice against it. But outside a huge cry was raised, and the matter had to be taken up by the South Indian Liberal Federation. Meanwhile the Brahmin president was transferred and a European I.C.S. appointed in his place, and the Taluq Board promptly cancelled its own resolution. The difference between the position when a Brahmin presided and that when a European presided can easily be seen by this one single instance. It is unnecessary to give more instances. The above ought to suffice to convince you that the Brahmins are not so good and altruistic as they might have been represented to be, and show how they can injure the Non-Brahmins by acts of commission and omission from their place in the Legislative Council and in the public services. All this, be it remembered, under a benign British Government, in which the Brahmins can claim only an indirect influence and wield no power. What it will be when actual power is conceded to them is a thing which can easily be imagined and estimated by the Committee. So far as the non-Brahmins are concerned, and we can speak with authority for them, they feel that danger is ahead; that tyranny and oppression will be the only result if Communal Representation is not granted to them.

39. Having met the objections raised against communal representation, I shall now proceed to submit what kind of electorates we need. The Government of India in their fifth Report recommend the reservation for Non-Brahmins of thirty seats out of sixty-one, in non-Mohammedan constituencies, though it is not clear whether these thirty members are to be returned by Non-Brahmins alone or by Brahmins and Non-Brahmins together. A plural constituency is recommended in the amended resolution of the All-India Conference of the Moderate Party, held at Bombay in November, 1918. At this Conference only one Non-Brahmin from the Province of Madras was present. This, in our humble opinion, is a half-measure, and, like all half-measures, it is unsatisfactory. The only reason assigned by the Government of India for this kind of system is the undesirability of forcing a separate electorate on the Brahmins against their will. In the same paragraph in which this reason is found is also given how it is discounted. It is observed that "this argument may be discounted by the fact that in the eyes of many Hindus this is what has already been done in the case of the Hindus." When separate electorates were granted to Mohammedans in 1909, separate electorates were forced upon the Hindus. We have already pointed out by referring to various resolutions of the Congress that it was against the will of the Hindus, and even against their vehement protests (please vide para. 33 supra.). Now we fail to see why such a thing could not be done to protect majorities when it was done to protect minorities. It is another matter when any protection is refused to majorities on the ground that majorities should protect themselves. But when once it is conceded that these majorities require protection and provision is actually made to reserve some seats to them, it is impossible to understand the refusal to grant separate electorates on the solitary ground stated.

40. This reservation of some seats to Non-Brahmins in plural constituencies cannot at all be regarded as granting Communal representation. It may be anything, but it is not Communal representation. To be called a representative of a particular community, and yet to be elected not merely by that community, but also by another community, is a position which has neither logic nor reason to support it: it is an insult to the candidate as well to the voter. We can understand the singular constitution which is to be conferred on us, we can understand the "hybrid executives" which we shall have hereafter, but it is impossible to understand this "hybrid" constituency in which a particular community will be asked to vote for a member of another community, not as a representative of themselves, but as a representative of others. For when once a candidate is recognised as a representative of a particular party, it is unreasonable to ask others who do not belong to the party to vote for that candidate. In the proposed plural constituencies a Brahmin voter knows beforehand that all the candidates for a particular Seat are Non-Brahmins intended to represent Non-Brahmins and not to represent Brahmins, and yet he is required to go to the booth and vote for one who professedly does not represent him or his community. Suppose we take a concrete example. The Europeans in Madras Province are given a seat in the proposed constitution. How would they like the idea of a European of Madras being elected by a plural constituency of Hindus and Europeans? The fact that in that case the Hindus, being in a vast majority, would return a European, who is not liked by the majority of Europeans, does not reduce the anomaly I am trying to point out. In such a case Mr. Avondale or Mrs. Besant will be elected (assuming also that Woman Suffrage is granted) to represent the European Community in Madras. How would the European Community in Madras like such an election?

41. Let us leave alone these theoretical objections for which, perhaps, there is no place in the novel constitution that we are going to have. Let me point out the practical difficulties in the working of these so-called plural constituencies. It is a device invented by the genius of Brahmins to avoid the real representatives of the people, the people that form the backbone of the country from being returned to the Legislative Council. You could see the origin of it in the resolutions of the All-India Conference of Moderates, held at Bombay in November, 1918. That was their first Conference. They had no existence as such until that date. That movement was organised by two Brahmin gentlemen, both members of the Imperial Legislative Council and afterwards members of the Southborough Franchise Committee. How their appointment on the said Committee has been received by the Non-Brahmins, and how they found themselves unable to give evidence before that Committee, has been submitted in another place (please see para.). The Committee heard only the evidence of our opponents and had the advice of the Brahmin members thereon. The Committee, while making mention of plural member constituencies, did not actually recommend them because " such evidence as we were able to obtain went to show that whilst such a proposal might be accepted by the Brahmins, if it were the price of an enduring peace and might, if the number of seats were substantial, be accepted by one section of the Non Brahmins, the leaders of the other section were prepared neither to submit to such a solution nor to accept it as a settlement of the controversy." The " other section," referred to is ourselves, who have unquestionably the largest following, the " one section " being the Non-Brahmins of the Madras Presidency Association. That Association was started on September 20, 1917, by Brahmins, a month after the famous declaration and nearly a year after ours was formed, in order to create a split amongst the great Non-Brahmin communities. How it was working under Brahmanic influence has already been pointed out (please see para. 19). The followers of that Association are known as Pro-Brahmin, Non-Brahmin, and are few in number.

42. Now, the object of the Brahmin leaders in consenting to the reservation of seats for Non-Brahmins in plural constituencies, in which they (Brahmins) themselves will also be voters, is to see that the real leaders of the Non-Brahmins are not returned to the Councils, but that the nominees of the Brahmins, like the members of the Presidency Association, are returned.

43. The Brahmins can enter into a compact with the Pro Brahmin Non-Brahmins and thus arrange that the former are returned to the non-reserved seats and the latter to the reserved seats. I shall illustrate my meaning by a concrete example. It is pointed out in the Southborough Report that the proportion of the Brahmin votes to the Non-Brahmin will be 1 to 4. Suppose we take a constituency with 5,000 voters ; 1,000 voters of it will be Brahmins and 4,000 Non-Brahmins. The Brahmin candidate can say to the Pro-Brahmin Non-Brahmin candidate "There will be 1,000 Brahmin votes. We shall give all our votes to you ; you secure 1,600 votes out of the 4,000 Non-Brahmin votes. You will then get a total of 2,600 and your rival will get only 2,400, and you are sure to succeed." We have to take account of not only the 1,000 Brahmin votes, but of the Brahmin influence over the Non-Brahmin votes, explained in an earlier part of this Memorandum So a Pro Brahmin Non-Brahmin, with only 1,600 Non-Brahmin votes, will defeat a true non-Brahmin with 2,400. This is so far as the reserved seat is concerned.

The process can be repeated in the election for the unreserved seat. Here a Brahmin stands against a true Non-Brahmin, and with his own 1,000 together with the 1,600 of his friend and nominee, whom he was helping, will easily defeat the real representative of the Non-Brahmin, though the latter may have 2,400 votes. It is not our wish that these Pro-Brahmin Non-Brahmins should not be returned We quite welcome them to the new Councils. But we do not want them to come in as Brahmin nominees. We do not want them to be under electioneering obligations to Brahmins, obligations which are inconsistent with those which they owe to their own community whose representatives they are.

44. The Pro-Brahmin Member elected under the above circumstances will have a great many conscientious difficulties in his own turn. Suppose a question like the "Kalladikurichi affair," referred to in a previous paragraph, arises. Suppose a question arises in which a charitable fund, hitherto utilised for all people, is proposed to be diverted to a Sanskrit College about to be started and intended for the sole benefit of Brahmins. Dare this member vote against the proposal, having been elected with the help of Brahmins ? If he does not, will he not be voting against the wishes of his own community ? Take again a case like the one now agitating the public mind, and which is likely to be before the Legislative Council ere long, for a Bill is under contemplation. It is the case of abolishing the hereditary right to the village Karnam's office. At present the Karnams hold office by hereditary right. The Government have now proposed to abolish this hereditary right. The proposal has large Non-Brahmin support. Will the future Pro-Brahmin member of the Legislative Council above referred to venture to vote for the proposal if he cares to be elected a second time ? If not, will he not be voting against the wishes of those whom he is supposed to represent ? Is not such a representation unreal ?

Question regarding Agraharams, mostly owned by Brahmins, in which troubles concerning the permanent rights of occupancy in the tenants (Non-Brahmins) are just now the subject matter of litigation to a large extent, and are sure to come up before the future Legislative Councils. Is the Pro-Brahmin Member to vote for the Agraharamdar, with whose help he was returned or is he to vote for the tenants, whose representative he is supposed to be. And then there are the religious endowments founded by Non-Brahmins and now solely managed by Brahmins. There are so many other questions. It is unncessary to multiply instances.

45. The next objection to this system is that a citizen when he is a voter in a constituency certainly has influence to a degree which he cannot have if he is not a voter in that particular constituency. In other words, Brahmins as voters in a constituency will have an influence over the other voters in the same constituency which they cannot so easily and freely exercise if they are not voters in it. It will afford them greater opportunities for unwholesome interference. It is unnecessary to labour the point further. If once it is conceded that Non-Brahmins deserve and require protection from the Brahmins, the only logical and workable scheme is that of separate electorates for them.

46. In the Bill the expression " general electorates " is used for the electorates in which Brahmins, non-Brahmins and Panchamas will take part ; in other words, it is a Hindu electorate. When each of the separate electorates given to the Mussulmans, Europeans, Anglo-Indians and Indian Christians is called a Communal electorate, why the Hindu electorate alone is called a general electorate is not clear. I take exception to this expression because an argument is based on it. It was urged in India, it was urged in Madras in the informal Franchise Conference presided over by Lord Pentland in December last that if all the electorates are communal, our constitution would contain no general electorate at all. The obvious answer to that is that this so-called general electorate is no less a Communal constituency than the one given to Mussulmans or Indian Christians. If one more community—viz., Brahmins - be separated from this, the remaining electorate can as well be called a general electorate. If numbers is a test of a general electorate, the reduction of $1\frac{1}{4}$ millions more out of 37 millions does not make much difference when already $4\frac{1}{4}$ millions have been taken away from the main body of 41 millions. If there is any point in having as large a number as possible, then please separate the Brahmin $1\frac{1}{4}$ millions from us, and include the equal number of Indian Christians, to whom the three seats already promised may be guaranteed by reservation in our general constituency. There is greater affinity between Non-Brahmins and Indian Christians, who are mostly Non-Brahmin and Panchama converts to Christianity. One can count the Brahmin converts and their descendants on one's fingers. In the southern portion, the customs, manners and method of living of Indian Christians do not at all differ from those of our community.

47. The Brahmins are to be grouped with the Non-Brahmins because the Franchise Committee does not wish to force a separate electorate on Brahmins (1¼ millions) against their will. This "will" of Brahmins sounds like "self-determination." What about the will of the Non-Brahmins (27 millions)? Let alone that. What is this "will" of the Brahmins? Is it that they wish to take part in electing Non-Brahmins, or is it only that they (Brahmins) wish to get themselves elected by a general constituency composed of Brahmins and Non-Brahmins and Panchamas, to call themselves, it may be, the representatives of a large body. If it is the latter there can be no objection. By all means give a certain number of seats to Brahmins, taking into account their population, their education, and their political mindedness. Let the Non Brahmins, Brahmins and Panchamas be voters in that constituency and vote for them. But if they mean the former, it is exactly what we oppose, exactly what has been described as "putting one's fingers into other people's pie." One can certainly claim to be elected in a particular way. But no one can have the right to prescribe the method of electing others, especially by interposing himself into the bargain.

48. This leads me naturally to submit what number of seats should be given to the Brahmins. They form only 3 per cent. of the population. On that score they cannot expect more than three seats. The population of the Indian Christians is almost the same as that of the Brahmins, and the Southborough Committee gave the former only three seats. On that score also the Brahmins deserve only three seats. The Mohammedans, who are nearly double the number of Brahmins, are given 13 seats. If that were the basis, the Brahmins may claim half that number. That is six or seven seats. The Madras Government thought that ten seats should be allowed to Brahmins. Now, taking the largest number yet mentioned or capable of being mentioned, the Non-Brahmins will be perfectly willing to set apart 12 seats for the Brahmins "as the price of an enduring peace," for that peace is as much desired by the Non-Brahmins as by the Brahmins. Twelve seats out of 61 bear the proportion of one to four, which is the same as the number of Brahmin voters bears to the number of Non-Brahmin voters. I have to add that, in addition, the University seat will be theirs very often. Past experience has shown that at least two of the Zamindari seats will always be theirs. In other words, 14 or 15 seats out of 61 will be Brahmin seats. Shall that not satisfy the Brahmins when their population justifies only three seats? If it does not, there must be something behind their professions. Our humble suggestion is that a separate constituency may be formed having 12 seats for Brahmins only. The remaining seats may be given to the Non-Brahmin constituency, in which the Panchamas will be included. That will be for 34 millions. It may be called the general electorate if so desired. If the Brahmins still insist upon a general electorate let their 12 members be elected by any constituency consisting, if they want, of Brahmins, Non-Brahmins and Panchamas, and perhaps, Indian Christians, etc.

49. I have read it reported that some witnesses before this Committee wanted to belittle the Brahmin-Non-Brahmin trouble. It is said that the two communities are making up past differences, that politics are transcending caste. Travesty of truth cannot go further. We humbly assert that the trouble is increasing every day. The Franchise Committee itself admitted that it was "raised in a very acute form" (para. 20). The Madras Government speaks of "a general feeling of apprehension" by Non-Brahmins "widely and strongly felt" at present. The India Government speaks of the "bitter feelings which have been roused by this controversy in Madras," and says that the reform scheme itself will be "heavily handicapped," and the contentment in the province disturbed, if the question is not satisfactorily solved. Sir Sankaran Nair, in his dissenting minute, while supporting our claim for communal representation, made some remarks which cannot be left unchallenged in this connection. To us Non-Brahmins it is impossible to understand the position taken by him. But, perhaps, the explanation lies in the fact that having moved so long in the Congress groove it became impossible for him to get out of that groove. He has not been in Madras during the last four years, during which our movement received a great impetus. His statement that "Mrs. Besant in particular brought over the whole of her Brahmin party to discard the Brahmin restrictions which stood in the way of the hearty co-operation of the Non-Brahmins" is most inaccurate. It is true she has a Brahmin party. In fact, 99 per cent. of her Indian followers are Brahmins. It is also true that there are Brahmin restrictions which stood in the way of any hearty co-operation with Non-Brahmins. But it is absolutely incorrect that Brahmins have discarded them, and that Mrs. Besant has ever attempted to get them discarded. On the other hand, she always flattered the Brahmins, and believed that everything connected with them was sacred, found a scientific explanation for every custom and habit of the Brahmins, and told them that they should adhere to their time-honoured customs and restrictions. Whatever was ancient in India was justified by her, and she tickled the pride of the Brahmins by telling them that they are far superior to the rest of mankind. In fact, she threw her whole weight of support in upholding the tyranny of the lower classes by the Brahmins. To say that she brought the whole of her Brahmin party to discard restrictions is anything but a fact.

50. I shall now try to summarise what I have said. I have shown:—

(1) How 9 out of 10 seats allotted to general electorates were captured by Brahmins in the Madras Legislative Council.

(2) How all the 3 seats in the Imperial Legislative Council have been taken by Brahmins.

(3) How in the Public Services of the country Brahmins preponderate.

(4) How a small minority is dominating over a large majority.

(5) How all Non-Brahmins (the majority Party) want Communal electorates.

(6) How even the Non-Brahmins of the Madras Presidency Association (the minority Party) want Communal representation.

(7) How almost all the Brahmin organisations conceded the need for Communal representation.

(8) How the All-India Conference of Moderates at Bombay agreed to give Communal representation.

(9) How the Government of Madras has shown that Communal electorates are necessary.

(10) How the Indian Government would concede Communal representation and how whatever comes from that source favourable to the Non-Brahmins should be given special weight.

(11) How there is no force in the objections raised in the Joint Report against Communal representation.

(12) How the other objections—such as Non-Brahmins being in the majority in population and amongst the voters—raised elsewhere, do not stand the test of criticism, and how numbers do not count.

(13) How the future Councils rise from the sphere of influence to that of power in the new reforms scheme, and how if that power is not distributed, it will work danger.

(14) How reservation of seats in plural constituencies is wrong in theory, and how it is fraught with practical difficulties and how it does not serve any useful purpose, and why Brahmins want this "hybrid system."

(15) How such a constituency itself first came to be proposed.

(16) And how Communal electorates are the only means of saving Non-Brahmins and of preventing the creation of a Brahmin Oligarchy.

51. No one can foretell with certainty what the consequences will be if the reforms are introduced without Communal representation to the Non-Brahmins. But so far as these communities are concerned they believe that evil days are in store for them. They apprehend that the majority of the seats will be captured by Brahmins and the rest by their nominees, and that the Public Services will likewise be monopolised by the same; that the Brahmins will rise in power and concentrate it before the voters can learn to understand the value of their vote: that that power will be utilised for the aggrandisement of the Brahmins and to the detriment of the Non-Brahmins; that a Brahmin Oligarchy will be substituted for a British Bureaucracy; that the dial of progress will be set back; that justice, on which the British power in India has been founded, will be cast to the winds; that nepotism and jobbery will be the order of the day; that responsible Government in Madras will be a failure, and that the Brahmin Oligarchy will never be responsible to the masses and the middle classes, the poor and the proletariat; that stagnation, neglect, political depression, exeessive inequality and domination of the majorities by a minority will be their fate; that though the code of Marm may not be re-enacted, oppression and tyranny will follow, and that the consequent results are unthinkable; that instead of India rising in the scale of Nations, there will be such a crash that no one can say where its shattered pieces may fall. We may be right or wrong in our apprehensions; but Great Britain, holding India in trust is bound to take note of them.

52. The Zamindar of Telaprole, presiding over the Non-Brahmin Conference, at Tinnvelly, in December, 1917, has thus summarised our future position:—"We Non-Brahmins are to remain and multiply in order that the chosen few may have subjects to rule and the British are to remain to keep off external danger by their Military and Naval Forces, and to suppress us if we should dare to oppose the orders of a Brahmin Oligarchy. Great Britain has the right to demand from us obedience and if necessary to secure it by force, provided she rules well and is willing to give us a share in ruling as we become fitter and fitter to bear the responsibilities. But I say emphatically that Great Britain has no right to say 'I will put over you an Oligarchy in which you have no share, which you distrust, which is socially contemptuous of you. I will let that Oligarchy shape its policy as it pleases, and if you dare to dispute its authority, then I, even if I disapprove of its policy, will use the British Army to enforce non-British policy.' We are not cattle to be sold by one master to another, with the further humiliation of the first master standing by with a bludgeon in case we object to be sold."

53. One of the speakers, moving the resolution on Communal representation at the Non-Brahmin Confederation, which met in December, 1917, said: "It is the surest way of converting the Brahmins into the Magyars of Madras. Domination of the majority by a minority, oppression and tyranny will be the only consequence, and the seeds of revolution and civil war will have been sown. God forbid that there shall be any revolution in this peaceful land of ours; God forbid that there shall be any civil war in this peace-loving country; but, Sir, if there should be any such contingency and blood has to be shed, at whatever distant date it may be, such blood will be on the heads of those that oppose this resolution of Communal Representation at this critical period of our history."

54. Lord Curzon, while committing this Bill to the Joint Committee on June 30th, 1919, appealed to this Committee 'That nothing could be done to weaken or diminish the protection that is given to the poorer classes in India, and they are the vast multitude of the population of the British Raj" and that the poor should be given "freedom from opposition" by the upper classes. Our prayer is also the same. That our apprehensions are genuine and honestly entertained was admitted by the Brahmin representatives at the informal Franchise Conference, held in December last at Madras, presided over by Lord Pentland, who could speak to the truth of this statement. It can also be gauged from the language of the following resolution passed so recently as the 21st of June, 1919, at the Non-Brahmin Conference, held at Trichinopoly, under the presidency of a Mohammedan gentleman: "That this Conference sincerely believes that the absence of a provision for a separate Non-Brahmin Hindu Electorate will alter the British character of the Government and create an Anti-British Oligarchy, which the Non-Brahmins declare themselves not bound by the ties of loyalty which bind them to the British Government, so long as it retains its British character." That these fears require to be allayed will, it is hoped, be conceded. The Government of India saw the need for such allaying, though at a late stage, and though they propose only a half-measure to secure that end. A great Reform Scheme, with such far-reaching consequences, cannot be ushered in, when vast communities are groaning under discontent at the very threshhold of its inauguration. Peace, contentment and justice have been Britain's greatest boons to India. God grant it, they may not be taken away from us now.

APPENDIX I.

PAPER handed in by Mr. Ramachandra Rao on 13th August, 1919. (See Evidence, Question 3925 et seq.)

NOTE ON THE BUDGET PROCEDURE IN PROVINCIAL LEGISLATIVE COUNCILS UNDER THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA BILL.

In paragraph 256 of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report the authors deal with the question of the Budget procedure in the provincial legislative councils. The Report says "that the provincial Budget should be framed by the Executive Government as a whole. The first charge on provincial revenue will be the contribution to the Government of India, and after that the supply for the reserved services will have priority. The allocation of supply for the transferred subjects will be decided by the Ministers. If the revenue is insufficient for their needs, the question of new taxation will be decided by the Governor and the Ministers. The Budget will then be laid before the council, which will discuss it and vote by resolution on the allotments. If the legislative council rejects or modifies the proposed allotment for reserved subjects, the Governor should have the power to insist on the whole or any part of the allotment originally provided if, for reasons to be stated, he certifies its necessity in the terms in which we have already suggested."

1. It is clear from the terms of the above paragraph (1) that it was intended that the Budget as a whole should be presented to the legislative council, (2) that the council should discuss the Budget as a whole and vote on it by resolution, and (3) that all proposals involving new taxation should be brought forward only with the consent of the Ministers.

In regard to the first and second points Sir Sankara Nair also understood the proposals as conceding the financial control of the provincial councils over the whole Budget. He says that "he understands the original proposals of the Report as requiring the entire Budget to be submitted to the legislative council, whose resolutions on the Budget will be binding even as to the reserved subjects unless the Governor restores the disallowed allotments of the Budget on specific grounds."

In regard to the last point the Government of India admit that "it is the intention of the Report that fresh taxation cannot be raised for the necessities of a reserved subject except by Ministers and with their consent." (Para. 67 of their letter dated March 5, 1919, page 26 of the Blue Book.)

In fact, it is this part of the scheme relating to the powers of control proposed to be conceded to the provincial legislative council's over provincial revenues that induced me and many others like me to give their support to the scheme. The Bill as now framed, coupled with the proposals of the Government of India in their letter of March 5, some of which find acceptance in the Bill, has so considerably modified the original proposals in regard to financial control as to render this part of the Bill unacceptable.

The proposals in the Bill in regard to the Budget procedure are to be found in Clause 9 and are explained in para. 16 of the Memorandum.

2. The following questions arise, therefore, for consideration :—

1. Will the Budget statement presented to the legislative council and open for discussion and vote of the council contain the receipt heads as well as expenditure heads? In other words, will it continue to be framed as it is under the present practice, as an estimate of the probable income and expenditure of the financial year under the various heads?

2. Will it be open to the members of the legislative council to discuss the estimated receipts and move resolutions modifying or varying the figures given in the estimates in regard to receipts and to vote upon them?

3. Should the proposals involving the raising of the existing burdens on the people either by executive action or involving taxation legislation receive the assent of the legislative council, or will it be open to the Governor to exercise his power of certification and to utilise the Grand Committee for legislation involving taxation?

4. Will it be open to private members to propose alterations under the expenditure heads, either from one reserved to another reserved head, or from one transferred head to another tranferred head, or from a reserved head to a transferred head?

5. Will the members be in a position to move resolutions suggesting increase of expenditure either in the reserved sphere or in the transferred services?

6. What are the limits of the emergency powers of the Governor to incur expenditure? (Clause 9 (2) (b).)

7. What are the permanent charges on the provincial revenues that would be exempted from the annual financial discussion by rules? (Clause 9 (2) (c).)

3. In regard to the first and second questions, the Bill as drafted is not clear on the points raised and it has been suggested that it is not intended that the receipts heads of the Budget should form the subject of discussion or vote in the legislative council. This view, if carried out, would be a novel method of Budget procedure, hitherto unknown. Clause 9 (2) mentions that the proposals of the local government for "the appropriation of the provincial revenues should be submitted to the council in the form of resolutions." If by the words "appropriations of the provincial revenues" it is intended that the expenditure side of the Budget alone should be submitted to the vote of the council it will be a very serious curtailment of the function of the legislative council. It is equally necessary that the receipt heads must be also open for discussion and should be voted upon in the legislative council. Under the present regulations the members are entitled to discuss both receipts and expenditure, and resolutions have been moved in the provincial legislative council suggesting the reductions of the anticipated revenues of the year. A few instances may be given. A resolution was moved in the Madras Legislative Council for omitting from the Budget the anticipated sale proceeds of waste lands amounting to a lakh of rupees and advocating that the lands should be distributed free to the poorer classes (Vol. 39, p. 144). Again, a resolution was moved last year that the land revenue receipts to the extent of Rs. 5,41,000 anticipated as revenue from cultivation of Poramboke lands should be deducted from the head of land revenue, and this was done to express disapproval with the system of imposing penalties. Another resolution aimed at reducing the figures under land revenue, miscellaneous (Proceedings of the Council for 1918, p. 383). In this way several questions of principle have been discussed, and various instances may be quoted from the Proceedings that these discussions in regard to the methods of raising revenue have done considerable good.

The council must necessarily have the power of scrutinising all items of receipts, and not only those items which require legislative sanction. Reference has been made in this connection to the practice in the House of Commons, and it may be useful to refer to the procedure in that Assembly. The Committee of Ways and Means in the House of Commons goes into the receipts heads, and resolutions of the whole House are adopted for the variation of any existing tax or for the renewal of any tax in force or imposed during the financial year. In fact, the taxation proposals for the revenue of the year are considered by the Committee of Ways and Means, which can consider not only the impositions of the new taxes but also the repeal of existing taxation and the substitution of one tax for another (May's Parliamentary Practice, pp. 487 to 491). The only limitation to the power of the Committee is "that no augmentation of the tax or duty asked by the Crown can be proposed by the Committee or tax imposed save on the sanction of a Minister of the Crown." Subject to the above limitation, the legislative council should, therefore, have the power of discussing and voting on the proposals for raising the revenues of the year. Any deviation would be in variance with existing practice in the councils, which, as pointed out, are now permitted to discuss by resolutions (which are not binding on the Government) the estimated receipts.

4. The third question raises the important point as to whether the additional revenue of the year should be raised only with the consent of the Ministers and of the legislative council or whether the Governor should have the power of certification and of securing the necessary legislation over the head of the legislative council by adopting the Grand Committee procedure. I have already referred to para. 256 of the Report, which explicitly laid down that "all proposals for new taxation should be decided by the Governor and the Ministers." The Report was understood as recognising once for all the finality of the legislative council on the subject of taxation. To adopt any other course and to place the power of taxation ultimately in the hands of the Governor would be a negation of all responsibility of the popular assembly.

The essential difference between the system of taxation prevailing in the United Kingdom and that in vogue in India cannot be overlooked. In India a considerable part of the revenue is raised under the heads of land revenue and excise, and though there are statutes relating to these branches of administration the power of imposing taxation and adding to the existing burdens is now entirely vested in the executive Government and does not require legislative sanction. In the United Kingdom, on the other hand, taxation can only be imposed by legislation passed in Parliament after full discussion. Sir Sankaran Nair has advocated that land revenue should be placed on a legislative basis as recommended by this Royal Commission on Decentralisation. If, therefore, the receipt side of the Budget does not come under the discussion of the legislative council the executive Government of the province will be able to impose taxation under the powers given by the existing Acts without the criticism of the legislative council, and these proposals will go without any scrutiny in the council.

Reading Clauses 8 and 9 of the Bill, it is not quite clear what the position will be in this matter. The Government of India propose that "if either part of the Government asks for taxation which involves legislation or desired to raise a loan, it will introduce a Bill for the purpose. If the Bill comes from the official side of the Government and the legislature proves hostile, the Governor can exercise his right of removing it by certification to the Grand Committee." This procedure will stultify the legislative council, which will thus be deprived of the essential function of a popular assembly. Clause (3) of Section 9, which relates to the constitution of Grand Committees, must be so drafted as to make it quite clear that the Governor cannot invoke the aid of the Grand Committee for taxation Bills.

5. The points (4) and (5) may now be considered. The question is whether the members of the legislative council should, in discussing the expenditure side of the Budget, have the liberty of suggesting variations and transfers from one head to another and whether they should also have power of proposing an increase in expenditure in directions desired by them. They have under existing regulations the power of moving resolutions involving increase of expenditure subject to the limitation that if the proposal has the effect of reducing the closing balances of the year, ways and means must also be suggested for counterbalancing increase in revenue or reduction in expenditure so as to avoid such reduction in the closing balances. This power has been very largely availed of, and though the resolutions are at present only recommendatory I venture to think a great deal of good has been done even to the departments which will hereafter come under the category of "reserved." I venture to give below a summary of the resolutions moved in the Madras Legislative Council from 1909 to 1918 on the improvement of the services, most of which will fall under the category of reserved subjects.

THE PUBLIC SERVICES.

"The method of recruitment to the public services and the improvement of their pay and prospects have also formed the subjects of continuous discussion and examination in the Council. A very large portion of the establishments of the Public Works Department has been on a temporary basis for a long time though there was absolutely no chance of any contraction in the operations of the department. The claims of this class of public servants for better pay and prospects have been successfully urged in the Council, with the result that a scheme for the reorganisation of the deparment was undertaken with the sanction of the Secretary of State. Another subject which was pressed with some degree of success upon the attention of the Government was the desirability of discouraging the employment of temporary engineers imported from Europe on large salaries to the detriment of the indigenous agency. This has been found not to be necessary, and this class of men is being gradually eliminated, and a root cause of discontent among the superior officers of the department has been removed. The reorganisation of the inferior establishment in this department was also suggested, and this has also met with some success.

"In the Judicial Department the provincial judicial service was organised on its present basis in 1886. Large temporary additions have been made from time to time to the cadre of this service to cope with the growing litigation. A reorganisation of the whole department has been long overdue, and it is therefore brought to the notice of the Government. The question of the increase of pay of district munsifs and subordinate judges with a view to encourage better recruitment also formed the subject of representation, and the Government have recognised the claims of this class of officers for better treatment. The unsatisfactory condition of the subordinate magistracy has been the subject of complaint for a long number of years, and has found expression in the Council since 1910. The matter was again brought to notice and pressed on the attention of the authorities, and the present increased scale of pay is the result of these efforts. It is, however, a matter of great doubt whether the quality of this class of officers would improve in a substantial manner unless better methods of recruitment are adopted. The difficulty in the settlement of this question lay in the fact that the stepping-stone to the post of a sub-magistrate is through the Revenue Department, where the recruitment at the bottom is begun at Rs. 20. The whole question of a better system of recruitment has been under consideration since 1885, and was one of the points on which the Public Service Commission which sat in that year took evidence from many eminent European and Indian officials who expressed the opinion that the starting pay should be at least Rs. 100 to attract a better type of men in o the service. This long pending question was decided by the Government in 1911, but the conclusion arrived at was that the starting pay should be Rs. 35 —a most unsatisfactory solution of this vexed question. The matter was therefore promptly brought up in the Council for discussion. The Government have during the last two years introduced a scheme of recruitment with an initial salary of Rs. 100.

"The desirability of the appointment of an Indian to the Board of Revenue was brought up for consideration, but the Government sheltered themselves under the plea that this is not one of the listed appointments from the provincial service, and that they therefore were powerless to make the appointment, even if they were inclined to do so. The appointment of an Indian official to the Board was made by the Government in 1917. The question of secretariat training to Indian officers was also urged. At one time it was under contemplation to take away the only appointment of an under-secretaryship from the provincial service. The organisation of the department of the revenue settlement also came up for consideration. Before 1902, when the resolution relating to the land revenue policy was issued, there was a fairly good proportion of Indian officers in this department, but since that time the Indian element has been gradually eliminated, and the superior grades of the department were filled by the members of the Indian Civil Service. The Government conceded that two of the superior appointments of the settlement officers would be filled from the deputy collectors employed in the settlement department. The recruitment of assistant directors of survey also came for consideration. This is one of those services in which it is the conventional official belief that the Indians lack the physical habits and energy necessary for making successful officers. Direct recruitment of young Indians into this department was therefore urged without detriment to the claims of the older men already in service as sub-assistant directors. The Government practically agreed to consider the claims of those already in service, but would not listen to the proposal to enlist young men in this Presidency by direct recruitment in this department, though they made vague promises that they would very carefully consider all that has been said in the debate. The claims of the low-paid village establishments were also frequently urged in the Council. The hard lot of karnams, village munsifs, village talayaries and vetties and other village servants was persistently pressed during the last six years, but without any effect, the plea put forward being that even a small increase of a rupee a month over existing salaries would cost several lakhs of rupees, that the village officers have perquisites to depend upon, that any reasonable increase that would meet the situation satisfactorily was out of question on account of its excessive cost, that any small increase, therefore, is useless, and that the payment of any travelling allowance when they are obliged to leave the village would lead to numerous frauds, and that, therefore, it cannot be considered. Every one of these arguments has been so unconvincing that one of the non-official members took the view that the Government is more ready to listen to proposals for the increase of the pay of the already well-paid men in the public services than of men with small salaries and of smaller means. During the last six years schemes of reorganisation in the Revenue Department have never touched the men at the bottom, but improved the prospects of head accountants and every other class of subordinate officers, with the exception of the village officers and village servants. One of the important proposals brought forward and also accepted by Government, and which is full of potentiality for the future, aimed at the deputation of the officers of the provincial or subordinate educational services to foreign countries. It has been felt for a long time that the European agency in the Educational Department has enormously increased and is increasing without any provision having been made for the training of suitable indigenous agency. The rapid propress of Japan is entirely due to the policy of the Government of that country to send out to European countries large numbers of the young men for training in all departments of knowledge, for gradually replacing the foreign agency which is necessary at the outset. The principle of the resolution has been accepted. The pay and prospects of the assistant lecturers and assistant professors also came up for consideration, and a slight advance over the existing conditions was secured. The inspectorate also received some attention, the claims of Indians to some of these posts having been urged, but without any success. It is understood that a large scheme for the increase of the inspectorate, so as to secure the services of an inspector of schools to the larger districts, has now been sent to the Secretary of State. Other subjects of interest which have been successfully urged in the Council are the institution of a provident fund for teachers of private secondary schools, the improvement of the scheme and pay of pandits in Government and aided institutions, and the pay of the elementary schoolmasters both in the Board and aided institutions."

The aim of the non-official members of the legislative council has been the general improvement of the underpaid services in all branches of administration and the diversion of funds from unproductive works for education, sanitation, and medical relief. If the proposal is to cut down this right it will create a great dissatisfaction, and its retention will, I believe, be beneficial to the administration.

6. The rule embodied in Clause 9 (d) has reference to the points raised in questions 4 and 5. It is true that "the sole function of the Committee of Supply in the House of Commons is to grant, reduce, or refuse the supplies set forth in the estimates." There are, however, some qualifications to that rule (May, pp. 464 to 467). The Government of India have, however, recommended that the existing practice may be continued though under certain modifications. They suggest "that resolutions may be allowed to be moved to propose an addition to one Budget grant in exchange for an equivalent reduction in another." They, however, made this proposal under their scheme of a separate purse, and suggest that no resolution to transfer funds from reserved to a transferred subject should be permitted. This limitation must disappear if their proposals for a separate purse are not accepted.

7. The question of the exemption of certain permanent charges from discussion on the annual estimates is proposed to be left to rules to be framed hereafter. Nothing useful under this head can be said till the exact proposals are published, and it is not now possible to know what are the charges that are contemplated to be excluded from discussion. For example, charges relating to the payment of interest on debt and the salaries of the officers appointed by His Majesty's Government may be put into this category, and it is undesirable to go further. The adequacy and strength, pay, and all questions relating to the permanent services of the province should not be placed in this category. It may be pointed out that the legislative council is greatly interested in the maintenance of the permanent services in an efficient condition, whether they are reserved or transferred. The recommendations made in this behalf during the last ten years in the Madras Legislative Council, as shown in the above summary, have considerably improved the public service of the province. It is better to leave this matter to the councils than to tie them by rules framed by an outside authority. It is perhaps apprehended that the councils will undertake undesirable economies by cutting down charges on the services, but this is an ungrounded fear. I suggest, therefore, that this should be left to the councils except in the matter of the high appointments made by His Majesty's Government.

8. The last point that I should like to raise is in regard to expenditure incurred by a provincial government after the approval of the Budget by the legislative council. This also raises the question of the emergency powers of the Governor in sanctioning expenditure referred to in Clause 9 (2) (b). In the first place, it is not clear whether the emergency expenditure authorised by the Governor should be in anticipation of the Budget sanction or whether in addition to the power of certification the Governor is also to have the power of sanctioning expenditure which may be necessary, in his opinion, "for the safety or tranquillity of the province or for the carrying on of any department." The power proposed to be conferred is too wide, but even apart from it the question arises as to whether it is not necessary to provide for the presentation of supplementary Budget estimates to be brought up before the legislative council to provide for expenditure not covered by the Budget. Experience in the provincial legislative councils shows that even under the existing regulations considerable expenditure is incurred between one Budget and another, and it has been a matter of complaint that this expenditure is not brought under discussion in the legislative councils till long after the expenditure is incurred. In regard to this matter I may again venture to draw attention to the proceedings of the Madras Legislative Council, where year after year it was complained that large schemes of expenditure were given effect to in the middle of the financial year without any discussion in the legislative council (Proceedings of the Council for 1915–16, pp. 870–871). Under the scheme of financial control now proposed to be introduced in the provinces it is necessary to make provision for supplementary estimates generally for the purposes mentioned in Secs. 225 and 226 of Ilbert's Manual of Procedure of the House of Commons (pp. 166 and 167)—that is, when the amount named in the ordinary estimates of the year for a particular service is insufficient for the purpose of the current year, and when a need arises during the current year for expenditure upon some new service not contemplated in the ordinary estimates of the year.

APPENDIX K.

PAPER handed in by M. Ramachandra Rao on 13th August, 1919. (See Question 3925 et seq.)

NOTE ON THE STATUTORY RULES UNDER THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA BILL.

1. One of the essential features of the Government of India Bill is the excessive provision made in the Bill for subordinate legislation by the Executive Government. Under the terms of Clause 30, the rules by way of sub-legislation are to be made by the Governor General in Council, with the sanction of the Secretary of State in Council, and that they will not be subject to repeal or alteration by the Indian Legislature or by any Local Legislature. Two questions therefore arise for consideration, viz.:—(1) Whether any of the matters which are to be provided by rules should be incorporated as substantive provisions in the Bill; (2) whether the provisions of the Bill, in so far as they confer the power for making rules which would be unalterable by the Legislatures are sound, and whether they require modifications and safeguards.

RULES UNDER THE BILL.

2. It will be convenient at the outset to group together the matters proposed to be dealt with by rules. They are as follows:—

1. Rules (a) for the classification of the subjects as central and provincial, (b) for the devolution of authority in respect of provincial subjects to Local Governments, (c) for the use of Local Governments as the agents for the administration of the central subjects, and (d) for the transfer of provincial subjects to the Governor acting with the Ministers, and (e) for fixing the contributions payable by Local Governments and for making the contributions a first charge, (f) for the constitution of a Finance Department, (g) for regulating the exercise of authority by Local Governments over the public services, and, lastly, for the settlement of doubts. Clause 1 (1) and (2).

2. Rules for exercising the powers of superintendence, direction and control over Local Governments vested in the Governor General in Council in relation to transferred subjects. Clause 1 (3).

3. Rules for the temporary administration of transferred subjects when, on account of a vacancy, there is no Minister Clause 3 (4).

4. Rules laying down the qualifications of the members of the Executive Council. Clause 4 (2).

5. Rules for the transaction of business in a Governor's Executive Council and with his Ministers and for regulating the relations between the Executive Council and the Ministers. Clause 5 (2).

6. Rules for providing the increase in the number of members of the Legislative Council by not more than five per cent. and for varying the proportions. Clause 6 (1) (a).

7. Rules regarding the term of office of members of Governors' Legislative Councils, the conditions in which and the manner in which casual vacancies should be filled up, the conditions under which and the manner in which persons resident in India may be nominated or elected as members of the Legislative Council, the qualifications for being nominated or elected as members of the Legislative Council, and the final decision of doubts or disputes as to the validity of any election Clause 6 (3).

8. Rules excluding the jurisdiction of the Provincial Legislative Councils from altering or repealing, without previous sanction, the provisions of any law made by any authority in India. Clause 8 (3) (h).

9. Rules for exempting the Provincial Legislative Council from imposing or authorising the imposition of any tax outside the schedule. Clause 8 (3) (a).

10. Rules declaring certain charges to be permanent charges and exempted from annual discussion. Clause 9 (2) (c).

11. Rules for giving effect to Clause 9 (5) of the Bill in regard to certificated legislation and for regulating the course of business, and as to the persons who should preside over and the preservation of the order at the meetings of the Legislative Council, for the quorum of the Council, for prohibiting or regulating the asking of questions and the discussion of any subject specified in the rules. Clause 9 (6).

12. Rules authorising the Governor to reserve a Bill for the consideration of the Governor-General. Clause 10 (1).

13. Rules for the nomination and election of the members of the Legislative Assembly. Clause 16 (1).

14. Rules for increasing the number of the members of the Legislative Assembly and to vary the proportions. Clause 16 (2).

15. Rules for laying down the terms of office of nominated members, the qualification for membership, and the decision of doubts or disputes. Clause 19 (1).

16. Rules for regulating the course of business of the Legislative Assembly, the preservation of order, for fixing the quorum, and for prohibiting or regulating the asking of questions and the discussion of any subject specified in the rules. Clause 20 (2).

17. Rules for giving effect to Clause 20 (4), enabling the Council of State to pass laws without the assent of the Legislative Assembly. Clause 20 (5).

18. Rules laying down the qualifications of the members of the Executive Council of the Governor-General. Clause 21 (2).

19. Rules regulating or restricting the exercise by the Secretary of State in Council and of the Governor General in Council of their powers of superintendence, direction, or control. Clause 23 (2).

20. Rules for regulating the classification of the public services, the methods of their recruitment, the conditions of their service, pay and allowances, discipline and conduct. Clause 24 (3).

21. Rules in regard to pensions. Clause 24 (3).

22. Rules for the appointment to the Indian Civil Service. Clause 25 (1).

23. Rules for the appointment of the members of the Public Service Commission. Clause 26 (2).

24. Rules assigning duties to the members of the Public Service Commission. Clause 26 (2).

25. Rules for the appointment, pay, powers, and duties of the Auditor-General. Clause 27 (1).

26. Rules for the consultation of the Finance Authority for varying the pay or emoluments of the public services of India. Clause 27 (2).

The Crewe Committee Report.

3. This is a formidable list. In addition to these matters there are other points arising out of the Crewe Committee Report on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs. It is not known which of the recommendations of the Committee and of the dissenting members will be adopted. It is not therefore possible at present to foresee what modifications would be proposed in the substantive provisions of the Government of India Act and what matters would be reserved for rules. The Committee have indicated in para. 28 of the Report the statutory changes in the Government of India Act rendered necessary in consequence of their recommendations, and it is likely that a good deal of the actual process of devolution will be provided by rules under the Act. As pointed out by Sir James Brunyate, the Report of the Committee affords little or no indication of the intended scope and methods of the further delegation of the powers of the Secretary of State in Council to Indian authorities. If any real political change is intended, statutory effect will have to be given by rules framed under Clause 23 of the Bill, by which the Secretary of State should divest himself of his powers of superintendence, control, and direction in regard to legislation, control over expenditure, control over administrative policy and schemes. Besides, the grouping of the All-India subjects into controlled and popular and various other matters referred to by Sir James Brunyate will have to be carried out by rules. According to the proposals contained in the Report, the rules framed under Clause 23 will, therefore, be vital to the whole scheme for the development of self-governing institutions in India. It is the function of the Joint Committee to examine the policy of all the rules, and also of the rules for which provision has already been made in the Bill.

Opportunity for Criticism.

4. Where so much of the intended advance is to be secured by the rules to be framed, rather than by the actual meagre provisions of the Bill, it is of the utmost importance that opportunities should be afforded for an adequate examination of the rules by those interested in Indian Reform. Sir James Meston stated in his evidence that he brought with him from India the proposals relating to this subsidiary legislation for consideration by the India Office and also of the Joint Committee. In introducing the Bill, Mr. Montagu stated "that the principle which he intended to embody in these rules is intended to be submitted to both the Houses, and the policy of these rules, if not the actual wording, will be carefully considered at the same time as the Bill itself. It has always been said that the Minto-Morley Reforms were largely defeated by the rules made under it, and I want on this occasion to avoid any possibility of this charge being levelled." I would strongly urge that, in view of the fact that the success of the Bill depends very largely on the way in which its operative provisions will be carried out by rules, the deputations now in this country should be afforded an opportunity of offering their views on the points proposed to be dealt with by rules. This appears to be as essential as the criticism of the provisions of the Bill.

Electoral Law and Procedure.

5. I shall now briefly refer to some of the points mentioned in para. 2. At the outset I fully recognise the force of the argument of the Secretary of State that the process of development may be seriously embarrassed if the whole scheme were made more rigid at the start and that elasticity is essential. The limitations of Parliamentary legislation on all the complicated matters covered by the Bill are apparent. I venture to think, however, that the proposals in the Bill in regard to the authorities that should undertake subsidiary legislation are fundamentally defective. In the first place I may refer to two groups of subjects in regard to which the Governor-General in Council is to be empowered to make rules. The first is in regard to the electoral machinery and its future development, and the other refers to the regulation of the course of business in the Legislatures in India. The Governor-General in Council is to be authorised, subject to the sanction of the Secretary of State in Council, to make rules laying down the qualifications for the membership of the Legislative Councils and of the Legislative Assembly, the term of office of the members of the Governors' Legislative Councils, the conditions in which casual vacancies are to be filled up, and for increasing the number of members in the Legislative Councils and of the Legislative Assembly. (Items 6, 7, 11, 13, 14 and 15.) Similarly the Governor-General in Council is to be empowered to make rules for regulating the course of business in the Legislative Councils and in the Legislative Assembly and the Council of State. (Items 5, 16 and 17.) Both sets of rules will, under the terms of Clause 30, not be subject to repeal or alteration by the Indian Legislature or by any Local Legislature. The Executive Government is therefore to be empowered to determine the composition of the Legislatures, and to lay down not only the electoral law but also the way in which business is to be transacted by the Legislatures in India, and the latter are to have no voice in deciding how they will transact their own business or to develop their own Constitution. This procedure is repugnant to the free development of self-governing institutions. The Indian Councils Act of 1909 gave the Government of India a blank cheque to do what it liked with the composition of the Legislatures by empowering the Governor General to frame regulations. Mr. Balfour then very rightly pointed "that the Government elaborately and carefully had taken precautions that there shall be nothing in the measure which shall prevent any future Government of India doing exactly what they like with representation. The then Government of India pledged themselves to give undue representation to the Mohammedans. Nothing in the world to prevent some other Government from giving undue representation to some other community." Under the present Bill the same policy is to be kept up, with the result that a Bill professedly intended to develop self-governing institutions deprives these institutions of all liberty to settle their own procedure and to examine their own constitution from time to time. I fully believe that, if an electoral system truly representative of the people is to be developed in India, this power should be transferred from the Executive Government to the Legislatures themselves. Provincial Legislatures would then vie with each other in perfecting their electoral systems and to secure a living representation of all classes of people.

Supplemental Registration.

6. I need hardly state that in the self-governing Dominions the composition of the Legislatures increase in the number of members, the voters' qualifications, and all questions relating to elections are dealt with in the Acts of Parliament or of the Legislatures of the country. There are practical difficulties in Parliament undertaking such legislation in regard to the Indian Legislatures. The proper course is, as already stated, for the Legislatures in India to undertake supplemental legislation. In order to avoid any further delay, it will be necessary to empower the Governor General in Council to frame, in the first instance, regulations on the materials made available by Lord Southborough's Committee, but the Provincial Legislatures and the Indian Legislative Assembly must be at liberty to undertake modification of these regulations by statute if necessary, two years after the new Councils come into existence. It is desirable that a provision to this effect should be made in the Bill, and Clause 30 should be modified. If the Legislative Councils had been set free in 1909 to develop their electoral machinery in each Province, some of the present difficulties about the electoral system would have been greatly minimised, and I feel it would be altogether unwise to go the same way again and to tie the hands of the Legislatures to be constituted under the present Bill in a similar manner. The increase in the number of members referred to in Clause 6 (1) (a) should be undertaken by the Legislatures themselves and not by the Government. I do not see how the Legislatures are less competent to deal with these questions. In regard to the Indian Legislative Assembly and the Council of State it has been suggested that a direct system of franchise should be adopted. If these suggestions are to be carried out, it is far better to liberate the Indian Legislature to be constituted as now proposed in the Bill to develop a system of direct election rather than to entrust this duty to the Executive Government. It is perhaps better to maintain the first schedule to the Bill, which fixes the composition of the Councils, without any alterations by the Councils till the Statutory Commission goes round, but there is no reason why the Councils should not be permitted to modify the regulations framed in regard to the matters mentioned in Clause 6 (3), and as to why they should not have the power of increasing the number of members proposed to be given under Clause 6 (1) (a). Similarly the supplementary legislation mentioned in Clause 19 should be undertaken by the Legislative Assembly after two years after the regulations are framed.

Rules of Business.

7. In regard to the rules of business also the Councils should have the power to settle their own procedure. At present the rules for the conduct of business in the Legislative Council in Madras and in the other Provinces are framed by the Councils, but when the Councils Acts of 1892 and of 1909 were passed, the right of Budget discussion, the right of asking questions and the moving of resolutions was conceded, supplemental regulations were made, and these were not subject to alteration by the Councils. (Sec. 80, Clause 3.) These rules of business, which generally applied to the whole proceedings of the Council, including those governed by the supplemental regulations, are, therefore, now made by the Council under the existing law. (Sec. 37 of the Councils Act of 1861, corresponding to Sec. 83 (3) of the Act of 1815.) The effect of the provision made in Clause 6 (6) is to take away the right from the Legislative Council and to vest it in the Governor General in Council in virtue of his power to make rules. In all the Local Legislative Councils and the Indian Legislative Council there is a strong feeling that the Councils should have complete control over their own procedure. The supplemental regulations made in 1909 were passed without any public discussion, and the Councils had no power to alter them, with the result that the asking of questions, the moving of resolutions, and generally the discussion of subjects have been cramped by regulations made by an outside authority, and in actual practice the discussional powers of the Councils have been cut down. Sir Dinshaw Wacha complained last year in the Indian Legislative Council that it was not a self-governing body, and advocated an urgent reform of the present rules of procedure. The same feeling exists in most of the Provincial Legislative Councils. While Municipal Councils and District Boards can settle their own rules of procedure, it is not consistent with the position of the Councils to have their rules settled by an outside authority. In 1909 Mr. Donald Smeaton brought forward an amendment at the Committee stage of the Indian Councils Bill that the Councils should have some voice in settling their own procedure, but this was then negatived. Some distinction is drawn in the Bill between standing orders and rules, but the former can be framed only when any matter is not provided by rules. I suggest, therefore, that the Councils should be empowered to settle their own rules of procedure.

PUBLICATION OF THE STATUTORY RULES.

8. The extensive delegation of legislative powers to executive authority is one of the outstanding features of the Bill. To what extent and under what safeguards and restrictions the exercise of legislative power by the executive authorities referred to in the Bill should be permitted is a question of principle. I have already referred to the difficulty of undertaking Parliamentary legislation in regard to elec oral law and the need for supplemental legislation on the subject in India. There are a few matters in regard to which provision should be made in the Bill. One of these relates to the Council of State. Clause 20 (4) enables the Council of State to pass certificated legislation without the assent of the Legislative Assembly, and Sub-Clause (5) confers power to enact by rule general and supplemental provisions for the purpose of giving full effect to Clause 20 of the Bill. This is objectionable. The Council of State as a legislative expedient for affirmative legislation is bad enough, but to take general power to frame rules for the purpose of giving full effect to the provisions of Clause 20 is worse. If any further provisions are wanted to make the Council of State the supreme legislative authority they must be fully discussed and embodied in the Bill itself and should not be developed by rules. Again, in the case of the local Legislatures, Clause 8 (3), (a), (b), (c), and (d), (f) and (g), expressly lays down the cases in which they cannot undertake legislation without the previous sanction of the Governor-General in Council, but Sub-Clause (h) of Clause 8 (3) proposes to empower the Governor-General to oust the jurisdiction of the local Legislatures by rule in other cases. This is not desirable and ought to be dropped. The great objection to conceding this extensive rule making power to the Executive Government as suggested in the Bill, however, is the total absence of all safeguards for hearing the authorities concerned previous to the promulgation of the rules and to their subsequent modification or revocation. The position will be fully illustrated by a reference to Clause 1, which is one of the most important clauses in the Bill. It confers power on the Governor-General in Council to make a classification of subjects as central and provincial, to provide for the devolution of authority in respect of provincial subjects to local Governments, and for the allocation of sources of revenue to those Governments, and for fixing contributions payable to local Governments to the Governor-General in Council, for the transfer of subjects to the administration of Ministers and various other important matters. It is under the provisions of this clause that the transfer of power to provincial Legislatures and provincial Governments is proposed to be effected. I presume that the proposals of the Feetham Committee and of the Government of India, as may be modified by the Joint Committee, will be reduced to the form of rules, and the rules so made will be laid before Parliament, and are liable to be annulled by an address by either House. The Bill therefore affords facilities for Parliamentary criticism, but does not make any provision that in the promulgation of these rules in the first instance or in their subsequent alteration or revocation the authorities in India—namely, the local Legislatures, the local Governments, or the Legislative Assembly—should have opportunities for criticism or that should be heard. It will be open for the Governor-General in Council to increase the financial contribution from any Province without either asking for the views of the local Government, or even if the local Government is consulted without the knowledge of the local Legislature which will have to find funds by taxation. It will, as the Bill is framed, be open to the Governor-General in Council to take away one source of revenue and to substitute another without consulting the local Legisture and to regulate the extent and conditions of devolution, allocation, and transfer, and he may also decide questions as to whether any matter does or does not belong to a provincial subject or a transferred subject. It will also be open to him to authorise the revocation or suspension of the transfer of any subject with the sanction of the Secretary of State, but without obtaining the views of the local Legislature or the Minister, and on the motion of the Executive Council and the Governor. These are not mere possibilities, and there are no safeguards in the Bill. In writing on the rule making powers conferred on executive authority in England, Sir Courtney Ilbert says "that the Englishman has an instinctive distrust of official discretion and an instinctive scepticism of bureaucratic wisdom, and that they are ready enough to confer new powers on the executive authority, but he would like to see for himself how these powers are to be exercised, and to see in black and white the rules by which his liberty of action is restrained and to have an effective share in the making of these rules." In India the distrust of official discretion and the scepticism of bureaucratic wisdom is even greater, and the failure of the Minto-Morley Reforms has intensified this feeling. I think, therefore, a different course ought to be pursued, and that the provisions of the Bill must be re examined with a view to see how far the power to make statutory rules may be left to the provincial Legislatures and the provincial Governments, which of them must go to the confirmation of the Governor-General in Council, and which must come to the Secretary of State in Council for sanction or to be laid before Parliament. Under any circumstances provisions for the previous publication of drafts of the proposed statutory rules in India, and for the conside ation of the objections and suggestions by the local Legislatures, local Governments, and the Indian Legislative Assembly by the Governor-General in Council, ought to be made. The Rules Publication Act, 1893, contains analogous provisions in English legislation. If the Legislative Council and the local Government agree in urging the modification of a statutory rule, the Government of India and the Secretary of State should as a rule defer to their wishes. The Secretary of State might follow a similar course in regard to central subjects, and in regard to rules to be framed in consequence of the Crewe Committee Report. Provision to this effect should, in my opinion, be made in the Bill.

PAPER handed in by M. Ramachandra Rao on 13th August, 1919. (See question 4008.)

THE FRANCHISE QUESTION IN MADRAS.

One of the main points for investigation by the Franchise Committee in this Presidency is the question of communal representation and before putting forward my proposals for the reconstitution of the Legislative Council of this Province, it will perhaps be better to refer briefly to the general features of the problem in this Presidency. The subject is not new in the political history of this Presidency. It was very much discussed when the Minto-Morley reforms were introduced. In 1908 the Government put forward a scheme of representation based on the communal principle. This was then universally condemned by the Non-Brahmin leaders of thought and culture in this Presidency whose outlook and statesmanship can hardly be questioned.

COMMUNAL ELECTORATES.

2. I will only refer to the opinions of a few representative men who come within the category of the classes on whose behalf the demand for communal electorates is now being made. Dewan Bahadur P. Rajaratna Mudaliar, Retired Inspector-General of Registration, Madras, informed the Madras Government that "he does not consider it right in principle to form an electorate based on distinctions of caste and creed, but at the same time, he was decidedly of opinion that provision should be made for the proper representation of different interests or occupations, such as landed interests, the interests of trade and commerce and the like."

The President, Madras Landholders' Association, the Maharajah of Venkatagiri (now deceased), stated that his Association wished to point out that "the principle of representation of castes and creeds which stood out as one of the prominent features of the proposed scheme was open to grave objections in that it is calculated to accentuate differences which were losing their importance in secular affairs and interests with the growth of a sentiment of unity among the people which is a necessary condition for progress. Further, the principle will be attended with great many difficulties in its application in practice." The Maharajah of Bobbili, latterly a member of the Madras Executive Council, expressed his condemnation of the proposed scheme and pointed out that "while substantial interests have necessarily to be cared for in the appointment of representatives, mere sentimental considerations are likely to run counter to the unifying influences now at work in the country which ought rather to be welcomed and fostered. The distinction made between Brahmins and non-Brahmins seems to go further in this obnoxious respect." The Honourable Rajah Vasudeva Rajah Valia Nambidi of Kollengode expressed his disapproval in no uncertain terms:—"In regard to the method suggested for filling up the seats, I fear that the proposals made by the Government are not quite practicable. The cry has already been raised that Government, for political reasons, are attempting to accentuate caste differences at a time when, on account of the spread of Western education, such differences are becoming every day of less importance." By far the most emphatic condemnation came from the pen of Mr. M. Krishna Nair, for some time a member of the Legislative Council and now the Dewan of Travancore. He said:—"It is respectfully submitted that the division of people by castes and creeds for the purpose of representation in the Legislative Council is highly objectionable in principle. There are no caste or religious interests in the Legislative Council. The whole trend of education imparted in English schools and colleges and the general policy that has hitherto been pursued by the Government has been to ignore them. There are no separate schools and colleges for Brahmins and non-Brahmins, Hindus, Muhammadans and Christians. The laws of the land are the same whatever may be the caste to which a man may belong. It is neither possible nor desirable now to revive and enforce the laws of Manu. It is too late in the day now to ask the people to go back to their caste organisations or to reconstruct them for the purpose of electing members to the Legislative Council. The most potent force that has been working in the country for several generations past, against caste and other disintegrating forces, has been the healthy unifying influence of the policy that has been followed by the British Government. That policy apparently has been reversed in the memorandum under consideration. Sectional schism and division which are kept under control under the wise policy of the British administration till now will appear with renewed vigour under the conditions laid down in the scheme. Caste is already a rigid institution in the country. Anything calculated to afford further rigidity to the caste system must be carefully eschewed by all and especially by the Government. To make caste system the basis of political franchise is, I submit, a grave blunder. The principle underlying the grouping of all non-Brahmin elements in the Presidency, which are divided and sub-divided into numerous sects under one head, is not clear. These sects and sub-sects are as widely apart from one another as the Brahmin and the Muhammadan or Christian. According to the reasoning adopted in the scheme, each caste of non-Brahmin community is entitled to separate representation. In fact, the principle adopted in the scheme for separate representation of castes and creeds is highly unsound, and leads to all sorts of untenable positions. There is also considerable practical difficulty in working out of the scheme." Were it not for limitations of space it would be easy to quote the opinions of many other leading non-Brahmin gentlemen of eminence and authority communicated to the Government of Madras at the time when the Minto-Morley Reforms were under discussion.

THE BOARD OF REVENUE.

3. The Madras Government, having ascertained the views of the public, abandoned the scheme and, before quoting its views, it may be just as well to refer to the views of the Board of Revenue, as coming from four experienced members of the Indian Civil Service of this Province. They say:—"The suggestion under immediate consideration certainly does not seem likely to be accepted with gratitude by those whom it was intended to placate. On the contrary, it is already viewed with intense and universal suspicion as a Machiavellian device intended to widen existing lines of cleavages, to check the supposed growing sense of nationality and to secure the position of the British Government by the application of the maxim 'divide and rule.' The Board cannot say that these suspicions are altogether unnatural. It recognizes that in the case of Muhammadans there are reasons for taking special steps to secure adequate representation of a special class, though rather on racial than on religious grounds, for the Muhammadans, whatever they may be historically, are practically a race. In regard to other castes or religions whom it is proposed to represent separately, the same necessity does not seem to exist.

"Apart from this and apart from the odium which Government will incur by seeming to set caste against caste, and to foster for selfish motives, differences which they have always professed to be anxious to obliterate, there seem to the Board to be insuperable difficulties in the proposed scheme."

The Madras Government.

4. The Government of Madras summarised public opinion and their own in the following terms:—"No part of the Government of India's proposal has been received with such general and decided disapprobation than this last suggestion. Apart from the very great practical difficulty of forming class electorates, the proposal to introduce the principles of race, caste and religious representation has been almost universally condemned." The proposals relating to class electorates did not therefore prove acceptable to the Madras Government in 1908. The conclusion was based upon the opinions of such men as the following, beside those of the eminent men already quoted:—Messrs. Dewan Bahadur Venkataramana Poi, Retired District Judge, N. Subrahmanyan, Administrator-General, the Zamindar of Pittapur, Zamindars of Seruguda Kallikota and Attigada, Surangi, the Honourable the Raja of Kurupam, and Dewan Bahadur P. Kesava Pillai. This part of the subject may very well be closed with the wise words of Mr. R. C. Dutt, C.I.E., an outsider to this Presidency, who said: "The new proposal is attended with danger. It will foment jealousies and hatreds, accentuate differences in daily life, and will be fruitful of disturbances in future. It will create aspirations among separate communities which can never be satisfied and spread discontent and foster unfavourable impressions about the fairness and justice of the ruling power. European Governments do not accentuate religious differences in these days by creating separate electorates for Protestants and Roman Catholics. The same wise impartiality can be pursued in India." The idea of communal representation was also denounced on the last occasion elsewhere as vigorously as in Madras. Clearly, therefore, the provision of representation of the various communities of the Hindu society which form the bulk of the population in several of the provinces is out of the question. It would be a most retrograde measure and would result in the disintegration of the national sentiment which has established itself throughout India and which has, to a great extent, obliterated the distinction between Hindus and Muhammadans, Parsees and Sikhs, the Punjabees and the Madrasees. A scheme of representation once introduced is very difficult to alter and any proposals now made should be consistent with the development of true national ideals. As far as possible, therefore, the attempt should be to develop a scheme of territorial representation where all the electors can be brought on one register and where men of all castes and creeds would have ample opportunities of developing their political talent and to serve their country to the best of their ability.

5. It may also be pointed out that the soundness of the views so forcibly expressed in 1908 has been fully recognised by the two illustrious authors of the Report on Indian Constitutional Reforms. In paras. 227 to 232 of the Report, they have dealt with the question of communal electorates and hrae come to the conclusion that any system of communal electorates is a very serious hindrance to the development of the self-governing principle. Any other conclusion is not possible.

Alleged Preponderence of the Brahmin Element in the Council.

6. It is urged that the experience gained since 1909 of the working of the Minto-Morley Reforms has established a case for a change towards communal electorates or communal representation. A great deal has been said about the disproportionately large number of seats held by the Brahmins in the Legislative Council and, as this point is again likely to be brought up by the advocates of communal electorates, it is perhaps better to make a brief reference to the facts. Dr. Nair and those who are associated with him in the movement known as the non-Brahmin movement have complained that ten members of the present Legislative Council are Brahmins, and this undue proportion of the Brahmin element has been urged as one of the main grounds on which separate electorates have been advocated. It is also suggested that, whatever the franchise and electoral arrangements the Brahmins are so influential as to command a very large number of seats in the reconstituted Councils.

Composition of the Council.

7. A brief reference to the composition of the Councils since the Minto-Morley Reforms is therefore necessary. In the Council which sat from 1909 to 1912 there were six Brahmin members, of whom two were nominated members, and in the period from 1912 to 1915, there were seven Brahmin members, of whom the Honourable Mr. Srinivasa Sastry was a nominated member. In the present Council there are 10 Brahmins. The gentlemen displaced in the elections of 1916 were Dr. T. M. Nair, whose place was taken by the Honourable Mr. T. Rangachary as the representative of the Madras Corporation. Dewan Bahadur Kesava Pillai was replaced by the Honourable Mr. Siva Rao. Mr. K. P. Raman Menon also lost his seat and the Honourable Mr. Sadasiva Bhat has taken his place. The Brahmin members of the present Council are:—

1.	The Honourable Mr. T. Rangachari (Madras Corporation).
2.	Do.	A. Suryanarayana Rao Pantulu (Vizagapatam and Ganjam districts).
3.	Do.	M. Ramachandra Rao Pantulu (Godavary, Kistna and Guntur districts).
4.	Do.	A. S. Kristna Rao Pantulu (Nellore, Cuddapah and Chittoor districts).
5.	Do.	P. Siva Rao Pantulu (Bellary, Anantapur and Kurnool districts).
6.	Do.	B. V. Narasimha Iyer (Salem, Coimbatore and Nilgiris districts).
7.	Do.	V. K. Ramanujachary (Tanjore and Trichinopoly districts).
8.	Do.	K. Rama Iyengar (Madura Tinnevelly and Ramnad districts).
9.	Do.	K. Sadasiva Bhat (South Canara and Malabar districts).
10.	Do.	K. R. V. Kristna Rao Pantulu (Northern Group of Zamindars) (now deceased).

The Honourable Mr. Rangachariar was elected by the 36 Commissioners of the Corporation, of whom seven were Brahmins, 14 were non-Brahmins, three were Muhammadans, and 12 Europeans. The competing candidate was Mr. P. Tyagaraja Chettiar, between whom and Dr. T. M. Nair there had then been considerable antagonism for some years. Dr. Nair represented the Corporation immediately before Mr. Rangachari and supported the candidature of Mr. Rangachariar as against his old antagonist Mr. Tyagaraja Chettiar. It is believed that the success of Mr. Rangachariar was mainly due to the support of Dr. Nair and his friends, who, having contributed to the return of Mr. Rangachari, now complain that the seat was captured by a Brahmin.

8. In regard to district representation the details regarding the names of the candidates and the number of votes secured by each are shown in the Appendix I. From these it will be seen that No. 3 and No. 10 were returned unopposed by the Godavary, Kistna, and Guntur districts, and by the Zamindars of the northern group respectively, and that there were no non-Brahmin candidates in the Tanjore and Trichinopoly group and also in the Nellore, Chittoor, and Cuddapah group (Nos. 4 and 7). In the former there were three Brahmin candidates and in the latter there were two Brahmin candidates. In regard to these four groups where there were no non-Brahmin candidates to contest the seats it cannot by any means be contended that the seats were captured by the Brahmins from the non-Brahmins.

The Ganjam and Vizagapatam group and the Malabar and South Canara group consist of two districts each and Mr. G. Raghava Rao of Berhampore and Rao Bahadur N. Subba Rao of Mangalore, two ex-members of the Madras Legislative Council, frequently complained to me that Ganjam was at a disadvantage against Vizagapatam and similarly South Canara against Malabar. The tendency of each district is to vote solid for its own candidate, and if Vizagapatam puts up a candidate the Ganjam candidate has practically no chance and similarly if Malabar votes solid for its own candidate, South Canara has no chance. This is mainly due to the inequality in the voting strength of these districts. Attention is invited to the figures in Appendix I, from which it will be seen that out of 359 voters in the Ganjam and Vizagapatam group 212 belonged to Vizagapatam and 147 to Ganjam. Similarly out of 324 voters in the Malabar South Canara group 271 belonged to Malabar and 84 belonged to the South Canara District.

It will also be seen from the Appendix I that in the Ganjam-Vizagapatam group there were three candidates from Ganjam (two Brahmins and one non-Brahmin) who secured 62, 28 and 66 votes respectively thus dividing the Ganjam votes among themselves. In Vizagapatam there were four candidates (all Brahmins) of whom the Honble. Mr. A. Suryanarayana Rao Pantulu secured 101 and Mr. P. T. Srinivasa Iyengar, an educationist, secured 35 votes, Mr. Appudu Pantulu (Dewan of Kurupam Zamindari) secured 21 and Mr. Venkata Rao secured 1 vote. There was only one non-Brahmin candidate in this group from the Ganjam District and votes were divided among the three candidates of the district. Mr. G. Raghava Rao from Ganjam represented the group from 1909 to 1912 but his success was then due to the votes in the Vizagapatam District having been divided by a multiplicity of candidates.

In Malabar and South Canara also the success of Mr. Sadasiva Bhat was mainly due to similar causes. He secured 105 votes but there were three Malabar candidates against him who respectively got 98, 65 and 26 votes each, The difference between the successful candidate and Mr. Raman Menon was only 7 votes If Malabar had put up only one candidate instead of three, Mr. Bhat would have had no chance whatever.

9. In the Kurnool, Bellary and Anantapur group also circumstances were similar to the above. Of the three candidates, the Honble. Mr. P. Siva Rao belongs to Bellary, Rao Bahadur S. V. Narasimha Rao belongs to Kurnool and Dewan Bahadur Mr. P. Kesava Pillai belongs to Anantapur. The total number of votes in the group were 263, and of these voters 95 belonged to Kurnool, 110 to Bellary, and 58 to Anantapur. The actual number of votes recorded for each candidate were :—79 for Mr. Siva Rao, 79 for Mr. Narasimha Rao, 70 for Mr. Kesava Pillai. Mr. Kesava Pillai was in the Council for three terms and the two other districts in the group had not their turn of electing a candidate from their districts and there was some feeling in favour of a change. In the Coimbatore, Nilgiris and Salem group also their were three candidates, one from Salem and two from Coimbatore, of whom one was a non-Brahmin. The figures show that out of a total of 296 votes, 108 appertain to Salem, 151 to Coimbatore, and the remainder to the Nilgiri District. The Coimbatore candidates divided the Coimbatore votes, and the Salem candidate secured 114 as against 108 for Mr. Ramalingam Chetty, of Coimbatore, who lost some of his strength on account of the plurality of candidates in his district. The last group that may be referred to is the Madura, Ramnad, and Tinnevelly group. In the group there were two Brahmin candidates both from Madura, and a non-Brahmin from Tinnevelly.

Mixed Motives in Elections.

10. I have dealt at this length with the details of the elections of 1916 as so much has been said about the capture of seats by the Brahmins and the same statements are likely to be made before the Committee. There are many mixed motives operating in these elections of which district patriotism is one. A Candidate, whether a Brahmin or a non-Brahmin, secures a certain number of votes from the members of his class by appealing to class sentiment; but this is by no means the sole determining factor. Continued and distinguished service in the Legislative Council, a previous record of public work in the districts, a reputation for ability and character, district patriotism, friendship and regard for the candidate, business connections are among the motives influencing elections and the analysis that I have given above will fully support the above observations. The cry of "Brahmins for Brahmins" and "Non-Brahmins for Non-Brahmins" has never figured prominently in the elections, and the services of public men of all castes and creeds have always been available to the people of all classes. As an instance, I may mention that one of the co-opted members for this Presidency in the Committees, Khan Bahadur Habibullah Sahib Bahadur, was returned for a term (1909–12) to represent the Nellore, North Arcot and Chingleput group; and though he was a Muhammadan, he carried the day in a constituency composed mainly of Hindus, and against his rival candidates of whom two were Brahmins and one was a non-Brahmin Hindu. He retired voluntarily for the next term on considerations of health, but I have no doubt that if he had sought the suffrages of the people he would undoubtedly have been again returned to the Council.

No Class Bias in the Legislative Council.

11. The alleged preponderance of the Brahmin element in the Legislative Council exists only when regard is had to the elected members of the Council, but is not a fact when the strength of the whole

Council is taken into consideration. As against 10 Brahmins there are 42 Non-Brahmins. Nor can it be said that such preponderance of the elective members in the existing system has been used by the Brahmin members to advance any class interests or to the detriment of any other class or caste. I have been a member of the Legislative Council almost ever since the inauguration of the Minto-Morley reforms, and I do not remember a single case where, either by resolution or interpellation, it was sought by any member of the Legislative Council to promote the interests of his own community or to injure the prospects of any other community. Almost all the subjects dealt with in the Council relate to the general well-being of the people, and a summary of the subjects so dealt with by way of resolutions from 1909 to 1918 will be found in Appendix II. The subjects have been summarised under the follow headings and attention is invited to the summary:—

(1) Legislative measures.
(2) Resolutions in the Council.
(3) Land Revenue—Settlement questions.
(4) Remissions and Penal Assessments.
(5) Economic condition of the ryot.
(6) Forests and the jails.
(7) Irregation topics.
(8) District Conferences.
(9) Education.
(10) Local Boards.
(11) Municipalities.
(12) The Depressed Classes.
(13) The Public Services.
(14) Financial criticism.

The proceedings have been singularly free from any class bias and the proposals made have always been actuated by the highest motives of securing the well-being of all communities and not that of any particular class or community.

Direct Franchise and Brahmin Preponderance.

12. While I do not believe that a Brahmin always voted for a Brahmin and a non-Brahmin for a non-Brahmin, the fears at present entertained may be due to the indirect system of election which has hitherto prevailed and the extremely small number of voters in each electorate, and also to the large size of the electorates consisting of 2 to 3 districts each. These evils are due to the present system and are bound to disappear with the introduction of a direct system of franchise and the constitution of district electorates. We shall assume that the franchise will be fixed for the rural and urban electorates as mentioned under and the result can be seen at a glance.

Rural Qualifications.

(I) A ryotwari pattadar or inamdar of lands with an annual rental value (under section 64 of the Madras Local Boards Act) of not less than Rs. 30.

(II) A "landholder" according to the definition of the term in the Madras Estates Land Act whose estate bears the annual rental value described above.

(III) A "tenant" under a landholder whose holding bears the above annual rental value of a Kanomdar (Malabar) the assessment on whose holding is not less than Rs. 30.

(IV) A person paying income-tax.

The persons thus qualified are landowners, ryotwari pattadars, tenants (occupancy) under landholders and kanom tenants in Malabar on the Rs. 30 basis and persons who pay income-tax.

Urban Qualifications.

A person who has resided or carried on business within the limits of a municipality situated in the district or within two miles of the boundary thereof, for at least 120 days in the aggregate in the year preceding that in which the electoral roll is published, and has paid in such preceding year to such municipality a tax of Rs. 5 or more under the tax on arts, trades, professions or callings or the tax on buildings and lands or both taxes together. On this basis there would be an enormous increase in the number of voters in each group. The figures are given hereunder:—

N.B.—These figures are taken from the statistics compiled by the Government.

It will be clear from the above statement that in the existing electorates the proportion of the number of Brahmins is considerably higher than under the qualifications referred to above, and it is not conceivable how it will be possible for Brahmin candidates to capture a large number of the seats in the electorates. Any apprehensions existing on this score must be set at rest on the basis of the statistics compiled by the Government and referred to above. A Brahmin candidate, under the proposed arrangements, can get into the Council only with the goodwill of a large majority of voters, and not by the support of his own class.

Communal Eectorates Illogical.

13. The proposals generally put forward by some of the leaders of the non-Brahmin movement now remain to be noticed, and before dealing with them it is perhaps necessary briefly to refer to this movement. This was started in 1916, sometime after the Legislative Council elections, by Dr. T. M. Nair, who was a member of the deputation of the South Indian Liberal Federation that waited upon the Secretary of State and the Viceroy. Under the above name a new political organisation was formed in that year leading to the developments in the next year connected with it, namely, the establishment of its organs, the "Justice" and the two vernacular newspapers, the "Andhraprakasika" and the "Dravidan." The South Indian Liberal Federation claimed to represent the views and to express the sentiments of the forty million non-Brahmins of this Presidency. This claim was soon afterwards repudiated by the Panchamas in various meetings and conferences, who resented the "ill-treatment of all the high class Hindus" whether Brahmin or non-Brahmin and who stated they would have nothing to do with either and would take care of their own interests. The Indian Christians similarly stated that they preferred to stand on their own legs through their own associations. Finally an influential section of the so-called non-Brahmins themselves repudiated the claims of the South Indian Liberal Federation to represent their views and the Madras Presidency Association was accordingly formed in 1917 for that purpose. Under the stimulus of the agitation of the South Indian Liberal Federation for communal electorates, many of the communities in Southern India came forward before the Secretary of State and the Viceroy and asked for separate communal electorates. Twenty-one addresses were formally presented and 38 addresses were received in this Presidency without formal presentation and while many of the communities asked for separate communal electorates, the only community that did not ask for separate communal representation was the Brahmin community. The proposal now put forward by the advocates of communal electorates is diametrically in opposition to what has been suggested in these addresses. They propose to club together all other Hindu communities except the Panchama and the Brahmin communities and to classify the Hindu community under (1) Brahmins, (2) caste Hindus other than Brahmins, (3) non-Brahmin non-caste Hindus (comprising the depressed classes). In the first place the constitution of electorates on this basis was never asked for and the proposal to club together all communities, who have asked for special electorates for themselves and to constitute a separate electorate for the only community that did not ask for it is to ignore the facts entirely. If separate communal electorates are politically inexpedient and if it is not practicable to constitute them there is no reason for setting up communal electorates as now proposed on an entirely fictitious classification of the Hindu community. The only ground urged is the desire to segregate the Brahmins from the general Hindu communities. Attention is invited to the details given in Appendix III as to the various castes in the Andhra and the Tamil country. To treat all these communities which do not interdine or intermarry with each other as one homogeneous community and to treat the Brahmin community alone as a separate entity by itself is absurd. There is as much or as little affinity between a Kshatria or a Kamma and Vellala and a Shanar and as between a Brahmin and any other community. In these circumstances, the claim put forward by a few of the aggressive leaders of this movement, to pose as the true representatives of the non-Brahmin communities, is preposterous.

14. Another ground on which I strongly deprecate the constitution of communal electorates on the basis suggested is such an arrangement would practically commit the interests of the very large numbers of agricultural labourers and the landless classes to the wealthy among the non-Brahmin caste Hindus. Much has been said about the Brahmin oligarchy but if an electorate composed of non-Brahmin caste Hindus is created, an oligarchy of the rich non-Brahmin Hindus in the Legislative Council must be the result. I feel almost certain that out of the 40 castes mentioned in appendices III (a) and III (b), the candidates for the Legislative Council would be drawn mainly from 3 or 4 of the more progressive non-Brahmin castes in the Andhra country and from a similar number of castes in the Tamil country. There are many agrarian questions in this Presidency in which the interests of the agricultural labourers and the tenants are at variance with the landed pattadars. There is absolutely no reason for regarding the non-Brahmin caste Hindus who form the marjority of the land-owning classes as a truer or safer representatives of the agricultural labourers, than the Brahmins.

Politically Inexpedient.

15. I also believe that apart from the general grounds referred to in the discussions of 1908 and in the report on Indian Constitutional Reforms it is inexpedient to recognise such a claim. The constitution of communal electorates for the Legislative Council will react on the work of the local bodies of this country. Already a claim has been set up on behalf of Muhammadans in Municipalities and Local Boards for representation by separate electorates and after the concession of communal representation, there is every likelihood of an agitation to the extension of the principle to local bodies. Such a step will be detrimental to the progress of local self-government in this Presidency. On all these grouuds I consider the constitution of communal electorates fatal to the development of responsible government in this country, and that the representation of all classes and creeds may be obtained, if need be, by a system of plural constituencies. I feel confident that the various communities in each district will thus find adequate representation.

The Muhammadans.

16. The present demand for communal representation is also sought to be supported by the example of the Muhammadan community to whom separate representation has been conceded. This matter received a great deal of attention when the Minto-Morley proposals were under discussion in Parliament. It must, however, be pointed out that one of the determining factors in the discussion was the promise made by Lord Minto, who committed himself in various ways at an early stage of the discussion in regard to Muhammadan representation and the Secretary of State had to stand by him to carry out the pledges made by the Viceroy. Lord Morley recognised that the Muhammadans are an important minority and should receive separate treatment; but he disliked religious discrimination and his political instincts were greatly averse to a sectarian vote in politics. He therefore proposed his scheme for electoral colleges by which proportional representation could be secured to the Muhammadans. He stated in the House of Lords that "to the best of his belief the plan of the Hindus and Muhammadans voting together in a mixed and composite electorate would have secured to a Muhammadan electorate whereever they were to be so minded, the chances of returning their own representatives in due proportion." He also went on to say that the political idea at the bottom of his proposal was the promotion of harmony and co-ordinated political action and that these views were entertained by men of very high Indian authority and experience at the time. The Government of India doubted, however, whether this plan would work and Lord Morley accordingly gave it up with great regret. Separate representation to an important minority is an accepted political principle. But will this justify us in extending this principle to Hindu communities merely because the composition of Hindu society has still in it disintegrating tendencies which are rapidly disappearing under the influence of Western education? The ideal to which the leaders of the non-Brahmin movement along with all other progressive men in the country look to is the fusion of all communities into a politically homogeneous whole. The perpetuation politically of the already existing social differences will be most unfortunate. This view has found very strong expression in 1908. I may refer to only one opinion among the many. It is that of one of the important and liberal minded Zamindars of this Presidency. The Rajah of Pittapur said :

> "Successive social and religious reformers have decried caste as clogging the wheels of progress and it is very strange as that, in a country whose watchword is forward, an enlightened government should think of not only accentuating sectarian differences but of pepetuating them.
> "A Hindu like the late Mr. Prakasa Mudaliar, a Muhammadan like the Hon'ble Nawab Syed Muhammad Bahadur, a Sudra like the late Mr. Jambulingam Mudaliar have been elected by all classes of people alike and won their esteem and gratitude."

The Raja condemned separate representation even to minorities like the Muhammadans:—"I am not in favour of special representation being granted to minorities for the simple reason that they have no special interest of their own apart from those of the people in general requiring separate legislation." However, the step having been taken, it cannot be retraced now, but this principle should not be further extended in, adopting a scheme of electoral machinery. Our aim must be to develop a homogeneous electorate in due time.

APPENDIX M.

PAPER handed in by Mr. Maung Pu, B.A., on behalf of the Burmese Deputation of the 19th August, 1919. (See Question 5287.)

A PLEA FOR BURMA.

Burma asks for equality of treatment with the other Provinces of India. Though holding on several points with the moderate party of the Indian National Congress, she is not criticising the provisions of the Government of India Bill. She is here simply to ask that whatever constitutional reform is granted to the other Provinces may be granted to her also. Give her that and she will be content.

It will be conceded that in legislation uniformity is desirable, and that when the constitution of a country is reformed, the reforms should apply through its whole extent, save only where good cause to the contrary exists. From the Government of India Bill three Provinces only are excepted: Baluchistan, the North-West Frontier Province, and Burma. The first two are small frontier Provinces, subject to quasi military rule. The reason for their exception is obvious. Why has Burma, prosperous, law-abiding and governed like any other of the great Provinces, been barred, with these small and special tracts, from the benefits of the Bill?

The following reasons are given in paragraph 198 of the Joint Report:—

(1) "The people belong to a different race in a different stage of political development, and its problems are altogether different." There are many different races in India, but this fact has not excluded any of them from the Bill. The second reason—"in a different stage of political development"—is vague; but vague as it is, it is the main reason for the exclusion of Burma. It will be dealt with separately.

The only different "problem" cited is that the throwing open of the public services more widely to Indians would result in the replacement of one alien bureaucracy by another. By this is meant that Indians would occupy many posts in Burma. But this danger, if danger there be, could be obviated by the simple expedient of restricting the service to persons born in Burma. There is no "problem" in the ordinary sense of the term. After all, the essential problem in Burma, as in India, is the transfer of power, by stages, from the bureaucracy to the people. As will be seen Burma differs only from India in that the stages might well be swifter.

(2) "The desire for electoral institutions has not developed." Whether or not these words were accurate when penned, they do not now apply. The Burmese are awake, keenly desirous to participate on equal terms in the boons given to other Provinces, anxious to develop their country and their civilisation on their own lines. Sir Reginald Craddock has since (December, 1918) admitted this:—

(3) "The Provincial Legislative Council has no Burmese elected element." That is not the fault of the Burmese but of their rulers.

(4) The last reason given is that a new Lieut.-Governor (Sir R. Craddock) had just assumed office. That reason of course no longer applies.

The Burmese, it is alleged, are in a different stage of "political development." How do they differ? The same general laws apply as in India. The Contract Act, Evidence Act, Penal Code, Criminal and Civil Procedure Codes, and practically all Indian laws hold in Burma exactly as elsewhere. The revenue system is the same, the executive system is the same, the judicial system is the same. In all the essentials of government, the Indian Government has dealt with Burma on precisely the same lines as the other great Provinces. Would it have done this had there been any marked difference in culture or development? In culture and in enlightenment the Burmese are fully equal to the Indians; in material wealth they are certainly superior, women, too, occupying a higher and freer position than elsewhere in Asia. Divergence where divergence exists is all in their favour, not against them.

Take now the reasons urged against all constitutional reform in India, or at least against the grant of anything but a very limited measure. It is not intended here to test those reasons, to weigh their force or to examine how far they are true to-day. They are merely stated as the reasons given by those who desire to maintain as far as possible existing conditions.

(1) Diversity of Race and Language.—In these respects the people of India admittedly differ even in the same provinces. Thus Madras is divided between Tamils, Telugus, Canarese and Malayalims. Burma is practically homogeneous. As the census shows, so greatly do the Burmese preponderate that the minor races such as Karens, or immigrants such as Indians and Chinese, offer no special problems. And few, indeed, of these peoples but speak well the Burmese language.

(2) Difference of Religion.—The past feuds between Hindus and Mohammedans are well known. In Burma the Buddhist religion—the most tolerant of all the great religions—is almost universal. In all the world there is no country with less religious bitterness or sectarian rancour. A kindly tolerance reigns supreme.

(3) Divisions of Caste.—In India this point needs no labouring. Burma, except for the few Indian immigrants, knows no caste. The structure of society—owing perhaps to the absence of family names—is essentially democratic, more democratic in fact than in the British Isles. There is less class distinction and more fraternity than in England.

(4) Absence of National Feeling for the Country as a Whole.—The Burmese have always been patriotic, have always cherished an intense love for their country, have taken a pride in themselves and their race. Nowhere does patriotism burn with a truer flame than in Burma.

(5) Illiteracy.—In Burma, thanks largely to the monastery schools, primary education is more widely diffused than in India. The proportion of those who can read and write is nearly four times as large as that in India, and is three times as large as the best Indian provinces, Bengal and Madras.

True, owing to the failure to create a University at Rangoon, the number of graduates is small. But there is at least as large a proportion as in India of capable, level-headed men, fit to grasp the problems and carry out the functions of representative government. That, and not the number of B.A.'s is the essential point.

(6) Sedition and Covert Rebellion.—The Burmese desire nothing more than to march to self-government under the British flag. That is admitted. Hear Sir R. Craddock, an alarmist on this point, as his speech on the Rowlatt Act abundantly testifies. "There has been no extremist party of Young Burmans; there has been no unbridled and defamatory Press; there have been, thank God! no signs of unrest among Burmese students and not even the slightest suspicion of anarchy." Since unrest and anarchy are the chief arguments of many against concessions to India, the claims of a people without them to self-government should have special weight. You cannot have it both ways.

To recapitulate. Do you fear religious feuds or warfare? Burma has none; in all the world no country enjoys such a divine tolerance. Is diversity of language the difficulty? Burmese carries you everywhere. Are you concerned for racial discord? The Burmese are on excellent terms with the minor races. Caste? It does not exist. Illiteracy? Primary education is more general in Burma than in other Provinces. Is sedition or anarchy the bugbear? We have the word of Sir R. Craddock that they do not exist in Burma.

The orders in paragraph 198 of the Joint Report that as soon as it was published (June, 1918), the Government of Burma should consider how far the proposals were applicable, have been disobeyed. Instead there has been put forward an entirely different scheme, containing provisions of an unusual and reactionary character, which scheme, it is contended, is no step forward towards self-government. The Burmese have been grievously disappointed. They are the more disappointed because Sir R. Craddock, although no friend to Indian aspirations, had himself noted the favourable conditions in Burma. "It can be confidently affirmed," he remarked, "that Burma is endowed with many advantages, notably in respect to those conditions which favour development on democratic lines. Thus she is free from those religious dissensions which militate against the co-operation of men of different creeds. Toleration of the scruples of others is a ruling tenet of her religion. There is an entire absence of caste, and no marked cleavage of social distinction or occupation exists. The man of humble birth in Burma has always been able to rise as high as his ability or his education might carry him . . . Burma undoubtedly offers a more promising field for self-government than does India at the present juncture."

For these reasons, indeed, and on account of the relative simplicity of the problems that will confront her new Legislative Assembly, Burma might claim, and rightly claim, a more generous measure of self-government than that accorded to India. Many apprehensions that have fettered the gift of self-government to India do not exist; others are weaker, mere shadows. But Burma does not ask for wider concessions or greater powers; she asks only to be treated with the same generosity as that meted out to the other Provinces. She comes to England and says: The table is spread and the feast set out for the peoples of India. Am I only to remain uninvited, a Cinderella amongst the great Provinces of the Indian Empire? I am loyal to your flag. Where my problems differ from those of India, they differ only in being more simple. My people are intelligent, capable of reasoned discussion and of sane conclusion. They are tolerant of others' opinions, charitable towards their neighbours, loved by all who dwell among them. Like India, I earnestly desire to govern myself; like India, I aspire to develop under the ægis of Britain my own civilisation. Fulfil your promise. Give me equal treatment with India. You will not be disappointed. I will not abuse your generosity, but will repay it in full with loyalty, with prosperity, and with a contented people.

APPENDIX N.

PAPER handed in by Mr. Sydney Loo—Nee, Tuesday, 19th August, 1919. (See Question 5290.)

To the Right Honourable Mr. EDWIN S. MONTAGU, P.C., His Majesty's Secretary of State for India.

The Humble Memorial af the NATIONAL KAREN ASSOCIATION, BURMA, on behalf of the KARENS OF BURMA

HUMBLY SHEWETH,

1. The Karens of Burma, availing themselves of the courteous invitation of the Head of the Government of Burma to make criticisms and suggestions on his proposals, duly and respectfully submitted their criticisms and suggestions on the framework of the Constitution recommended by the Local Government for the solution of the problem of Burma's political evolution.

A copy of the same is annexed hereunto and permission is sought for to treat it as part of this Memorial.

2. In paragraph 1 of the said "Criticisms and Suggestions," the Karens of Burma humbly hoped that their case might be submitted to the British Parliament for judicious consideration when the time arrived for Parliament to finally solve the problem of Burma's political evolution.

3. For the fulfilment of the aforesaid hope, seeing that the Head of the Burma Government has ignored the Karen rights, the National Karen Association, Burma, which exists mainly to stand between the British Government and the Karens, ever endeavouring to preserve unabated and untarnished in all Karens the spirit of healthy loyalty to the British Crown, has considered it expedient to despatch a Karen deputation to England to appeal to the wisdom and justice of British statesmanship.

4. Burma is inhabited by many different races, and of the indigenous races thereof, the Karens are the second race and as such the Karens claim that in any political programme aiming at Burma's evolution the Karens should not only precede the aliens in Burma, but also progress and advance step by step along with the Burmans.

5. Swayed by the firm belief that we possess men, educated, fit and enlightened, of our own race who can and will better represent us, voicing our own sentiments, wishes and aspirations, than leaders, if any, of a different race, we have all along been inspired by the doctrine of Self-help; or else, neither the Karen Deputation to Culcutta in December, 1917, nor that to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of Burma, at Maymyo, in October, 1918, nor yet this one direct to the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for India, would have had a "raison d'être."

6. With reference to the Craddock Scheme or Schemes, popularly so-called, we beg to reaffirm paragraphs 1 and 2 of our "Criticisms and Suggestions" already alluded to above.

It is, perhaps, superfluous to note that if the Karens are to figure only by nomination in the Constitutional Reforms in store for Burma, it, i.e., mere Nomination, in addition to initially nullifying "the energy and industry which the people and their representatives devote to fitting themselves for the task before them," will assuredly not hold out to the Karens any substantial hope for them:

(a) To secure representatives of independent, moral character;

(b) To be educated politically;

(c) To possess mutual ties of real binding force; and

(d) To aspire at all to any of the Presidentships (vide Craddock Scheme, paragraph 28); or, in the phraseology of the Indian Reforms Bill, Ministerships [vide Section 3 (2)]; and, generally, cf. "Report on Indian Constitutional Reforms," paragraph 324.

7. The Karens of Burma "are a distinct and (comparatively) important people; they supply a (fairly) gallant and valuable element to the Indian Army; but they are everywhere in a minority, and experience has shown that they are virtually unrepresented." In Burma, therefore, the Karens ask that they be favoured with "the system already adopted in the case of Mahommedans" in India, and proposed to be extended in India to the Sikhs in the Punjab.

8. That we are everywhere in a minority is not a surprising circumstance in the light of the fact that we Karens may properly be said to have had our national birth only at the advent of the British to Burma. But, whereas subject-peoples have, in rerum natura, first to prove their loyalty to the governing power before they can hope to claim any privilege, our case is characteristic in that our loyalty to the British Government is already admitted.

9. Paragraph 5 of our Memorial to His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor-General of India, and to the Right Honourable His Majesty's Secretary of State for India, conclusively shows that the move we made then and there was solely and wholly dictated by the dominating idea of self-protection, emphasised by the pardonable pride and convincing consciousness of race.

As Burke profoundly puts it:—"Circumstances (which with some gentlemen pass for nothing) give in reality to every political principle its distinguishing colour and discriminating effect."

Now, as the historic pronouncement of August 20, 1917, is going sacredly and without undue delay to shape and form our destinies, we Karens entreat that we may graciously be permitted, in our desire for advance, actuated by the British boon of Education, to participate substantially, ab initio, in the political programme fashioned out for Burma.

10. Sir, the situation in Burma for some years has been creating an uncomfortable fear in the Karens that new Pharaohs have arisen that knew not Joseph.

We no not desire to be politically inferior to the other races in Burma, and this aspiration, we hold, is both natural and legitimate.

We need the fostering care of the British Government to work out the highest ends of our national existence.

Accordingly, we hope and pray that our Mission to the fountain of British justice and sympathy will mark an epoch in our history, treasured by us, exalted by our children, and glorified by our children's children.

WHEREFORE the Karens of Burma, in humbly and dutifully appealing to the British character for fair dealing and justice, earnestly pray, in the weighty words, mutatis mutandis, of The Right Honourable Mr. H. A. L. Fisher, M.P., that England may never "alienate the patriotism of the loyal population of Burma."

And shall ever Pray.

Signed on behalf of the Karens of Burma,

SYDNEY LOO-NEE, Delegate,
Karen Deputation to England.

London:
The 8th day of August, 1919.

To the Honourable Mr. WALTER FRANCIS RICE, C.S.I., I.C.S., Chief Secretary to the Government of Burma, the Secretariat, Rangoon.

Criticisms and suggestions on the framework of the Constitution recommended by the Local Government for the solution of the problem of Burma's political evolution by THE NATIONAL KAREN ASSOCIATION, BURMA, on behalf of THE KARENS OF BURMA.

SIR,

On behalf of the Karens of Burma we, the president and members of the National Karen Association, Burma, fully accept the generous invitation conveyed in liberal terms in paragraph 40 of what is popularly known as the Craddock Scheme and express ourselves as hereunder :—

1. The proposed scheme of constitutional reforms for Burma gives invidious preference of the claims of aliens over those of ourselves in our own fair land. The Karens are the sons of the soil, possessing distinct characteristics and holding defined sentiments. We are the second race in Burma, and thus we venture to maintain that our rights and privileges are superior and precedent to those of the aliens, such as the Indians (both Hindus and Muhammadans) and the Chinese. We, therefore, humbly hope that this phase of the problem will be judiciously considered in the final scheme for Burma's political evolution decided upon by Parliament.

2. Some unsettled provision is intended for us in paragraph 23 of the proposed scheme under review. While we appreciate this mark of recognition we beg to submit with due deference that the educative element is sadly missing from the policy purported to be pursued, and thus we are virtually denied progress and advancement step by step along with other races, communities and interests.

"Unless the political changes now in contemplation are accompanied by an educational campaign directed to awaking in all classes alike . . . a sense of citizenship, disaster will certainly result."

If the Karens are to be educated at all they wish to be taught "that in future they must bring their troubles to the notice of an elected representative—further, that they have the power to compel his attention."

As in the training up of ministers, so, too, in the training up of responsible representatives, direct responsibility is, we humbly submit, absolutely essential.

It is probably apprehended that if the Karens are given the right of securing representation by election, which is the most educative method, it is probable, or rather possible, that they will commit mistakes.

As it has been profoundly remarked, "Capacity can come only by the exercise of responsibility." Further, "the mistakes made are the price which the people must inevitably pay for their education in self-government." And the Karens are willing to pay this inevitable price for their political education.

3. We pause here to state in parenthesis that mass education, as advocated by us in paragraph 4 of our Memorial to His Excellency the Viceroy and the Secretary of State, will bridge many gulfs and be a lasting monument of British Statesmanship.

4. In view of the observed fact: "The more enlightened and educated Karens are too scattered in the various districts of Lower Burma to be assured of representation in the ordinary way," we respectfully suggest that measures be adopted to grant us a general electorate for the whole of Burma, charged with the Karen interests in every phase and form.

As to the number of the representatives of our own nationality, six, the number prayed for in paragraph 8 of our Memorial to His Honour at Maymyo, will, we believe, suffice to represent the Karen interest in the Provincial Legislature.

In the event, however, of this number, in process of time, proving insufficient to adequately represent our interests, we pray that any additional number may be nominated.

Albeit we claim six elected representatives, regard being had to the fact that representation in the ordinary way for the Karens will be out of the question (except in very, very rare instances) by virtue of our diffusion throughout the province, we suggest that, provided six be deemed too large a number, four seats may be reserved for the Karens of Burma—one each for the divisions of Pegu, Irrawaddy and Tenasserim, and one for Rangoon, Syriam and Insein.

5 We beg to state that we Karens have contributed our loyal services in response to the Empire's Call' and a generous recognition by the British Government of our legitimate aspirations will ever keep alive the healthy spirit of loyalty in the Karen breast.

APPENDIX O.

PAPER handed in by Messrs. V. Chakkarai Chetty, B.A., B.L., and P. Chenchiah, B.A., M.L., Tuesday, 19th August, 1919. (See Question 5266.)

THE MADRAS PRESIDENCY ASSOCIATION.

MEMORANDUM presented by the delegates of the Madras Presidency Association to the Joint Committee on the Government of India Bill.

The delegates of the Madras Presidency Association are Messrs. V. Chakkarai Chetty, B.A., B.L., B. P. Wadia, and P. Chenchiah, B.A., M.L. Mr. V. Chakkarai Chetty is the Official Secretary of the Association. Mr. P. Chenchiah is a member of the Executive Council, and Mr. B. P. Wadia is an ordinary Member. They have been authorised by resolutions passed by the Executive Committee to place before this Committee the views of the Association on the question of Indian Constitutional Reforms. Mr. V. Chakkarai Chetty and Mr. P. Chenchiah have also been elected as delegates by the Congress, and Mr. B. P. Wadia is a delegate of the National Home Rule League. As the views of the National Congress and the National Home Rule League have already been placed before the Committee it is not proposed to deal at length with the general questions of political reforms. The Madras Presidency Association represents a considerable section of the non-Brahmanas of the Presidency, and it includes among its members not only non-Brahmana Hindus but also men belonging to non-Hindu religions, who fall under the general category of non-Brahmanas. The President of the Association is Dewan Bahadur P. Kesava Pillai, who was for two terms a Member of the Madras Legislative Council, and is well known for his services in the political and social fields. Among the Vice-Presidents are men who are prominent in the commercial life of Madras and in the politics of the Presidency. The ordinary members and secretaries are drawn from all ranks of Society, and are fully representative of a very large section of the non-Brahmanas of the Presidency. The Association has several branches all over the Presidency, and it has held conferences in Madras, Trichinopoly, Tanjora, Madura, Tinnevelly, Bezwada, and other important centres in the Presidency. It was started with the main object of safeguarding the interests of non-Brahmanas without prejudice to the larger political interests of the country, and with a view to work harmoniously with other sections of the Indian people. The President and other office bearers of the Association have been Congressmen along with Dr. T. M. Nair and other leaders of the South Indian Liberal Federation. When, in 1917, the South Indian Liberal Federation, formed with the ostensible purpose of promoting non-Brahmana interests, began to attack the National Congress and adopt a course of conduct prejudicial to National unity, it was felt by the leaders of the Madras Presidency Association that they should rally round the Indian National Congress, of which they had long been members, and that the claim of the South Indian Liberal Federation to represent the entire non-Brahmana community should be contradicted. It became necessary to expose such pretensions, and to give expression to the real non-Brahmana opinion in the country. The South Indian Liberal Federation thought fit to carry on a systematic campaign of vilification of the Brahmanas of the Presidency, supporting its propaganda by what can only be characterised as gross exaggerations, half truths and untruths. The better section of the community felt that the time had come in the interests of truth and fair play to speak out its mind. It will be thus seen that the object of the Association is to safeguard the interests of the non-Brahmanas without giving rise to communal warfare. The Association appeared before the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for India and His Excellency the Viceroy when they visited Madras in 1917, and also submitted its views before the Franchise and Functions Committees.

Since the question of the social relations subsisting between Brahmanas and non-Brahmanas in the Presidency has been much canvassed before this Committee, and since several statements made by the representative of the South Indian Liberal Federation are totally unfounded and are calculated to leave an erroneous impression, it is necessary to contravert them in some detail:—

(1) The first statement that has been made before this Committee which requires repudiation is that the Brahmana is playing the part of a tyrant. A lurid picture was drawn of the abject and miserable condition of the Panchama, and the Brahmana was brought in as the villain of the plot whose only pleasure in life is to torture the poor Panchama and keep him in perpetual bondage. Deeply sympathetic as the delegates are with the Panchama, and anxious as they are to safeguard his interests, they cannot allow this unfounded imputation to remain uncontradicted. The exact position of each caste in the social polity of the Hindu community is the result of forces which have been operating for centuries and for which the responsibility cannot be traced to any particular caste or source. Moreover, the non-Brahmana shares equally with the Brahmana the responsibility for the condition of the Panchama. In the past many of the social movements which have for their object the social and religious amelioration of the Panchama were led by Brahmana leaders, like Ramanuja in the middle ages, and during the last century by Raja Ram Mohum Roy, and Pundit Vidysager and Swami Dyanand Sraswati in the North and by Pundit Veerasalingam in the South. It is within the personal knowledge of the delegates that in all the social service organisations in the Presidency which actually interest themselves in and work among the Panchamas the Brahmanas have been most conspicuous. It will be of interest to note that the Social Reform Association, which aims in Madras at the welding together of the different castes, is presided over by a Brahmana, the Advocate-General of Madras, the successor of Sir C. Sankara Nair, and the Madras Social Service League, which was founded by Mrs. Whitehead, the wife of the Lord Bishop of Madras, and which carries on work in the slums, has for its President now a Brahmana. From these facts it can be seen that this charge is as unfounded as it is ungenerous.

(2) In this connection it was stated by one of the witnesses that the Varnasrama Dharma movement and the Home Rule League have common leaders who are mainly Theosophists. In the first place, it may be stated that the Varnasrama movement is an insignificant and obscurantist movement which can never be taken as an index of the social feeling in the country. Some of the most vigorous and determined opponents of the movement are to be found among the Brahmanas, among whom may be mentioned the name of one of the Brahmana Judges of the High Court of Madras, a staunch Theosophist. Not a single prominent Home Rule Brahmana leader in Madras has identified himself with this reactionary movement. Mrs. Besant and her paper "New India" have dissociated themselves from the movement. It is also noteworthy that some of the leaders of the Varnasrama movement have attacked the Home Rulers as anti-Hindu for their desire to place political and national welfare above caste distinction. The statement that caste feeling is on the increase is so obviously at variance with the impartial testimony of European and Indian observers that it can only be regarded as an argument of despair.

(3) Another charge that has been levelled against him before the committee is that the Brahmanas occupy important positions in official life, and take advantage of their power to influence elections. This statement rests on mere assertion, and no evidence has been adduced to substantiate it. Under the rules of Government service no Government servant can take part in politics, and he can only do so at very grave risk. This fact alone would operate as an effective check on any inclinations in that direction. It is also remarkable that as far as they are aware no complaint has been made on this ground before the authorities, though petitions to set aside elections by defeated candidates have been made on other grounds.

(4) The curious contention was urged that Brahmanas, as members of the legal profession, exercise undue influence on the non-Brahmanas. It is very difficult to see how the fact of a man belonging to the legal profesion could put into his hand a weapon of political oppression. The connection sought to be established is too remote to be intelligible.

(5) The statement that the Brahmana alone stands in the way of social progress is not borne out by facts. Mr. Basiu's Bill for validating civil marriages was opposed not only by Brahmanas but by non-Brahmanas also, amongst whom may be mentioned one of the leaders of the South Indian Liberal Federation. Mr. Sastry's Puberty Marriage Bill was very strongly opposed by Brahmanas and non-Brahmanas alike.

It is not necessary to have recourse either to exaggerations or misrepresentations to account for the present position of the non-Brahmana classes. Two main reasons may be assigned for their failure to take their due share in the public life of the Presidency. The Brahmana, who has a traditional aptitude for intellectual pursuits, has taken the fullest advantage of the educational facilities offered by the Government, and owing to this distaste for agricultural and commercial life has taken largely to what are called the learned professions and the Government service, which play in the present system of British government in the country an important part, whereas the non-Brahmana, unwilling to occupy positions of subordination in official life, was content to pursue his ancestral callings in commerce and industry. When they did take to education they distinguished themselves, as in the case of Mr. Ramganatha Mudaliar, Professor of Mathematics in the Madras Presidency College; Rangiah Naidu, a lawyer and member of the Madras Legislature Council; Mr. Thumboo Chetty, an Indian Christian, who was Chief Justice of the Mysore High Court, and several others. As stated by Sir C. Sankara Nair, who would undoubtedly be regarded as the leader of the non-Brahmanas of the Presidency, in his minute of dissent to the Despatch of the Government of India on the Division of Functions by the Southborough Committee: "In the earlier years of the Congress the non-Brahmana leaders were invited by officials to stand aloof from it, and, if possible, to denounce it as inimical to their interests. They resolved to disregard the advice." So some of the most prominent among the Madras Congressmen were non-Brahmanas, and the present somewhat backward condition is almost entirely due to their not pressing forward in education. With the growing self-consciousness of the non-Brahmanas it may be confidently asserted that they will regain their dominant position in public and official life. In the second place, the Anglo-Saxon methods of administration and the peculiar conditions of political life called into prominence leaders who possessed the power of persuasion. Every reform, and even minor concessions, had to be extracted from an unwilling bureaucracy that had to be convinced by arguments. This accounts for the part played by the legal profession, which is particularly fitted to fill this role. It is the legal professions and not the distinction of being a Brahmana that accounts for the large part which he is alleged to have taken in the leadership of the country. Now, the mercantile and commercial classes are beginning to take part in political life, and with their increasing importance it will not be possible for the lawyer to play the distinguished part that he has done in the earlier years of constitutional struggle in India. It may be noteworthy that almost all the bigger and smaller merchants and traders in Madras are in favour of reforms, including fiscal autonomy, and a good number of them are members of the Presidency Association.

The delegates have tried to refute some of the misrepresentations made before the Committee, and to show the true causes of the present position of the non-Brahmanas of the Presidency. As practical politicians, they cannot, however, overlook the fact that certain sections of the non-Brahmanas want their interests to be safeguarded. It is therefore essential to the harmony and whole-hearted working of the Reforms to devise some method whereby their misapprehensions may be allayed. It is in view of this fact that political associations affiliated to the Congress in Madras have agreed to the representations of the non-Brahmanas in general electorates. Any attempt to get behind this compact will be regarded as a breach of political faith. Two solutions have been offered by extreme parties which it is not expedient to recommend. (1) The first is the creating of separate electorates for the non-Brahmana Hindus. In addition to the arguments against communal electorates mentioned in the Joint Report we may mention the following objections, strongly felt by the non-Brahmanas whom the Association represents: (1) National solidarity is above all consideration of caste, and any method of helping the non-Brahmanas which carries the grave danger of isolating him will in the long run lead to his own detriment. (2) The non-Brahmana Hindus are not a homogeneous unit but composed of divergent castes. The recognition of separate electorates will lead to the demand of caste electorates by some of the important non-Brahmana castes. This will lead to a political situation which it will be impossible to deal with. (3) The creation of special electorates will necessarily restrict the number of non-Brahmanas that may get into the Council, and will deprive him of the influence that he may otherwise exercise in the general electorates. Whereas in the scheme that is proposed by the Association, a certain number of seats is fixed as a maximum for the Brahmanas. Non-Brahmanas will be at liberty to contest in all the general electorates. The Association is therefore distinctly in favour of this. The contention is strengthened by the fact that during the discussions under the Minto-Morley Scheme, the considered opinion of the important leaders of the non-Brahmana Community was against the formation of separate communal electorates, and nothing has happened in the interval to justify a change.

The other alternative of ignoring altogether the desire for safeguarding the interests of the non-Brahmanas will be deplored as a political blunder. A via media has therefore to be discovered which will satisfy the non-Brahmanas generally.

After giving careful consideration to the subject and viewing it from all aspects, the Madras Presidency Association has come to the conclusion that the best method would be to create plural constituencies with a general electoral roll and fix a limit to the number of Brahmanas to be returned. The following is the full text of the resolution that was passed at the Second Annual Conference of the Association :—

This Conference recommends to the Franchise Committee that the Members of the Legislation Council of the Presidency be fixed at 200 and the distribution of seats be as follows :—

Nominated Members of the Government	20
Mahomedans	28
Indian Christians	7
European Trade and Commerce (including Planters)	6
Indian Trade and Commerce	6
Graduates of the Madras University	3
Uriya Tamindars	1
Uriyas	1
Tamindars other than Uriyas	4
Landholders : North	2
South	2
Malehar	1
Backward classes to be nominated by elected representatives if election by them is not possible	8

108 Members to be elected by 12 groups of general electorates, each group returning 9 members, of whom not more than 2 should be Brahmanas.

With regard to franchise, all those who pay Rs.5 and over as land revenue or as tax per annum should be entitled to vote.

The Government of India, in the Despatch on the Franchise Committee's Report, in paragraph 26, while disapproving the creation of separate electorates for non-Brahmanas, makes the following suggestion : "We share the committee's main views regarding the undesirability of forcing a separate electorate on the Brahmanas, but we are anxious to consult the Madras Government in regard to the reservation of non-Brahmana seats in plural constituencies. It seems to us that the constituencies might be arranged in such a way that 30 out of the 61 non-Mahomedan seats could be reserved for non-Brahmanas, while both parties might contest the remaining seats without restriction." It will be seen that there are two important differences between the scheme proposed by the Government of India and that by the Association. In the first place the Government of India would fix a minimum for non-Brahmanas whilst we fix a maximum for the Brahmanas. In the second place the Government of India would throw open thirty-one seats to Brahmanas as well as non-Brahmanas, whereas in our Scheme a restriction is placed in all the twelve electorates. The Government of India has not indicated on what principle it is going to create general electorates which have to return only non-Brahmanas. We foresee great difficulties in making out such a distinction.

It is proposed, in conclusion, to make a few suggestions with regard to the General Reform Scheme :—

1. The Association strongly recommends that the Franchise should be lowered at least in urban areas, so as to render it possible for wage-earners who earn between Rs.15 and Rs.20 to have a vote.
2. The Association strongly supports the Franchise for women.
3. The Association strongly supports the demand for the introduction of the principle of transferred and reserved subjects in the Central Government, and the grant of fiscal autonomy.

MEMORANDUM supplied by Mr. V. S. Srinivasa Sastri at the direction of the Committee and received on 19th August, 1919.

The Education Codes of the various Local Governments in India contain a conscience clause for European and Anglo-Indian schools, but none for Indian schools. This is felt to be a grievance, and an attempt is now on foot to get it remedied. The agitation is now perfectly legitimate, and there is no reason why, if properly conducted, it should not succeed.

My point in the evidence I gave on the 13th instant was that Clause XI. of the Instrument of Instructions, as drafted by the Government of India (see pages 64 and 65, Views of the Government of India upon the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees) is couched in such stringent terms that, if narrowly interpreted, they might preclude such an agitation being disposed of on its merits. The clause runs : "The Governor is required to secure that the interests of existing educational institutions maintained or controlled by religious bodies are duly protected in the event of any changes of educational policy affecting them adversely." In my humble judgment the provision goes too far; all that missionary authorities may properly ask is that no changes adverse to them should be introduced without due consideration or without due notice to them. The Feetham Committee had this very matter before them when they considered the transfer of education to popular control. They recommended that the Governor be required "to take care that no change of educational policy affecting adversely Government assistance afforded to existing institutions maintained or controlled by religious bodies is adopted without due consideration." I contended that this language is preferable to that adopted by the Government of India. It would be unfortunate indeed if an agitation, which is now legitimate, should be liable under the reform scheme to be choked off by a stringently-worded Instruction to the Governor of a Province

This contention has no reference to the precise form or wording of the conscience clause. Still, it may possibly be of use to give two forms of it :

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT, 1870.

It shall not be required, as a condition of any child being admitted into or continuing in the school, that he shall attend, or abstain from attending, any Sunday school, or any place of religious worship, or that he shall attend any religious observance or any instruction in religious subjects in the school or elsewhere, from which observance or instruction he may be withdrawn by his parent, or that he shall, if withdrawn by his parent, attend the school on any day exclusively set apart for religious observance by the religious body to which his parent belongs.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1872.

Every public school, and every school subject to inspection and in receipt of any public money as hereinbefore provided, shall be open to children of all denominations, and any child may be withdrawn by his parents from any instruction in religious subjects and from any religious observance in any such school; and no child shall in any such school be placed at any disadvantage with respect to the secular instruction given therein by reason of the denomination to which such child or his parents belong, or by reason of his being withdrawn from any instruction in religious subjects. The time or times during which any religious observance is practised or instruction in religious subjects is given at any meeting of the school for elementary instruction shall be either at the beginning or at the end or at the beginning and at the end of such meetings, and shall be specified in a table approved of by the Scotch Education Department.

APPENDIX Q.

PAPER handed in by Mr. Maung Pu, B.A., on behalf of the Burmese deputation on 19th August, 1919. (See Question 5287.)

A SCHEME OF REFORMS FOR BURMA.

1. GOVERNOR.—Burma wants a Governor sent direct from England, and members of Indian services should not be eligible for this post.

2. EXECUTIVE COUNCIL.—The Executive Council should consist of one official (European) and two Burman Ministers, selected by the Governor from among the elected members of the Legislative Council. The Ministers shall hold office so long as they retain the confidence of the Legislative Council.

3. LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.—There should be 100 members, of which four-fifths should be elected and one-fifth nominated.

4. ELECTED MEMBERS should represent (1) pure urban areas, (2) rural areas, and (3) special electorates, as follows :—

5. URBAN AREAS like Rangoon, Mandalay, Moulmein, Bassein, Akyab, Henzada, Prome, Pegu, Myingyan, and Pakokku, &c., will get separate seats. The total number of seats will be about 20.

6. RURAL AREAS.—Small urban areas should go along with rural areas. In rural areas the districts which are of unwieldy size should be divided into one-member constituencies for effective representation. The total number of seats will be about 55.

7. SPECIAL ELECTORATES will consist of University (1), Burma Chamber of Commerce (1), and European community (2).

8. NOMINATED MEMBERS.—Five non-officials and 16 officials. There is no necessity to reserve seats for experts. The distribution of members will be as follows :—

Elected (urban 20 and rural 55)	75
Elected (special electorates)	4
	—	79
Nominated (non-officials)	5
Nominated (officials)	16

The President and Vice-President of the Council should be elected by the Legislative Council from among its elected members.

9. FRANCHISE.—In Burma we have ready-made register in the form of capitation and Thathamada assessment rolls and municipal franchise. Hence all that is necessary to do is to allow all persons of 21 years and of sound mind, who pay capitation or Thathamada, or who are specially exempted from these taxes in rural areas, and municipal voters in urban areas, to vote. The total voters under this scheme will be between one and two millions. There should be no residential qualification for the candidates to the Legislative Council.

Women already enjoy municipal franchise, and we want to give them political franchise also. They are fit to enjoy it.

10. FUNCTIONS.—Excepting (1) foreign and political, including administration of the Shan States, frontier districts, and hill tracts, (2) army and marine, (3) police, (4) appointments and discipline, (5) law and justice, (6) ports, (7) land revenue (except capitation and Thathamada); all other subjects, including the Budget, should be transferred to popular control.

11. CONTRIBUTION TO THE COST OF THE CENTRAL GOVERNMENT.—Thathamada and capitation taxes are peculiar to Burma only, and as such they should be deducted from the total provincial revenue when determining the amount of contribution to be made by Burma towards the cost of the Central Government.

12. OTHER MATTERS.—As regards other matters we claim to have the same status as that given to the United Provinces at least.

MEMORANDUM handed in by B. V. Jadhav, Vice-President of the Maratha League and the Deccan Ryots' Association, on 19 August, 1919. (See Question 5277.)

I am specially deputed by the Deccan Ryots' Association and the Maratha League, both having headquarters at Poona, to give evidence before this Joint Committee on behalf of the Marathas and other backward communities, and have come here for that purpose only.

I am an M.A., LL.B. of the Bombay University. I was for the first three years General Secretary of the Maratha Educational Conference. I was President of the Second Maratha Political Conference, which met at Nasik, in the Bombay Presidency, last year, and I was deputed by it to give evidence before the Southborough Committee in their behalf. I am Vice-President of the Maratha League, and also of the Deccan Ryots' Association. At Kolhapur I worked for many years as district magistrate and additional sessions judge, and at present I am chief revenue officer and a councillor of the State. I am an inhabitant of Mahad, in the Kolaba district of the Bombay Presidency, and have got landed interest in that Taluka.

Since the time I gave evidence before the Southborough Franchise Committee my personal views and those of the leaders of the Maratha community have undergone a good deal of change.

On behalf of the Marathas and other allied communities I beg to claim 30 per cent. of the non-Mahomedan rural seats in the southern and central divisions and in the district of Thana, in the northern division of the Bombay Presidency, and two seats in the City of Bombay out of the six allotted to it.

These seats are to be reserved in plural member constituencies, and where a district has got only one seat it may be joined with its neighbouring district for electoral purposes. These communities ought to be allowed to compete in the electorates with others in regard to the other seats.

These communities form about 80 per cent. of the total population. They supply the fighting and labour corps in the army, and practically the whole of the labour in the new industrial areas. They are the landed peasantry, and supply agricultural labour, and the important artisan class is from them. They pay the major portion of the land revenue. From them come the hereditary village headmen, who symbolise the government of every village. They were also the old district officers, and once formed the aristocracy in the Deccan, and they were the founders of tha Maratha Empire. These communities supplied the best generals to the Maratha army and admirals to the then Maratha navy. But they could not stand their ground against the Brahmans, who obtained supreme power under the Peshwas.

Being hereditary agriculturists and soldiers they were not as keen about learning as the Brahman and other advanced communities, and naturally lagged behind them in the educational race. They could not take advantage of the educational facilities offered by the British rule, and have therefore been in the leading strings of the advanced communities. In the peaceful times the distance continued to increase, so that these communities are now nowhere in spite of their numbers. In municipal and local board elections their success is meagre, if any, and none of them had yet the courage even to seek election to the legislative council of the local government.

Primary and secondary education are questions of more vital interest to these communities than to other advanced ones. Lack of interest in village sanitation directly affects their health. The housing problem in villages and industrial centres remains untouched. The question of wages of the industrial and agricultural labourers has not received due attention, and is responsible to a very large extent for the poverty of these classes. Land legislation will have direct incidence from their point of view. Forest laws hit these classes with a peculiar force. Excise policy contributes to a greater extent to their degradation and misery. These and other industrial and economic problems may present opposite points of view to the advanced and backward communities.

In fact, their social evolution and religious independence mean conflict in interest and ideals. All these factors make out, I humbly venture to submit, a strong case for their representation by their own men.

In support of the foregoing remarks in this Memorandum, I beg to refer to the opinions expressed by eminent gentlemen and bodies. The Report on Indian Constitutional Reform says: "There shall be in each province an enlarged legislative council . . . with a substantial elected majority, elected by direct election on a broad franchise, with such communal and special representation as may be necessary."

The case for the Marathas has been fully stated in the first view given by the Government of Bombay in the note prepared by them for the consideration of the Franchise Committee (vide page 135 Southborough Report, vol. 1): "They (the Marathas) are so subject to Brahmin influence that, even where they command a majority of votes, they will be unable to return their own representatives. At the same time, their number and importance make it desirable that they should be represented. This representation can only be secured either by communal electorates or by reserving seats for them in general electorates as suggested in para. 232 of the Report, or by some similar device. It is feared that there may be serious discontent if the aspirations of the Marathas are not met in some way."

The remarks of the Honourable Mr. Carmichael, Member of the Executive Council, Bombay, are very pertinent (vide page 151 Southborough Report, vol. 1): "They represented a very large portion of the population in the Deccan and the Konkan. They were the fighting class of the Presidency and they supplied the labour force in the big industrial cities. They maintained their connection with their villages, and, in his opinion, they should have representation in their rural constituencies. Owing to Brahmin influence, a Maratha candidate would not ordinarily have a chance of election even though the Marathas might be in a majority, and he did not think that cumulative voting would help them."

The Southborough Committee in their Report, page 19, say: "A similar claim (communal representation) on similar grounds was urged by the Marathas and allied castes in the Deccan and Southern Divisions of the Bombay Presidency. The representatives of this class were divided in their recommendations, some urging the necessity of separate electorates and the others proposing the reservation of seats in plural-member constituencies. Two of our members (Mr. Hailey and Mr. Hogg) would have been glad to grant special electoral facilities to them by the reservation of a single seat in each of the six districts where they preponderate. They consider that this guarantee would secure to them an assured minimum of representation, of which, otherwise, they would be uncertain, owing to the ascendancy of the Brahman. They believe that if this representation were once secured, the community would be encouraged to take its share in the political life of the province from which it might otherwise be excluded."

The Government of India have, in paragraph 26 of their despatch on Southborough Reports, supported the claims of the Madras non-Brahmans, and in paragraph 27 admit "that it becomes extremely difficult to resist the claims of the Marathas in Bombay."

I beg to bring to the notice of this Honourable Committee the considered opinion of responsible public bodies whose voice deserves close attention.

The Deccan Sabha of Poona have passed a resolution urging the necessity of reserving a certain number of seats for the members of the backward classes in the Bombay Deccan The Sabha is a political association carrying on its work on moderate and non-sectarian lines. It is not an anti-Brahman body, and includes in its membership a large number of distinguished Brahmans, who are responsible for its resolutions. The Sabha instituted an inquiry into the question of the representation of the Lingayat, Jain, Maratha, and other allied communities in the central and southern divisions of the Bombay Presidency. The leaders of these communities were invited and heard, and a settlement was ultimately arrived at that they should be given some reserved seats in plural-member constituencies.

In support of this view of the Sabha it may be useful to quote the opinion of the late Mr. Gokhale, who was the guiding spirit of the Sabha. In paragraph 3 of Gokhale's views on provincial autonomy he writes: "Here and there a member may have to be given to communities like the Lingayats, where they are strong."

The question of the non-Brahman Hindus of Madras and the backward communities of the Bombay Deccan was very anxiously gone into by the Special Session of the All India Moderate Conference held in Bombay in 1918, and presided over by Babu Surendra Nath Bonnerjea. It passed a resolution recommending the reservation of seats in plural-member constituencies.

Reservation of seats has been thus recommended by eminent authorities, and it is not open to the theoretical and practical objections that can be brought against communal electorates. It violates no sound principle, and is evidently a temporary expedient. Such an arrangement will allay the true fears of the backward classes, including the Marathas, whose historical position and loyalty and importance require special recognition. It will also tend to the successful and smooth working of the reforms.

In conclusion, I once more beg to submit that 30 per cent. of the total number of non-Mahomedan rural seats and two in the City of Bombay should be reserved for these communities. The last ground which would support my request is that such reservation, besides giving an encouragement to these communities, will serve them from falling into undesirable hands, which would be ruinous to the interests of these communities and a danger to the political evolution of the country.

MEMORANDUM handed in by A. Ramaswami Mudaliar, B.A., B.L., High Court Vakil, Delegate Madra Dravidian Association and South Indian Liberal Federation, on August 25th, 1919. (See Question 6987.)

INTRODUCTION.

I desire to place before the Joint Committee the views of the two Associations which I have the honour of representing, on the Indian Reforms Bill, now engaging the attention of the Joint Committee.

DECLARATION OF AUGUST 20TH AND RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT.

My Association welcomes the announcement of August 20th, 1917, declaring that the policy of His Majesty's Government is the realisation of Responsible Government in India. It accepts the principle that it must be realised by progressive and gradual stages, and further that the Imperial Parliament ought to be the judges of those stages. My Association would, however, like to make it clear what they understand by "Responsible Government." By "Responsible Government" we understand a government or executive body responsible to the "people"—to the masses of the country—not a Government which looks solely to the wishes of any particular section of the community, but one which carries out the wishes of all classes and sections of the people. The wishes of the people will naturally be expressed through their representatives in Legislative Councils. The real responsible character of the Government would, therefore, depend on the representative character of these assemblies. They must contain the representatives of every important section of the people, and it is the wishes of such a body that ought to be respected and carried out by the executive. If, therefore, the popular or Legislative Council is not really representative of the people, then however much the Government may be bound by the decision of that body it will not be a responsible Government in the sense indicated above. If, for instance, only one set or class of persons were to compose the Legislative Council, and this class though elected by the people is not really representative of them, it is obvious that in carrying out the wishes of these people there will be no responsible Goverment: it will be the substitution of "many-men control" for the "single-man's control" that now exists. It will be an oligarchy—but it will not be a responsible Government.

COMMUNAL REPRESENTATION.

This brings us at once to the question of communal representation. In the Madras Presidency, owing to a variety of reasons which have been fully set out in the Memorandum submitted by another witness, and in the despatches of the Government of India and the Local Government under any scheme of general electorates, only one class of persons will be returned in a vast majority—viz., the Brahmins. The Mohamedans, Anglo-Indians, Indian Christians and Europeans have all been given communal representation by the Franchise Committee, and its recommendation has been accepted in the draft Bill, but the one community which has been loudly complaining that its interests are not safeguarded through general electorates—viz., the Non-Brahmins of Madras—has not been given such representation.

REFORMS—A DANGER WITHOUT COMMUNAL REPRESENTATION.

My Association is emphatically of opinion that without the safeguards of Communal Representation, any scheme of reforms would be unacceptable to the large bulk of the Non-Brahmins of Madras. So far from promoting the happiness and contentment of the people, the scheme of reforms would be a grave danger, as far as my Presidency is concerned. The Non-Brahmins of Madras have been touched by the principles for which the world-war has been waged. Whether these principles have reached the Government of Madras, or not, we Non-Brahmins have had the object lessons of the war placed vividly before us. We feel that we ought to progress towards responsible Government; that it will be an evil if the Government continues in the same way as it exists at present, but we feel it will be a far greater evil if any scheme of reforms are introduced which will jeopardise the interests of vast millions. If, therefore, we were to choose between the two evils—no reforms at all or reforms without Communal Representation—we would unhesitatingly choose the former, which is undoubtedly the lesser of the two evils.

THE MINTO-MORLEY SCHEME OF REFORMS AND THEIR EFFECT ON NON-BRAHMINS.

The Minto-Morley scheme of reforms has been condemned by the authorities, and the "politically-minded classes," but it is the Non-Brahmins who have been most prejudiced. Its policy of "rallying the moderates" has been worked out in practice by giving the most lucrative posts to troublesome agitators who have invariably been the Brahmins. What the Brahmins in the Legislative Councils have done to the detriment of the Non-Brahmins has already been placed before the Joint Committee, but what they have done outside the Council Chamber is still more interesting, and more disastrous to the Non-Brahmins. In my Presidency all the Executive Council Members, with the exception of one, Zamidar, who held office for a short time, have been Brahmins, almost all the Indian Judges of the High Court and various other high functionaries, like the Secretary to the Local Government, have been Brahmins, and the result is faithfully portrayed in the condition of the public services to-day. Whereas the percentage of Non-Brahmin graduates are increasing year by year, as compared with Brahmin graduates, the percentage of appointments in the public services is rapidly going down, and the ubiquitous Brahmin fills almost every place. In this country the public services occupy a very inferior position in public life, but in India the pre-eminent position for good or evil is to be given to the public servant. It is recognised by every one that the Indian civil servant occupies a position which cannot be compared to what the civil servant occupies at home. Brahmin politicians have repeatedly complained that the Indian civil servant is neither "civil" nor a "servant." I can only say that the ordinary Indian public servant is several times worse. It is, therefore, not so much a question of emoluments—though that is by no means negligible. It is more a question of the influence and power that he commands. If, therefore, a single community has been favoured in the public services it results in enormous power being concentrated in its hands.

RECRUITMENT PUBLIC SERVICES—A SCANDALOUS INJUSTICE.

It is often assumed that the Brahmin is employed in the public offices because he is the fittest candidate, and because no Non-Brahmin candidate is available. I find it even stated by Sir Alexander Cardew that "in spite of all efforts" on the part of the Government the Brahmin has a preponderating place in the services. My Association respectfully submits that the actual facts do not warrant either of these statements, that the Government has made no attempt at all to deal out even justice to the communities, that it has on the other hand pursued a policy of "least resistance," and has tried to appease the most "vocal section" of the community. I only take one department of the public service, namely, the Judical Department. The recruitment to it is from among the graduates in Law, practising in the High Court and Moffusil Courts. It is not by a competitive examination. The rules only say that anyone who is a graduate in law of a certain standing is eligible for an appointment. Now Sir Alexander himself points out that out of 171 appointments 118 are held by Brahmins. Are we to understand that there were no qualified candidates among Non-Brahmins? If we look at the university calendar we find several hundreds of Non-Brahmin graduates in law, every one of whom has all the qualifications required by the rules regarding recruitment. It is therefore idle to talk of efforts being made to secure representation. The reason is merely this: There is no one to speak on behalf of these Non-Brahmins, whereas there are any number of Brahmins, advocate-generals, high court judges, executive council members, to recommend and press for the appointment of Brahmin candidates.

The recruitment to the judiciary is generally made by the High Court. Prior to 1910 the senior civilian judge was the sole dispenser of this patronage. In that year a Brahmin High Court judge—the late Mr. V. Krishnaswami Iyer—conceived the brilliant idea that all the judges should meet together and decide on the candidates who should be appointed. And the suggestion was accepted by the other judges. Since 1910 there have been at least three Brahmin judges in the High Court. Now if the percentage of Brahmin to Non-Brahmin candidates who have been appointed before 1910 is compared to the percentage of those since appointed, it will be seen that Brahmins have been appointed to a much greater extent than before. It will be an interesting and not altogether useless investigation if the committee were to enquire how far the number of Brahmin judges in the High Court had any bearing on this result. My Association respectfully submits that this is not the only department in which, without any reference to merit, Brahmin candidates of doubtful qualifications have been dumped into the services to the exclusion of Non-Brahmins. The same result will be seen in most other departments. For instance, during the tenure of Sir Sivaswami Iyer as Executive Council member 13 out of 15 District Board Engineers appointed were Brahmins. In fact, Nepotism has been made a fine art in my Presidency by a certain section of the people. We can give many instances where Brahmin Legislative Council members have used their influence with the European officials, with whom they became acquainted through the Legislative Councils, to get their friends and relatives appointed to good positions. One notorious instance of such influence came to light the other day. A Brahmin member of the Corporation of Madras, who was also the elected representative of the Corporation on the Local Legislative Council—Mr. T. Rangachari—wrote a letter, which was subsequently published in the newspapers, to one of the executive officials of the Corporation, recommending a near relation of his for an appointment, and urging that "he would not take a refusal." Such occurrences are frequent, and happen almost every day, though they may not all come to light.

The Government itself, as can be shown conclusively, has been pursuing a most unjust policy. If it were solely going by the test of efficiency there would not be so much room to complain, but unfortunately the individual officers give the go-by to all such tests, and are very much amenable to influence. Take the case of Deputy Superintendents of Police who were directly recruited a few years back. The candidates were selected not because they had the highest educational qualification or the best character, but because they were the sons, grandsons or other relations of Indian High Court Judges or other high officials. As Brahmins alone have in the past held these places, more of their number again come to occupy these high posts, and so is fulfilled the saying, "To him that hath shall be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath." Sir Subramania Iyer, for instance, the ex-Chief Justice of Madras, who the other day relinquished his title, has had his relations to the third generation safely entrenched in high official positions, and does not now care if he is deprived of his decorations.

I have dilated at some length on the position in the public services because it is the key to all anomalies. With that vital point in the possession of the Brahmin the elections can be played to any effect. That is the main reason why nine out of ten elected candidates were Brahmins in the last Council.

I have heard one Brahmin witness naively suggesting that Brahmin officials could not have influenced elections, because during the last "ten years not a single petition has been presented under the election rules to set aside any election on the ground of undue influence of the official class." I can only say that this piece of argument is characteristic of the Brahmin lawyer. If the official has influenced the voter is it possible for any one to successfully allege and prove such undue influence? Any unprejudiced judge can at once see that the same influence that coerces the voter can easily and more effectively coerce him from exposing such practises, and if any non-Brahmin is foolish enough to put in a petition the result will be that the very voter will come and swear that no official influenced him, and that he gave his vote of his free will because he thought the Brahmin was the best candidate in the field!

The public services from the highest grade exercise a most baneful influence on the discretion of the voter. It has been stated by Mr. Sastri (Q. 3932) that "it was the majority of the Non-Brahmin votes which sent him up, and Dr. Nair had, perhaps, more Brahmin votes than Non-Brahmin votes." While accepting the first part of the statement, I can state from personal knowledge that the latter statement is not true. Dr. Nair got only one Brahmin vote, and that was from Mr. Rangachariar, whom he had helped to get into the Council as a personal friend of his, and about which so much has been said by almost every Brahmin witness. Dr. Nair did not get any other vote at all from Brahmins. But Mr. Sastri did get votes from Non-Brahmins, and that is exactly what we complain of. It would have been fairer to the Committee if he had stated—what he knows as a fact—that Sir Sivaswami Iyer, then Executive Council Member (a Brahmin), had actively canvassed for him among the Non-Brahmin and European members, and that two European members even, Mr. Gordon Fraser and Mr. J. C. Robinson, voted for Mr. Sastri at the urgent request of Sir Sivaswami. These are facts which can easily be proved, and both these European gentlemen who are now in England, may be asked whether Sir Sivaswami did not request them to vote for Mr. Sastri.

Nor was the case of Mr. Sastri by any means unique. During a recent election a Brahmin home ruler had the support of a Judge of the High Court, who actively canvassed for him and secured him many votes. During the present Legislative Council election in Madras the Brahmin Executive Council Member, Mr. Rajagopalachari, toured in Tanjore, and visited the municipalities in company with Mr. Ramaruijachari, a Brahmin candidate, in the midst of an electioneering campaign, and among the very people who had to vote. It will not surprise the Committee to learn that Mr. Ramaruijachari has been since elected to the Legislative Council.

It is no wonder that when high functionaries give the lead, lesser luminaries are not slow in following, and the baneful influence of the official is one of the worst features of elections in our Presidency.

PUBLIC SERVICES AND NON-BRAHMIN ORGANISATION.

We are thankful to Lord Southborough and his Committee for the advice to organise ourselves, but we may be pardoned for stating that they know not what they are talking about. The organisation of the Non-Brahmins is not an easy task. It is not of the difficulties inherent that we have to take account – such as illiteracy. Outside impediments are numerous. The hand of every Brahmin, from the Executive Councillor and High Court Judge down to the lowest, is against us. Only the other day a Brahmin High Court Judge had a fling at the Non-Brahmin movement and the "evil" that it is doing. Is it any wonder that Non-Brahmins who feel as strongly as any one the unenviable position which is their lot, hesitate before openly showing their sympathy for the movement? In the Moffusil the conditions are infinitely worse. The Non-Brahmin who is known to subscribe for the Non-Brahmin daily newspaper "Justice" or "Dravidan" is a marked man, and the penalties to which he is liable at the hands of Brahmin judges, deputy collectors and other officials are innumerable. No subordinate Non-Brahmin official dare openly subscribe for these papers. No Non-Brahmin ryot dare openly avow his sympathy for the movement. My association wishes it to be distinctly understood that this is not an exaggerated statement. In fact, the position of the Non-Brahmin is becoming intolerable. The educational institutions are almost all manned by Brahmin teachers and headmasters, and in more than one school Brahmin headmasters have not allowed Non-Brahmin students—especially those whose parents or guardians are connected with the Non Brahmin movement—to appear at the public examinations, and from more than one centre complaints have been received by the authorities that Brahmin teachers are purposely rusticating Non-Brahmin students. In fact, the evil became so acute that there was an interpellation in the local Legislative Council by the Hon. Ahmed Thambi Maricair whether the Government had received a petition from Trichinopoly that the Brahmin headmaster of the place had disqualified all the Non-Bradmin students of the school-final class.

HOME RULE AND VARNASHRAMA DHARMA MOVEMENTS.

Side by side with the advanced political movement called Home Rule, which had its origin in my Presidency, has grown another thundering movement called the Varnashrama Dharma movement, which has for its object the aggravation of the influence of the highest caste—the Brahmin. So far from there being any desire for progress in social matters, so far from taking any part in humanising some of the atrocious customs that have come down through centuries of social injustice, the Brahmins have started this movement to revive and perpetuate the rigidity of caste with all its attendant evils. My association desires to state deliberately that the political influence and power that is sought in my province has a close bearing on this movement. I have read with amazement a statement by one of the witnesses that it is an "obscurantist movement," that "no politician in Madras of any consequence" has anything to do with it. I can only explain these statements on the charitable hypothesis that the witness's memory was treacherous. A few facts may revive the failing memory. Mr. V. P. Madbava Rao—an extremist home ruler—"the Dewan of three progressive native states"—the chairman of more than one political conference and public meeting in Madras—may be "a politician of no consequence," and an "obscurantist," but he was the President of the Varnashrama Dharma Conference held at Tanjore. The Hon. Mr. K. V. Rangaswami Iyengar—a Brahmin member of the Imperial Legislative Council—an extremist home ruler—the organising secretary at one time of the Home Rule League, founded by Mrs. Besant—may be an "obscurantist" and a "politician of no consequence," but he is closely associated with the Varnashrama Dharma Movement. Mr. T. R. Ramachandra Iyer, a Brahmin leading Vakil of the Madras Presidency, who the other day, at a meeting called by the Advocate-General, and presided over by the Chief Justice of Madras for devising means to make the new war loan a success, threw out an ultimatum to the Government that unless they apologised to the lawyers in general, and the Brahmins in particular, for suffering the Non-Brahmin movement to continue, he and his friends could not subscribe to the war loan—who presided at more than one public meeting to protest against the application of martial law and other political matters, who has since been elected to the Madras Legislative Council—may be an "obscurantist" and a "politician of no consequence," but he is one of the chief organisers of the Varnashrama movement. Paudit Madan Mohan Malaviya, the Brahmin member of the Imperial Legislative Council for the last 10 years—twice President of the Indian National Congress—may be an "obscurantist" and a "politician of no consequence," but he is a faithful believer in "Varnashrama." The organising secretary of the Home Rule League of the Audra Province believes that "castes are immutable." Instances can be multiplied where prominent people have taken a part in the Home Rule Movement and in this "obscurantist body." It should further be remembered that many a prominent Brahmin member has thought it wise to lie low just at present, and has very tactfully kept apart from the movement. But—and this is very important—no Brahmin politician has come forward to dissociate himself openly from this movement. In fact, Mr. Sastri himself realised that his community was definitely pledged to this "obscurantist movement," for we find that when Mr. Patel introduced the Inter-caste Marriage Bill in the Legislative Council, Mr. Sastri opposed it on the ground that that was not the proper time for introducing a Bill of that nature. May one ask what was wrong with the psychology of the moment? The real reason, of course, is—and Mr. Sastri was shrewd enough to see it—it would have exposed the advanced Brahmin politician in his true colours—viz., as an intolerant and reactionary person. And that has exactly been the case. While Non-Brahmin bodies in Madras—the South Indian Liberal Federation, the Madras

Dravidian Association, and even the Madras Presidency Association—have whole heartedly supported the Bill, not a single Brahmin Association has expressed its hearty approval of the Bill. And we are not surprised at it. Nor have the activities of the Varnashrama Dharma Movement been confined to individuals and to obscurantists as the witness would have it.

The Varnashrama Conferences have been held since about 1915, and they are closely connected with the political gatherings. In May, 1917, the third provincial Varnashrama Conference was held at Cuddalore along with the Provincial Congress Meeting. In June, the fifth Conference of the Guntur Varnashrama Sabha was held at Repalli along with the Guntur District Conference, and the fifth Audra Varnashrama Conference was held at Nellore in conjunction with the Audra Political Conference. In August, 1917, the first Chittore Varnashrama Conference and the Inaugural Meeting of the Madanapalle Students' Varnashrama Sabha was held at Madanapalle along with the Chittore District Conference. A special lecture on "Federalism: The Keynote of Varnashrama and Home Rule," was delivered on the occasion of the special Madras Provincial Conference. The fourth Tanjore Varnashrama Conference was held in November, 1917, along with the Tanjore District Conference. The All-India Varnashrama Conference was started in December, 1916, at Lucknow, on the occasion of the famous Indian National Congress, when the ill-fated Congress-League Scheme was formulated. This is only a short account of its activities during one year. Subsequent years have seen greater progress in the movement, and it shows how closely it is allied to the advanced political movements. My Associations are distinctly of opinion that the Home Rule Movement has a very real, if perhaps a subterranean connection, with the reactionary Varnashrama movement.

THEORETICAL OBJECTIONS TO COMMUNAL REPRESENTATION.

We have shown how official predominance and caste-prejudice tend to make the Brahmin the only possible representative in the Councils. The device that commends itself to us to get rid of these two evils is what is known as Communal Representation for the Non-Brahmins. We are aware of the theoretical objections urged against it, but we must submit when five different Communities have been given Communal Representation it is too late in the day to urge against it purely theoretical objections. We need only add that historic parallels are inapplicable to conditions which defy the teachings of history and that new conditions require novel remedies which cannot be unearthed from the archives of history; that charges can equally well be levelled against Government if communal representation is not granted; that a sense of satisfied security is better than no security at all, and that existing conditions are too bad to be allowed to get worse. There is only one other argument which we should like to meet.

THE ARGUMENT OF MAJORITIES.

The Franchise Committee hopes that with our large numbers we shall easily secure our due share of representation. But it overlooks the fact that in the existing electorates Non-Brahmins are in a majority—twice generally, and sometimes three or four times the number of Brahmins—and yet nine Brahmins have been returned out of ten seats thrown open to general electorates. This is the result in constituencies which are fairly well educated. What then will be the chance in constituencies where the vast majority are illiterate, especially in English, and where the Brahmin, literate in English, far outnumber the Non-Brahmins? We therefore have no faith in numbers. In any event we do not wish to take risks, especially when even an iota of real power is intended to be transferred to the people. In the present councils, which have been described as merely advisory bodies, with no effective voice in the administration, our interests have been adversely affected in many ways. The position of the Brahmin has improved enormously since 1909, and that of the Non-Brahmin has correspondingly deteriorated, as has been pointed out above.

The Non-Brahmins therefore feel that when, with the very limited powers which the Councils possessed, so much harm has been done to the Non-Brahmin, when greater power is given the injury will be incalculable, unless the constitution of the council is radically altered. We do not want to take the risk—the risk especially of political annihilation, and we cannot depend on mere majorities in the electorates. We are prepared to take the risk on one condition. Let there be no transfer of power, no diarchy, no ministers, so far as our Presidency is concerned. Let us merely have a broadening of the electorates, and an increase of members. Let resolutions continue to be mere recommendations, and let us see the result of the working of these Councils. Let us watch how the electors discharge their duty, how the different communities stand in the Councils. Let this experiment be tried for the next decade, and if our fears are groundless, let us then be refused communal representation, and let us then have the scheme of reforms now propounded which is going to be a panacea for all ills.

MADRAS—"THE POLITICAL ULSTER OF INDIA."

We would seriously and with a due sense of responsibility urge this alternative suggestion on the Committee in case communal representation is denied. We do not wish to speak of other Presidencies, but so far as Madras is concerned let it be treated as the "political Ulster of India." It is with a feeling of thankfulness that we read in the Government of India's despatch the following: "The Madras representative upon the Subjects Committee has declined to recommend the transfer of any subject in Madras, unless separate provision is made for Non-Brahmins; and though we have not been in communication with the Madras Government it would not surprise us to learn that they share his views of the need for securing the interests of that body." This is exactly our position, as has been amply made clear above.

COMMUNAL REPRESENTATION—A TENTATIVE MEASURE.

My association is anxious to make it clear to the Joint Committee that the advocates of communal representation do not put it forward as an end in itself, but only as a means to an end; the end or object being the adequate representation of all-important communities in the Councils of the country. We desire it to be understood that the principle ought to be applied under the present conditions of society, that like the reforms suggested, it is also a tentative measure subject to revision by the periodic committees which may set aside the principle when and if they find that it has worked injury to the State or has outgrown its period of usefulness. It is under these limitations and with this understanding that we would desire the Joint Committee to approach this question.

FISSIPAROUS TENDENCIES—A POLICY OF DIVIDING CHEESE BETWEEN TWO CATS.

It has been urged by one Brahmin witness that "the constitution of communal electorates would give rise to more fissiparous tendencies than already exist in the Non-Brahmin community," that the Non-Brahmins are not a homogeneous community, and that Thurston's book on "Castes and Tribes of Southern India" reveals the "wonderful fact" that there are 153 sub-communities among them. In other words, because there are divisions amongst Non-Brahmins, and the sub-sects may fight in future for the division of seats, therefore let there be no communal representation and let the Brahmin represent all these sub-sects so that there may be harmony among them, and "the fissiparous tendency" may not develop. I can only say that this argument strongly reminds me of a fable I learnt when young of the monkey who divided the cheese between two fighting cats.

But apart from this crude argument, I desire to state that the conditions are not as stated by the witness. If the depressed classes are excluded it will be found that the sub-sects among the Non-Brahmins are all more or less on the same level of advancement—in education, in official influence, &c., and there is not the additional religious influence as between themselves which the Brahmin possesses Moreover the different sub-sects are so situated geographically that there will be no possibility of one sub sect swamping in any system of communal territorial electorates. There is every likelihood of a Pillai from the extreme south, a Naidu from Godavery or Kistna, a Mudaliar from North Arcot and adjacent parts, a Reddy from the Ceded Districts being returned by such electorates, so that naturally by the very manner in which different sub-divisions are geographically distributed they will be more or less equally represented. This is therefore only an interested piece of argument which the Brahmin in his last desperate attempt to fight against a just cause has chosen to put forward.

Another witness put forward the plea that if communal representation is granted in Legislative Councils, it may be extended to Municipalities and District Boards. In the first place it will be time enough to consider such a situation when it arises, and it will be for the local authorities to decide it. Such a contention has not been put forward, and the witness is only trying to draw a red herring across the scent. Secondly, as has been already pointed out, the ambition of the Brahmin has been enlarged, and in the future we do not expect to find any Brahmins caring for the dull prosaic work of local and county councils. The only place where he can be in the limelight is the provincial councils and the Indian Legislative Assembly. So that such a position will not arise at all. If necessary, I am in a position to give an undertaking on behalf of my association that no such request will be put forward on behalf of Municipalities and District Boards—and I need only add that the witness knows full well that such a contingency will never arise.

I may as well answer here another ingenuous statement of this witness, who seems to be the most Brahmin of all the Brahmin witnesses. He read out a long list of Non-Brahmin names of gentlemen who had been in the Legislative Councils, but he was careful enough not to give a list of the Brahmin gentlemen, which would have been really a very impressive list. Showing that there were about a dozen Non-Brahmins in the Councils during 27 years only proves our disabilities when we remember that there were several dozens of Brahmins. The witness has also tried to confuse the committee by including in the list several Non-Brahmins who were returned by special electorates like the Zamindars or landholders' electorate, and not by general electorates. It is the general electorates that afford a chance for the proletariat to be represented, and it is not a fair means of meeting the argument that for 27 years there has not been a single Non-Brahmin representative from the six coast districts, if the witness gives the name of a representative of the landholders.

This witness made a passionate appeal to the Joint Committee that the Brahmins never injured the interests of the Non-Brahmins. We may be a particularly ungrateful lot, but I may be permitted to draw the attention of the Committee to one of a series of resolutions which this witness moved in the Legislative Council. In 1912 this witness proposed in the Legislative Council that appointments to the public services of Rs. 35, or £3, a month should be made by competitive examination. Remembering what is obvious, that in these competitive examinations it is only the Brahmin that has a chance generally of succeeding, it is easy to see how much this gentleman was solicitous of the Non-Brahmins. He is not satisfied that 75 per cent. of the posts are held by Brahmins; he wants 99 per cent. to be filled by Brahmins—of course in the interests of public efficiency and because the best available talent should be got for public funds—and it is all in the interests of Non-Brahmins themselves, who are so dense that they cannot understand what is good for them.

Another witness gave a magnificent illustration of Brahmin philanthropy and disinterestedness—viz, the resolution moved by a Brahmin member for the abolition of the punishment by stocks. The Non-Brahmins, who are all a set of criminals, and are daily being put into the stocks by the thousands, ought really to be grateful to the Brahmins for thus working for their amelioration.

If these are the ways in which Brahmin gentlemen have toiled for our elevation and advancement, we can only exclaim "save us from our friends."

But the question is not merely whether Brahmin members have done good to the Non-Brahmins or not. It is a much broader question of principle whether any particular caste can represent another, especially where there are possibilities of clashing of interests. That there will be conflict of interests in the future councils is obvious. Very many measures which tend to promote the happiness of one community may have a disastrous effect on another. Take, for instance, the question of simultaneous examinations for the Civil Service. The Brahmins in a body are for it, while the Non-Brahmins are all against it. The fact was clearly disclosed in the evidence given by them before Lord Islington's Commission. Even Sir Saukaran Nair—who is persona grata with the Brahmins just now, but against whose appointment as judge and Executive Council Member scores of telegrams were despatched by Brahmin associations, and may to this day be found in the pigeon-holes of the Secretary of State's desk—in giving evidence before the Commission, stated that unless some safeguards were made to prevent the Hindu of the Pandit type from getting into the service he was against simultaneous examinations. There are scores of other similar problems which will be constantly arising. It is, therefore, only just and proper that Non-Brahmins should have their own representatives in the Councils of the country.

NON-BRAHMINS ONCE AGAINST COMMUNAL REPRESENTATION.

It has been urged by one witness that in 1908 several Non-Brahmin leaders were against Communal Representation, and that therefore now in the year of grace 1919 Communal Representation ought not to be granted to them. It would have been more to the purpose if the witness had quoted the later opinions of these gentlemen: Dewan Bahadur P. Rajaratna Mudaliar, whom this witness quotes in his memorandum, was the President of my association, the South Indian Liberal Federation, and he was one of those who in 1916 and later refused to consent to any reforms unless Communal Representation was granted. The same may be said of the Maharajas, whom this witness has thought it fit to rely upon. The Rajah of Kollengode, for instance, is all for Communal Representation to-day; so is the Rajah of Pithapur. So is every sane man among the Non-Brahmins. Even Mr. Kesava Pillai, who is hand-in-glove with the Brahmins, cannot but say on behalf of his association that Communal Representation for the Non-Brahmins must be granted. The Local Government and the Board of Revenue have similarly changed their opinions. What does this mean? Has a vendetta been suddenly raised against the Brahmin? Does it not suggest itself to anyone that while in 1908 the Non-Brahmins took the Brahmins on trust and thought that everyone was working towards the same goal and that everyone would have the same opportunities, ten years' experience has disillusioned them, and made them see that "Indian" meant only "Brahmin" advancement? This change of opinion is the strongest indication that it is after mature deliberation and experience that the Non-Brahmins have come to realise that that way lies their salvation. The Brahmins of the Madras Presidency, with all their manipulation, cannot get a single representative Non-Brahmin from Madras to give evidence before the Committee that he is against Communal Representation. In fact, no Non-Brahmin has stated so before the Franchise Committee, and the only Non-Brahmins that have given evidence before the Joint Committee are those who belong to what has been termed the Justice Party. The gentlemen who gave evidence on behalf of the Madras Presidency Association are two Christians and a Parsee from Bombay, not Non-Brahmin Hindus, and this is sufficient to disprove the hollow contention of the Brahmins that this association, inspired, organised and developed by Brahmins, has any very large following of Non-Brahmins.

One witness goes into a long history of how nine out of ten members happen to be Brahmins. Elaborate arguments can now be invented, but facts cannot be got over. If four seats were not contested by Non-Brahmins it proves not that there were no fit candidates among them, as the witness would have the committee believe, but that they found the position of the Brahmin so strong that they wisely gave up all idea of contest. It only establishes that the Brahmin has, with all the influences at his control, secured a very safe and almost impregnable position.

WHY ARE BRAHMINS AGAINST COMMUNAL REPRESENTATION.

It would be interesting if the Joint Committee were to try and find out why Brahmins are so much opposed to Communal Representation. The Non-Brahmins have stated that they will loyally carry out any scheme of reforms which the Joint Committee may recommend and the Parliament pass, provided Communal Representation is granted. Why then should the Brahmins be against it? The interests of the country cannot suffer: the reforms will not be whittled down by the grant of Communal Representation. If it was only a question of the country getting reforms it is obvious that the question of Communal Representation has nothing to do with it. The only reason that they put forward is that the development of Nationhood will be frustrated. But can anyone seriously take this argument? I have already pointed out how the Home Rule movement and the Varnashrama movement are but the obverse and reverse of the same picture. The Brahmin has done nothing towards levelling the distinctions of caste. In fact, a vicious principle has been introduced and is being followed, that political bodies ought not to concern themselves with any social disabilities. Are these the people who are working for a common nation, or are they working for their own aggrandisement? My associations have, on the other hand, from the very start brought politics and social reform on a common platform. In advocating the abolition of caste, in supporting Mr. Patel's inter-caste marriage bill, in advocating that Nadars and other castes ought to be permitted entry into Hindu temples, and in other ways side by side with our political programme we are hastening the day when a common nationhood is possible. It is therefore with feelings of surprise that we see people who are all for the maintenance of present day illogicalities and incongruities, which militate against the development of a common nation, seriously opposing Communal Representation on the ground that it hinders nationality and perpetuates caste divisions. It is only as a means of doing away with these divisions that we desire Communal Representation. We have tried social reform on various lines—on national lines, on rational lines, on lines of least resistance—and we have failed throughout. We think that the only way of success is by putting every community on a level of equality politically. Then only can social equality evolve, and with it the possibility of a common nation.

BRAHMINS AND SOCIAL SERVICE LEAGUE.

A great deal has been said about Brahmins being members of social service leagues and improving the condition of the depressed classes. As one who has inside knowledge of these organisations I wish to place before the Committee a correct statement of facts. The Social Service League was first started by Mrs. Whitehead, the wife of Bishop Whitehead, of Madras, to improve the condition of the depressed classes. The great majority of members were Non Brahmins, and it was doing quite unostentatious work for several years. Within the last two years, when the Home Rule movement was started, the Brahmins were astute enough to see that it would strengthen their hands if they were to join such associations. At about that time a Brahmin High Court Judge was elected president of the League in place of Mrs. Whitehead, and immediately there was an inrush of members—mostly young Brahmin lawyers—to the League. Whether these "estimable young men" have come into actual touch with the panchama or not, there can be no denying the fact that they lose no opportunity to get into touch with the president. But for this one central league of which a Brahmin High Court Judge is the president, there are dozens of associations in the Moffusil which are entirely controlled and worked by Non-Brahmins. In fact, every branch of the South Indian Liberal Federation—at Tanjore, at Madura, at Trichinopoly, Dindigul, Coimbatore Srivilliputtur—and in various other places, has a social service league attached to it and works for social amelioration. But, of course, no high officials preside over their anniversary meetings, no press publishes long accounts of their work. They pursue "the even tenor of their way" without anyone singing paeans of praise. Every one of them is exclusively controlled by Non-Brahmins. They may not come under the category of "estimable young men," but they are young men who are devoted to the cause and do a great deal of useful work among the depressed classes. It is absolutely incorrect to say that the great majority of workers are Brahmins. It may be true of the Madras league at present, for obvious reasons.

DEPRESSED CLASSES.

This leads me at once to the question of the depressed classes. The question is how best to improve them. I had been asked by the Audi Dravida Association of Madras (the political organisation of the panchamas) to represent their case to the Committee, but as I had not received written credentials I did not put myself forward as their authorised representative. I may, however, say that they are anxious that they should have at least six seats, as proposed by the Government of India, and that these should be by election and not nomination. However small and however distributed the electorate may be it will afford some sort of political education, and in course of time within the next one or two elections they may have a better electorate. Though they may not have an effective voice, their point of view will be authoritatively put before the Council. In the past the higher castes have positively stood in the way of their advancement. They would invite the attention of the Committee in this connection to the resolution moved in the Imperial Legislative Council by a Parsee gentleman, Mr. M. B. Dadabhoy, in 1916, which ran thus: "That this Council recommends to the Governor-General in Council that measures be devised, with the help, if necessary, of a small representative committee of officials and non-officials, for an amelioration in the moral, material and educational condition of what are known as the depressed classes, and that as a preliminary step the local governments and administrations be invited to formulate schemes with due regard to local conditions." In opening the debate the hon. member who, I take it, is not a "Non-Brahmin," said, "My justification for bringing in this resolution, if any justification were needed, is to be found in the unenthusiastic and half-hearted support which I have received from my non-official colleagues. It was no pleasure to me to bring in this resolution. If I could possibly have avoided it, I would have very cheerfully and very willingly done so. This is the sixth year of the life of the reformed council, and the second term is now approaching expiration. During the major part of that time—the five years that I have been on this Council—I anticipated that champions of public liberty, public spirit and public enterprise, and cultured men like my friends the Hon. Mr. Surendranath Banerjee or the Hon. Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, would take the trouble of moving a resolution to this effect. I waited all this time to see if one of these enthusiastic members would bring in a resolution for the amelioration of the depressed classes, but when I found that none of them had taken up the matter—when I found that it was not taken up in this Council—I thought it my duty to do so." One would have thought that though they had not introduced the resolution it was an excellent opportunity to see that something was done for these classes. But both the gentlemen unfortunately opposed it. In fact, the Hon. Pandit thought it was all a question of prejudice, and actually compared it with the prejudice that existed in England for the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill. In fact, the Government member, Sir Reginald Craddock, in his reply, stated, "The Hon. Member who moved this resolution has accused the Government of apathy and of merely following a negative policy of drift. Well, sir, my task in defending the Government from this charge has been considerably lightened. Not only have representatives of two Governments got up to protest against the accusation, but I find myself in the pleasant position of having two Hon. Members with whom I often have to disagree, as the staunchest supporters of Government of any who have risen to speak—I refer to the Hon Mr. Surendranath Bannerjee and the Hon. Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya. I welcome their support." Poor Mr. Dadabhoy, attacked on all sides, forsaken by friend and foe alike, vehemently criticised by his erstwhile fiery comrades, was forced to make a strategic retreat; and we find in the official report of the proceedings, the short, pithy, yet pregnant statement, "The resolution was, by permission, withdrawn."

The depressed classes, therefore, do not desire to depend on the higher castes to voice forth their grievances. They would like that their own representatives should sit in the Councils, and it is obvious that nomination is not a happy method of getting such representatives.

They would like to draw the attention of the Joint Committee to a small fact. It has been stated that in co-operative movements the panchama takes a part with the higher castes, and that they sit together in solemn conclave to deliberate on matters concerning the society. They are unable to recognise that this description applies to the Madras Presidency. Not long ago a panchama applied for admission as a member to the Triplicame Co-operative Credit Society, of which the Hon. Mr. Srivivasa Sartri was the president and all that I can say is that his application was rejected, and there are no panchamas in that organisation.

THE SCHEME OF REFORMS.

If, and only if, Communal Representation is granted to the Non-Brahmins, my association would accept that there should be some devolution of responsible government in the provinces. The scheme that would commend itself to my association closely corresponds to that which has been put forward by another witness.

My association would prefer that the Bill be amended so as to have a unified government without the distinction of Executive Councillors and Ministers. The Executive Council will be composed of four members, two of whom are Europeans and two Indians. Some subjects would be transferred to the Legislative Councils, and in these subjects the wishes of the Council will be carried out unless the Governor certifies against them. The Indian members may be appointed from the elected members of the Legislative Council. The transferred subjects will be administered ordinarily by the Indian members of the Council, but not necessarily. It will be a unitary government absolutely bound by the wishes of the Legislative Council in transferred subjects—unless it is certified by the Governor to be opposed to fundamental principles of justice or peace, order or good government—and responsible for the reserved subjects to the Government of India and Parliament.

My association would desire that further Select Committees of the Legislative Council may be associated with the members in charge of transferred subjects in the administration of the subjects.

Certain revenues may be assigned to the transferred subjects, or a fixed proportion of the whole revenues may be set apart for these subjects, and this proportion may be liable to revision by the periodic committees.

The other provisions of the Bill would apply to the scheme put forward by my Association.

TRANSFERRED SUBJECTS.

With respect to transferred subjects, my association would accept the list of the Feetham Committee, except as regards education. My association would transfer primary education, but would treat secondary and university education as reserved subjects. Just at present very nebulous ideas are in the air about education. There is, for example, the propaganda of "national education" which Mrs. Besant has pushed forward within the last two years. She proposes to have national mathematics, national science and other national subjects. History, of course, will be re-written and become national. But, apart from this, there is the greatest objection to the religious teaching which is supposed to be taught in these national schools. The Missionary colleges are now condemned because the Bible is taught in them. There are the advocates of the "conseience clause." Now what happens, at least in the Madanapodle National College of Mrs. Besant, is this: Instead of hearing a disquisition on the New Testament or the prophecies of Jeremiah or the vision of Saul, whether it was subjective or objective—which of course would denationalise them—Mrs. Besant's National College has the White Lotus day, the Besant day and the Arundale day, when the boys are assembled and prayers are given to the Creator for sending into the world saviours like Madame Blavatsky, Mrs. Besant and Mr. Arundale. Now we distinctly oppose such teachings We would rather our children listen to the teaching of Christian missionaries than to such vapourings. The advocates of conscience clause do not further stop to see what the effect of it will be on Missionary efforts towards higher education. It may be said that if the Non-Brahmins are in a majority they need not fear such results to happen. But the truth is that no Indian has really an idea of how educational reform should proceed, and even the Government is not very much wiser, and under all the circumstances it is better to allow things to proceed along old grooves for some time longer than to permit any sudden and violent changes being made.

SOCIAL LEGISLATION.

My association is very anxious that some way must be found by which social legislation may be effected to allow the society to progress. No witness has thought it fit to advert to this so far, and yet we are all trying towards making the Indians a nation. So far as social legislation is concerned, it is stated that as its effects are very widespread it ought not to be the subject of provincial legislation, but only of central legislation. Granting that this is so, there must be some provision of carrying such legislation through the central Government. At present the Government has committed itself to a policy which says that unless the very large majority of Indians are in favour of social legislation, the Government will not give their support, and as the Government is also to be the judges of the volume of Indian opinion in favour or against, it is easy to frighten the Government by carefully manipulated telegrams that Indian opinion is against it. It is obvious that society cannot progress in India very far unless at least permissive social legislat on is enacted. My association therefore proposes that there should be a well understood convention that if the majority of elected members are in favour of a certain measure of social legislation the Government should accept it. If it is contended that the Mahomedans should not legislate for Hindus and vice versa, my association would suggest that the opinion of the majority of the elected representatives of the particular religious community which will be affected by such legislation should be taken and the action of the Goverment guided by such opinion. This is a very important matter, and my association feels that the whole future of India as a civilised country depends upon it.

In conclusion, my association would like to thank the Committee for being allowed an opportunity to lay its views before the Committee. We would once more strongly urge that it is absolutely essential that the Non-Brahmins of the Presidency should be granted Communal Representation. The reforms themselves would prove a blessing or a curse according as such representation is granted or not. Great issues are involved on the decision of the question. We shall not be exaggerating matters if we say that the ordered progress of the country and the advancement of all classes of people depends upon the grant of Communal Representation to the Non-Brahmins of Madras.

APPENDIX T.

MEMORANDUM handed in by L. K. Tulasiram, Delegate of the Non-Brahmin Deputation, on 25th August, 1919. (See Question 6718.)

1. In the Memorandum, I propose to deal with the "vexed question" of the Brahmin versus Non-Brahmin, as it, in my opinion, has a very important bearing on the present Bill. If no safeguards are provided in the Bill itself for securing Communal Representation to the Non-Brahmins of the Madras Presidency, I am afraid that the consequences to follow will be very disastrous.

2. The population of the Madras Presidency, excluding that of the Native States is according to the Census of 1911 more than 41 millions, or 414 lakhs. Hindus account for 89 per cent., Mohammedans for 7 per cent., Christians for 3 per cent., and Animists for 1 per cent. The vast majority of the population is Non-Brahmin Hindu, of Dravidian race, and possess an ancient civilisation. The two principal Dravidian languages Tamil and Telugu are spoken of by 17 and 16 millions Persons respectively. Of every thousand people 407 speak Tamil, 377 speak Telugu, 74 Malayalam, 38 Uruia, 37 Canarese and 23 Hindustani.

3. The population of the Madras Presidency, deducting that of the Agenty tracts, is distributed as follows:—

	Lakhs.
Hindus—
Brahmins	13
Non-Brahmins	277
Panchamas or Untouchables	63
Mohammedans	27
Indian Christians	11
Others	6

4. The Brahmins form a small percentage of the whole population. Owing to the accident of two first-grade colleges being founded in the Tanjore district in the early fifties, the Brahmins got themselves educated earlier than other communities, and were first in the field. Though it has long been the rule of the British Government to secure a due representation of all castes in the publice service, the Brahmin has everywhere established a marked supremacy, and with the supremacy and prodominance in most walks of life, he has easily secured control in politics. Among the Non-Brahmin Hindus 115 men and 8 women per thousand of each sex are according to the Census of 1911 able to read and write while about 654 Brahmin men and 93 Brahmin women per thousand of each sex are literate generally. In the Madras Presidency, of every thousand persons 6 are literate in English. Of every ten thousand Hindu men of each community, 1,553 Brahmins and 52 Non-Brahmins are literate in English. While there is only one university graduate to every 6,000 Non-Brahmin Hindus, there is one university graduate to every 66 Brahmins, though the proportion according to the strength of population between the Brahmins and Non-Brahmins, including Panchamas, is about 1 to 27.

5. The Non-Brahmin movement is a democratic movement for the uplift of the less educated classes. It aims to prevent the substitution of a Brahmin oligarchy in the place of British bureaucracy. Certainly the Non-Brahmin movement is not a movement of hatred of the Brahmins.

The Non-Brahmin is the real democratic movement of the country, which seeks to give to the people the heritage which is theirs, a movement which seeks not for the aggrandisement of any individual or caste, which tries not to vest power in any class oligarchy, but which attempts by educating the masses to a sense of their own dignity to make them realise the destiny that is theirs. The movement is against the tyranny of a pernicious social system which had blunted the finer feelings of dignity and self-respect of the Non-Brahmins.

6. The Varnashrama Dharma movement has been started in Madras with the sole intention of reviving the tyranny of caste. It is closely connected with politics, and the majority of the Brahmin politicians are directly or indirectly hand and-glove with the movement. The tenets of the Varnashrama movement are to resuscitate the code of Manu, which provides that if a Non-Brahmin were to hear the Vedas being recited, molten lead should be poured into those ears, and if a Non-Brahmin were to take seat on the same dais along with a Brahmin, the Non-Brahmin should be severely tortured.

7. The success or failure of the Government of India Bill so far as the Presidency of Madras is concerned, will depend upon who will exercise the powers proposed to be transferred to popular control. The composition of the future Legislative Councils is therefore the vital question to be considered. The reforms proposed will be a blessing or a curse according as the Councils constituted under the Bill are representative of the people or of only one section thereof. No scheme of reforms will be acceptable to the Non-Brahmins of the Madras Presidency unless Communal Representation through Communal Electorates is guaranteed to us as an essential preliminary.

8. It has been suggested that the broadening of the franchise will create such a large majority of Non-Brahmin voters that there will be no possibility of Brahmins being returned to the Legislative Councils. Those who make the suggestion either do not realise the conditions that at present prevail at elections or wish to shut their eyes to them. As a matter of fact, even in the electorates existing at present the Non-Brahmin classes form a very decided majority and yet we find that nine out of the ten seats have been captured by the Brahmins. The influence of local officials, lawyers, and teachers who are mostly Brahmins is so overwhelming that the elector has really no free vote to exercise at elections at all. Subtle influences are brought to bear on the electors, sometimes direct, sometimes indirect, so that it is impossible for the ordinary voter to steer clear of them all and to vote for the real candidate of his choice.

9. That out of ten seats on the local Legislative Council thrown open to election by the Local Board and municipalities in the ten groups of the whole Presidency, nine seats were captured by the Brahmins and only one went to a Non-Brahmin, and in the Imperial Legislative Council all the three seats open to the Indians of the Madras Presidency are at present held by Brahmins. The reasons why the Brahmins are able to capture the seats are many. First, the majority of the returning officers are Brahmins, and they influence the voters, who always look upon them for help and protection, to vote for their Brahmin candidate.

Secondly, two thirds of the graduates in arts are Brahmins, and those who are college teachers and professors influence their former student voters, and three-fourths of the graduates in law are Brahmins, and as lawyers they influence their client voters.

Thirdly, the Brahmin officials form exactly half the total number of the Madras public services, and the Non-Brahmin Hindus contribute about one-sixth of that number, and it is the interest of the Brahmin official to see that there is a large number of his own community on the local Legislative Council to advance the interests of the Brahmin officials.

It was urged by one of the witnesses before this Committee that there were three Non-Brahmin representatives representing the Madras Corporation between the year 1893 and 1916. If you understand that the Brahmin population of the Madras City is only 32 thousand out of a total Non-Brahmin population of 312 thousand, it is really surprising how two Brahmin representatives were so lucky as to capture the Madras Corporation seat each on one occasion.

10. The Brahmin representatives on the Madras Legislative Council have actually acted detrimentally to the interests of the Non-Brahmin masses. The particular caste which predominates in the local Legislative Council at present is trying to improve it own position and that of the individual members thereof, both in public offices and councils by forming a close ring. It has failed to lend a helping hand to communities that are less fortunately circumstanced.

Though the grievances of Hindu widows in Madras is the same for the member of Brahmin and Non-Brahmin communities, a Brahmin widows' home has been provided for the use of the widows of the Brahmin community, and nothing whatever has been done for the amelioration of the pitiable condition of the Non-Brahmin widows. A rule was made by a Brahmin ex member of the Executive Council of Madras Government that the clothes worn by a Brahmin convict in the Indian jails should not be worn by a Non-Brahmin convict. Now and then proposals are adumbrated to reserve carriages in the railway trains for Brahmins only. The members of the Non-Brahmins communities honestly apprehend that unless something is done to secure adequate representation to the Non-Brahmins of the Madras Presidency through communal electorates the British Parliament would be really acquiescing in the establishment of a Brahmin oligarchy in the Madras Presidency. The Brahmins of Bengal are meek and submissive, of Bombay and Gujerat are tolerant and cosmopolitan, but the Brahmins of Madras are intolerant, clannish and selfish.

11. The population of the Nadars (a class of Non-Brahmin Hindus in the Madras Presidency) is more than half a million. This community has taken to trade, cultivation and money lending. The members of this community have won for themselves by education, industry and frugality, respectable positions as traders and merchants. But by the tyranny of caste the Nadars are being looked upon by the orthodox Hindus as community having a low social status. These Nadars, who are staunch Saivites, or worshippers of the Hindu gods, are not allowed to enter and worship in the Hindu temples where all other caste Hindus are allowed to worship, and no Brahmin member of the local Legislative Council has thought it just to bring a resolution before the Legislative Council, sanctioning the entry of this community into the Hindu temples. The Non-Brahmins of the Madras Presidency have passed a resolution at the Non-Brahmins Conference held at Tinnevelly, in the year 1917, recognising their right to enter and worship in the Hindu temples.

12. The resolution regarding the recruitment to Public Services by open competition moved by Messrs. L. A. Govindaraghava Aiyer, in 1911, and M. Ramachandra Rao, in 1912; the resolution regarding the recruitment of subordinate Magistrates from the Bar which is almost exclusively monopolised by the Brahmins, moved by Mr. Narasimha Aiyar; the resolution regarding the amendments of the Civil Courts Acts, so as to vest in the High Court the power of appointing Subordinate Judges moved by Mr. Ranga Achariar; the resolution of which notice was given by Mr. V. K. Ramanuja Achariar regarding the deletion of the Board of Revenue Standing Order No. 128, Clause 2, which provided for the representation of all communities in the public service; the interpellations put by five other enthusiastic Brahmin members simultaneously requiring a list of newspapers subsidised by the Government which were provoked by the starting of the Non-Brahmin daily organ "Justice"—all these are only a few instances in support of the contention that the Brahmin members of the Legislative Councils have not been very keen in promoting the interests of the Non-Brahmin classes, or at any rate the purpose of these several resolutions have been to promote the interests of the Brahmins, knowing full well that the effect of these resolutions would be positively disadvantageous to the Non-Brahmins. At the recent debate in the Legislative Council regarding the subjects to be transferred and reserved, all the Brahmin members were unanimously in favour of transferring "Civil Justice" to popular control, while every Non-Brahmin member whether Mohammedan, Indian-Christian or European, was opposed to it. This would suggest that the interests of the two communities are diametrically opposed in some cases at least.

13. It has been suggested by a Brahmin witness that there are more than one hundred and fifty communities among the Non-Brahmins who could not all be adequately represented. Our proposal is that the Non-Brahmins of each locality should be grouped in a single electorate and the Brahmins grouped separately. One reason why we look upon the different Non-Brahmins castes as one community is that these castes are more or less in the same position in point of education and official influence and have more or less the same social habits and customs and are labouring under the same difficulties and have the same grievances against the Brahmins. There is not that huge disparity and racial difference between one Non Brahmin caste and another as exists between the Brahmin and the Non-Brahmin. They are all the victims of common social tyranny exercised by a common priesthood. We propose to group all Non-Brahmin Hindus (except the Panchamas) in a certain territorial limit into one electorate and this electorate will in most cases return that candidate whose community preponderates and is most influential in the locality. Small sub-sections among the Non Brahmins have either no voters at all or if they have, their number is small as almost to be negligible, and such sub-sections can have no reason to be dissatisfied if they are not in a position to return their own member.

14. It has been suggested by the Government of India that a representation of Non-Brahmins can be secured by reserving thirty out of sixty-one seats in a general electorate. This suggestion cannot be accepted because the result will be the election of men who are not really representatives of Non-Brahmin opinion, but people who will be pledged to a policy of affairs more dangerous than not being represented at all. In the mixed general electorates all the unwholesome influences which we are trying to guard against will be present, exercising their power as freely as possible. The Brahmin members of the electorate being a close and organised body will have a potent voice in elections, and their packed voting may turn the scale between two rival Non-Brahmin candidates. Though in every electorate the Non-Brahmins are in an overwhelming majority as compared with the Brahmins, the literate and specially the English educated will be far more among the Brahmins than among the Non-Brahmins, so that they will have a real and a very potent voice in directing the voting, especially in the rural areas. The Non-Brahmin canditate who gets returned by the votes of the Brahmins and with their help in canvassing votes, will certainly not feel himself free to voice the real wishes of the Non-Brahmins. The formation of seperate communal electorates will minimise these evil influences as much as possible. Those who are outside the electorate altogether will not have the same recognised opportunity of taking a very active part in influencing the elections. Therefore it is that we urge representation through seperate communal electorates till, by the spread of education and the more even distribution of offical patronage among the classes, the influence of each community will be balanced by that of others, when the necessity for separate electorates will cease to exist.

15. Non-Brahmins need, then, educational development. The percentage of the literates in the vernaculars is 5 per cent. among the Non-Brahmins and 50 among the Brahmins, and herein lies one of the explanations as to why that single community occupy a predominant position in the country. Hemmed in on all sides by forces which would encourage the higher forms of education, the Government have neglected primary education to the detriment of the Non-Brahmin classes living mostly in the rural areas.

16. The extension of primary education has been further impeded by the indifference of the more advanced and ambitious classes to the spread of primary education. In spite of repeated declarations by the Government only a quarter of the amount was spent on primary education out of the total amounts set apart for education general in 1912. In consequence of the disparity found in the sums spent upon primary and higher education, the classes that have suffered mainly are the Non-Brahmins, because while one out of three Brahmin boys is undergoing instruction, one out of nine among Non-Brahmins is receiving primary education.

17. Dharma Rakshana Sabha is an ingenious association, started by Sir S. Subrawania Aryai with the avowed object of safeguarding the charitable and religious endowments in the Madras Presidency. In practice the work that this Sabha, or association, has done is to oust the Non-Brahmin trustees, both appointed and hereditary, from their places, and to fill them with Brahmin members, by providing schemes for their management which enables the Brahmin members to have an easy walk over to the offices, and provides fat fees for Brahmin vakils by giving rise to long and protracted litigation.

18. For the last few years the suits against the trustees of temples and charitable endowments have increased under the auspices of the so-called Dharma Rakshana Sabha, and the result in the majority of cases is the substitution of the existing trustees by the Court-appointed trustees, mostly consisting of Brahmins and Brahmin Vakils, who can have no claim or interest of any kind to be trustees. Even when the trust is the benefaction of a single individual or family, when any nominal defect is found in the management by the inheritors, they are summarily dismissed and sent out as if they had no interest of any kind and replaced by utter strangers to be the custodians of such institutions. The Government has recognised the principle of heredity even in the case of petty village officers, and the Non-Brahmins very much desire that religious and charitable endowments should not be a transferred subject in Madras. On account of the activities of the Dharma Rakshana Sabha, the situation has become anomalous, and is giving rise to much irritation and heart-burning among the Non-Brahmins, who are on this account losing their prestige, as the funds are being utilised for objects which are not beneficial to the communities. The funds of the Tirupati temple are being utilised for purposes benefiting a single community. The Non-Brahmin funds of the Tireukkarungudi Chattram were diverted for starting a Sanskrit College at Kallidaikui-Chi in the Tinnevelly District. The funds of the famous shrine at Rameswaram are being spent towards the maintenance of a Sanskrit College named "Rameswaram Devastanam Patasala" at Madura, to which Non-Brahmins have no access whatsoever. The conduct of the scheme suits lodged at the instance of the Dharma Rakshana Sabha are mostly conducted by junior Brahmin Vakils to their profit.

19. The agitation with regard to separate electorates for Non-Brahmins in Madras was first raised at the time of the Morley-Minto reforms. The leaders of the Non-Brahmin movement having the best interests of the country at heart, and believing that the Brahmins would treat the Non-Brahmins fairly and squarely, did not press for separate electorates then. Now, the Indian Press is in the hands of the Brahmins. The men returned to Madras electorates are pushed into prominence by the Brahmin press. Since the introduction of the Morley-Minto scheme increased power bestowed on the people without Communal Representation led to that power being concentrated in the hands of a single educated community, and led to greater disparity between the educated and uneducated classes. This is one of the chief causes for the starting of the Non-Brahmin movement.

20. It was suggested by one of the witnesses before the Committee that this Non-Brahmin moment has been started by a few Non-Brahmin candidates who were defeated at the Council elections. When the Non-Brahmins found that there were no chances of success even for the best men of their community in competition with the ordinary men of the Brahmin community, they opened their eyes and found that there was something fundamentally wrong in the Morley-Minto reforms, and began to agitate for Communal Representation by communal electorates.

21. It has been stated by a Brahmin witness who appeared before the Committee that the moment the system of Communal Representation is conceded with regard to the Legislative Council elections the demand would be extended to the field of local self-government. There is no fear for such a demand. The Hindus and Mohammadans had a number of differences between themselves, and the moment Communal Representation was conceded to the Mohammadans the differences that existed have vanished, and they are so united as to submit the Joint Congress Muslim League scheme. In the same way, we confidently believe, the moment Communal Representation by communal electorates is conceded to the Non-Brahmins of the Madras Presidency, the Brahmins and the Non-Brahmins will stand together united and happy.

PUBLIC SERVICES.

22. In the Madras Presidency the Brahmins, who form about 3 per cent. of the total population, have monopolised 50 per cent. of the higher appointments in all the services. For the last half a century ended with 1917 there had been only a single Non-Brahmin nominated as a Judge of the High Court, while there were seven Brahmin High Court Judges during the same period. There has not been an even distribution of official patronage. There is no dearth of qualified candidates among Non-Brahmins. It is suggested that a priviso should be made under a Clause of the Bill that no community should be represented in the Public Service to an extent which is more than a fixed percentage, and the minimum number of appointments to be held by a community should be fixed. It is absolutely incorrect if any witness says that there were a large number of Non-Brahmin members during any term of the local Legislative Council.

23. The Southborough Committee reject the scheme for separate communal electorate for Non-Brahmin Hindus of the Madras Presidency on the ground that it would force the Brahmins into a separate electorate against their will.

It is estimated that the total number of Brahmin voters is about 52 thousand and that of the Non-Brahmin voters at 248 thousand. The question is, whose will is to prevail? Whether the will of the 50 thousand Brahmins not to have separate electorates, or the will of the 250 thousand Non-Brahmin voters to have separate communal electorates.

24. The Brahmin members, who preponderate in the local Legislative Council, are not one of them a merchant or manufacturer, and do not take sufficient interest in the development of industries and trades. If we were to have Non-Brahmin representatives who are really interested in the development of trades and industries, they should be elected by a separate communal electorate consisting only of Non-Brahmins, without any interference of the Brahmins.

In view of the possibility of the rise of industrialism in India and the labour problems attending in its wake, it is necessary to create a special franchise for factory workers in some of the important industrial centres of India.

1,335 per ten thousand of the population find employment on the side of industries, and 661 per ten thousand of the population are engaged in trade, of whom 437 per ten thousand are engaged in trade in foodstuffs.

APPENDIX U.

MEMORANDUM handed in by Koka Appa Rao Naidu, B.A. and B.L., Pleader, Berhampur, Madras, on 25th August, 1919. (See Question 6718.)

I beg to state that I am the Secretary of the Ganjam People's Association, Berhampur, and also a Member of the South Indian Liberal Federation, Madras. I was elected as their delegate to give evidence before the Joint Committee. I was also requested by the Uriyas to represent them. I lived for most part in rural areas and worked amongst the agricultural classes. I am closely connected with various Non-Brahmin organisations and attended many of the Non-Brahmin Conferences held in Madras Province.

SOCIAL REFORM v. POLITICAL REFORM.

Amongst the educated classes in India, there have been two schools of thought with regard to political reform, one led by Keshule and Ranade and another by Mr. Bal Gangadhar Tilak. The former held that Social Reform should precede or at least go hand in hand with Political Reform, and the latter contended either that Hindu Society did not require any reformation and caste system was essential to the Hindu Society, or that Political Reform should precede all Social Reform. On account of India's contact with British civilisation, with its ideals of liberty, equality and fraternity, men's minds in India were turned towards the tyranny of caste and custom. This gave rise to two liberal theistic movements, the Brahmos amaj in Bengal and the Aryas amaj in the Punjab, which are broad-based on the brotherhood of man. These two organisations worked against caste vigorously for some time in Bengal and the Punjab. Just after the starting of the Congress at Bombay, Ranade and his friends started what is known as the Indian National Social Conference, for they felt that social reform should at least go hand in hand with political reform, so that there may be no breakdown of the political machinery leading into chaos and confusion. When the Congress was held at Poona for the first time, the social reactionaries of Poona, led by Mr. Tilak, who have always been political extremists, prevented the Indian Social Conference from being held in the Congress Pandal. I may state here the views of three Indians about the tyranny of caste and custom in India "under whose ponderous wheels the Hindu nation is squeezed and crushed."

Swami Vivekananda said: "We are at present neither Vedantins nor Tantriks nor Mantriks. We are just Don't Touchists. Our God is pot. Our religion is kitchen. If we go on in this way for a century more, we are sure to be in the lunatic asylum."

Bishen Narayan Dhar, Barrister-at Law, of Lucknow, said: "A selfish priesthood imposed its yoke upon the neck of the people; custom fixed and stereotyped the course of national life; caste system elaborated its net, in the meshes of which were caught all the elements of progress and advancement."

Keshule Chandersen said: "Caste is the bulwark of Hindu idolatry and the safeguard of the Brahmanical priesthood."

The same state of things continues even to-day. When such has been the horrid state of things, it has been considered highly necessary to reform the society, for "there can be no advancement politically without social and moral advancement." So Ranade and his friends carried on their social activities.

REVIVAL AND RETROGRESSION.

The two Theistic Movements and the Social Reform Movement led by Ranade received a huge shock from Mrs. Besant, with her Theosophical and Esoteric teachings. She, with her power of eloquence, with her organising ability, with her followers, men and women, and with large funds at her disposal, began to preach that everything in the Hindu religion and Hindu social policy is the best; that caste system is based on right social and spiritual principles, and endeavoured to give justification and even scientific and esoteric explanation to every superstitious custom, practice and ceremonial. By applauding the past glories of Hindu civilisation she was able to impress upon the young minds. This gave a turn in the tide of social reform. Then came the Swadeshi and Boycott Movement, with the agitation against the partition of Bengal. These were followed by the fad of national education, led by Mrs. Besant, in order to remove the liberalising tendencies of English education. At the same time there was started what is known as the Varnashrama Dharma Movement in the Madras and United Provinces, to place the system of caste on a firm basis. This movement has been led by the Brahmin politicians in Madras. In the United Provinces it has been actively supported by the Honourable Pandit Malavya and Maharajah of Durbangha, who took great pains in collecting funds for the Hindu University, which was condemned by Sir C. Sankaran Nair, and characterised by him as a separatist and sectarian university, to which Government should not lend its support. It may be stated here that Maharajah of Durbangha, a Brahmin, is one of those that opposed the introduction of free and compulsory primary education in India. Thus the activities of Mrs. Besant and her Theosophical societies, Varnashrama Dharmists and the so called Nationalists—all these came in the way of the progress of social reform, with the result that the two Theistic Movements and the Social Reform Movement failed, and retrogression and reaction to social reform became the order of the day. This is clear from the strong opposition of the Brahmin politicians to Bupendra Nath Bas's Civil Marriage Bill, and Patel's Inter-Caste Marriage Bill. The climax was reached last year when the Annual Social Conference was not held at Delhi, although a dozen other Conferences assembled with the Extremist Congress. Nowadays, nobody even thinks of reforming the Society. The condition of affairs is worse in the Madras Province, and Caste has a stronger hold in Madras than in other Provinces for the following reasons:—

(1) The activities of Mrs. Besant and Sir S. Subhramanya Iyer, the author of the "disgraceful letter" to the President of the United States, and their Brahmin followers, with their Theosophical headquarters at Adray, near Madras.

(2) The activities of the Varnashrama Dharma Movement of Madras.

(3) The absence of a movement like the Brahmo Samaj of Bengal, or the Arya Samaj of the Punjab.

(4) Most of the Northern India Brahmins, including the Bengalee and Uriya Brahmins, eat flesh and fish as the Non-Brahmins do, and there is not so much rigidity with regard to interdining. On the other hand the Madras Brahmin is a strict vegetarian, while the Non-Brahmin is a non-vegetarian, and the former rigidly observes the restrictions against interdining and untouchability.

(5) In Northern India, the Mohamedans settled themselves in large numbers, and their kings ruled over it for centuries. The Mohamedan kings were no respecters of Caste, and they used to treat all castes equally. So the Non-Brahmins in the Punjab, Bengal and United Provinces used to hold positions of influence and power equally with the Brahmins, so that there was not so much predominance of any one caste over other castes. Further, in Northern India, the problem has been always the Hindu and Mohamedan Problem.

BENGAL.—

Hindus	Brahmins	1,233,825	20,173,937
	Non-Brahmins	8,991,868
	Others	9,948,244
Mohamedans			23,975,171

As the Mohamedans are greater in numbers, and they were once the ruling race, the Hindus could not afford to quarrel as between themselves and adjusted their differences, giving rise only to Hindu Mohamedan struggle. In the Madras Province the Mohamedans never settled themselves in numbers, and their Kings did not rule over it for a long period.

MADRAS.—

Hindus	Brahmins	1,221,907	35,315,381
	Non-Brahmins	27,716,306
	Others	6,377,168
Mohamedans			2,735,673

From the above figures, it can be seen that the Mohamedans form a very small Community when compared with the Hindus.

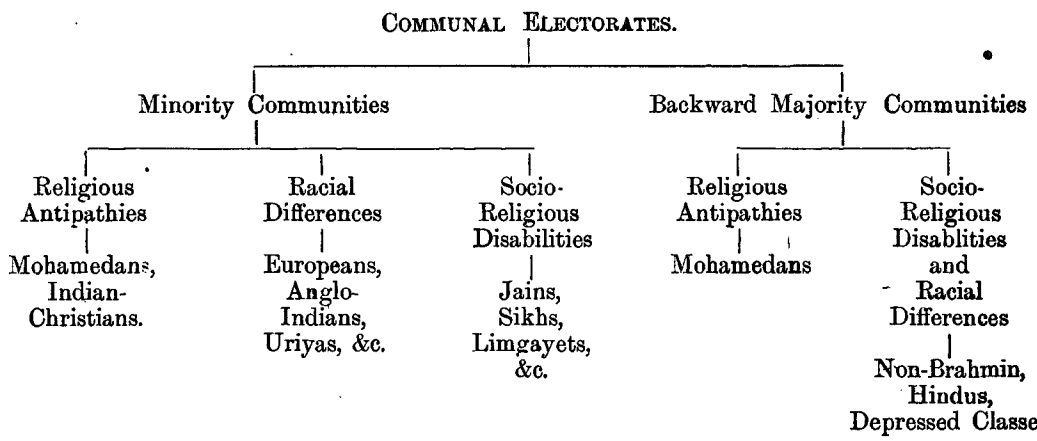
These, among other causes, led to the rigidity of caste system in the Madras Province This is accentuated by his belief that he is distinct in race from the Non-Brahmins who are considered to be of Dravidian origin.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF AUGUST 20TH, 1917.

When such was the general state of things in India, and when caste exclusiveness and Brahmin priesthood were sapping the vitals of the people at large, especially in the Madras Province, and when some of the leaders of Indian thought were of the opinion that Social Reform should precede Political Reform, an announcement was made in Parliament by the Secretary of State for India on the 20th of August, 1917, to the effect that substantial powers would be conferred on the Indians with a view to the progressive realisation of responsible government. Naturally, it caused a stir amongst the Non-Brahmins of the Madras Province, who were suffering under the social and spiritual, official and political ascendancy of the Brahmins. So they opposed the demands of the Extremists and asked for a moderate advance, for they have been always of the opinion that "Slavery at home is incompatible with political liberty." Further, they have been persistently demanding for Communal Electorates to them, as a protection against the all-powerful influences of Brahmins, in any scheme of reforms that are going to be granted, and for the effective representation of all communities in the Councils.

DEMAND FOR COMMUNAL ELECTORATES.

The demand for Communal Electorates in India is based upon five grounds or standpoints. This can be very well explained by the following table.



From the above table it is clear that Communal Electorates are demanded not only by Minority Communities, but also by those Majority Communities which are less advanced, i.e., politically and educationally backward, to safeguard their interests, as they cannot be properly represented by the members of other communities on account of the acute religious antipathies, socio-religious disabilities and racial differences under which these communities are suffering. It is unnecessary to state in detail the various religious antipathies and socio-religious disabilities. The long cleavages of religion, race and caste are to a certain extent described in the first part of the Joint Report. It may now be considered why a Majority Community, like the Non-Brahmins, require special representation.

THE VILLAGE AS UNIT.

Lord Morley, in his famous despatch to the Viceroy of India, said, "The village in India (generally) has been the fundamental and indestructible unit of the social system, surviving the downfall of dynasty after dynasty. I desire your Excellency in Council to consider the best way of carrying out a policy that would make the village a starting point of public life." I would add that village has always been the unit of administration both under the ancient kings and under British rule. The Government of India in their fifth despatch on the Indian Constitutional Reforms (Franchise) in para. 28 said, "After religion and race, the boundary between town and country is the greatest dividing line that runs through the Indian people. It corresponds closely with the division between progress and conservatism; between English education and vernacular; between experience of self-government and lack of such experience; between the existence of newspapers, professions, bar-libraries, societies, &c., and their absence." Therefore, any scheme of reforms, any grant of political rights, any question of franchise or electoral reform and any changes in the administrative machinery must be considered from the standpoint of the village. So, it is incumbent upon the constitution makers to understand the conditions of village life, the nature of the people that inhabit the rural parts and the ideals and sentiments that prevail in those areas.

Lord Morley, in his Budget speech of 1906, said, "Remember that India is essentially agricultural with varying degrees of fertility." India is mostly an agricultural country, and its population is more rural than urban, and this is much more true in the Madras Province. In Madras, more than 90 per cent. of the population live in villages. There has been no growth of towns in Madras, on account of the absence of any appreciable growing industries. So, the rural population never migrates to the towns in large numbers, as in the Western countries or in some parts of India, and they confine to their village holdings. The village population consists of artisans, half a dozen petty traders, peasant proprietors, ryots, agricultural labourers and about half a dozen Brahmins. These agriculturalists till the soil, sow the seeds, rear the crops, pay the taxes and cesses on land and reap the harvest as the fruit of their labour of months. More than 95 per cent. of the rural population are Non-Brahmin Hindus and Depressed classes. Even the half-dozen Brahmins in the villages exercise all power and influence over the ignorant and docile rural classes on account of the conditions prevailing in the village life.

ILLITERACY IN RURAL AREAS.

Most of these villagers are illiterate and ignorant, and in every village we can find many petty landholders who cannot even sign their own names. The policy of the Government, encouraged by the politically-minded class, the Brahmin, has been to give more attention to University and Secondary Education, which mostly benefits the Brahmins and the townfolk, than to Primary Education, the greatest need of the rural classes—i.e., the Non-Brahmin millions. This short-sighted educational policy of the Government, coupled with the superstitious ideas and notions instilled in the minds of the Non-Brahmins from generation to generation by the Brahmin priesthood that their duty is to serve for ever and ever, but not to acquire knowledge and culture, made the Non-Brahmins to lag behind in literacy, while the Brahmin, by his traditions, heredity and special facilities opened to him, made rapid strides in education, with the result that in India education is mostly confined to towns and has become a matter of caste. In the first part of the Joint Report, the ignorance of the ryot, the aloofness between the educated few and the ignorant many, the total absence of interest of the Brahmin political leaders in the masses are well depicted.

THE INDIAN VILLAGE TRIO.

Next, we have to consider who generally exercise influence and power over these ignorant villagers who are going to be enfranchised. There are three persons in the village itself whom, I term as Village Trio—the priest or purohit, the Karnam or patwari, and the document-writer or schoolmaster—and they control the village life in the Madras Province :—

(1) The Priest.—The purohitor priest is always a Brahmin. Every day he visits every Non-Brahmin house, and is worshipped by the ignorant women, who are easily duped into the cunning sayings and puranic stories told by these men. Especially for an agriculturist, his help is very necessary. To begin to till the soil, to sow the seeds, to cut the harvest, to send his daughter to his son-in-law's house, to apply for a poromboke, to visit the nearest revenue official, he has to consult his priest to find out whether the day and hour are auspicious. To perform all rituals and ceremonies, these superstitious and conservative agriculturists seek their aid often. The priest commands great influence over them on account of the traditional and superstitious veneration in which he is looked up to mostly by the women, and the repeated consultation with and information that is sought from him, in every-day life of the cultivating tenant and ryot. Customs, ceremonials and superstitions have still a very strong hold over the villagers, and it is no wonder that these ignorant villagers are easily influenced by a a cunning priesthood.

(2) The Karnam.—He is otherwise known as patwari or village accountant. He is invariably a Brahmin. He is the intermediary between the villagers and the nearest revenue official, the Tahisildar. He keeps the accounts of all holdings in the village, demarcates the fields, checks encroachments, notifies the failure of crops in the various holdings and the use of Government water without application, and does such other allied duties. No landowner, peasant or ryot can afford to gainsay him in any matter, for the produce on land is the only source of income to him and his large family. Further, in civil suits, where questions relating to occupancy, possession and tenures, &c., are involved, he is usually cited as a witness for one or the other of the parties. So these agriculturists are anxious to be in his good graces. The Rt. Hon. Mr. Montagu, in his speech on the Indian Land Policy, at a dinner at the Liberal Colonial Club, London, said, "Each village has its 'patwari,' or village accountant, to act as intermediary between the people and the representatives of Government An exact record is kept in his charge, and continually corrected up to date, giving the entire history of each plot of land in the area, with not only the full terms of ownership and tenancy, but a complete account of its crop possibilities and the particular advantages or drawbacks under which it is worked." With these official duties, his influence is paramount.

(3) The Document Writer.—He is invariably a Brahmin schoolmaster or a dismissed karnam or assistant karnam. As many of the villagers cannot even sign their own names, they cannot but approach these document-writers to write documents, applications to revenue authorities and even ordinary postal letters. In most of the contested money suits and suits relating to land and contracts, they are invariably cited as witnesses by the parties. So he naturally exercises a lot of influence over them.

Thus, the Village Trio—the Brahmin Priest, with all his religious influence; the Brahmin Karnam, with all his official influence; and the Brahmin Document Writer, with all his mediatory influence—exercise all their power over the ignorant rural voters with the result that they are not in a position to exercise their vote to the best interests of the country or community to which they belong.

VAKILS AND OFFICIALS.

Then comes the influence of Vakils and Officials who are mostly drawn from a single community—the Brahmins. The Madras Province is divided into districts, which are sub-divided into revenue divisions and taluks or tahisils. In every taluk there are two to five civil and criminal courts of inferior jurisdiction, and in every district a District Court, and five to ten Civil and Criminal Courts of Superior Jurisdiction. On account of this network of Civil and Criminal Courts, the Brahmin Vakils are distributed all over the country in large numbers. The Village Trio in many cases act as law touts to the litigants. As many of the law touts are Brahmins, as they in most cases figure as important witnesses, and as most of the judicial officers are Brahmins, it is no wonder that many of these Non-Brahmin litigants flock to the Brahmin Vakils instead of the Non-Brahmin Vakils, who are very few in numbers. Thus, many of these ryots and peasant proprietors are always under obligations to these Brahmin Vakils and Brahmin law touts.

The Revenue Officials that are in touch with the villagers are the Deputy Collectors, the Tahisldars and Revenue Inspectors. The Judicial Officers that try the cases of these Villagers are the Sub-Judges, District Mumsiffs and Sub-Magistrates. These Sub-Magistrates are always drawn from the Revenue Officials, and most of these Revenue Officials exercise Magisterial Duties. The following figures, which are approximately accurate, will speak for themselves :—

DEPUTY COLLECTORS.

24. Tirichinapally	6	2	1	—
25. Vizagapatnam	6	4	—	—
TOTAL	140	82	8	7

Thus it is clear that the important Revenue Officials are mostly found amongst the Brahmins, in spite of the fact that there is a Board Standing Order providing for the adequate representation of all communities in the services. The Brahmin Revenue Officials rougnly double the Non-Brahmin Revenue Officials, in spite of the fact that the proportion of the Brahmins to Non-Brahmins is 1 : 22.

These figures show clearly what position the Non-Brahmins are relegated to in the Judicial Service The Non-Brahmin District Mumsiffs are only 18 per cent. of the total number.

OTHER OFFICIAL FIGURES.

District Registrars -	26	17	4	1	4
Assistant Registrars of Co-operative Credit Department - -	10	8	1	1	—

These are the two departments that deal with the agriculturists mostly, but yet the Non-Brahmin proportion is very insignificant.

With these figures it is interesting to compare the figures of officers granted with King's Police Medals. Out of 41 awards, 16 were won by the Europeans, 13 by the Non-Brahmins, 1 by a Christian, 5 by the Mohammedans, and only 6 by the Brahmins. This is a sad commentary on the efficiency of the Brahmins in the discharge of hard and responsible duties.

I have shown how the officials, who are expected to be in close touch with the rural and agricultural classes, and who exercise their authority and power over them, are mainly drawn from a single community, the Brahmins.

AN AUTOMATIC ELECTORAL MACHINERY.

A large contingent of Brahmin lawyers distributed all over the district, with the aid and co-operation of the Brahmin Officials, both Revenue and Judicial, and further assisted by the law touts and the Brahmin Village Trio, command the elections. Thus, the Brahmin Electoral Machinery is complete without any special organisation or special efforts to defeat a Non-Brahmin candidate. The various branches of this Brahmin organisation automatically work with tremendous results, without any kind of appeals from their Brahmin Whips. The distinguished authors of the Joint Report, in considering the condition of the rural classes, stated: "It is just because the Indian ryot is inarticulate and has not been directly represented in our deliberations that we feel bound to emphasise the great claim he has upon our consideration. He has never exercised vote on public questions. His mind has been made up for him by his landlord or banker or his priest or his relatives, or the nearest official. These facts make it an imperative duty to assist and to protect him, while he is learning to shoulder political responsibilities." The authors forgot to mention the Vakil in the category of those that influence the ignorant ryot. The banker is often a Vysya who is always in the hands of his Brahmin Lawyer or Official. Thus, from the standpoint of the illustrious authors themselves, the ryot and the smaller landed gentry can never exercise their vote independently to the detriment of a Brahmin. What safeguards did the authors provide to assist and protect the ryot while he is learning to shoulder political responsibilities? His position will be made worse. Now, having conferred some political power on the so-called representatives, under the proposed reforms, if no sufficient safeguards are provided for their adequate representation, they are sure to suffer under a clannish oligarchy. The broadening of the franchise instead of proving an advantage to the hard-working ryot will be a decided disadvantage, for, if he exercises his vote in favour of a candidate from his community in whom he has confidence, he will be incurring the displeasure of the Brahmin Karnam, Revenue Inspector and Tahisildar. If, on the other hand, he votes for the nominee of the Brahmins, he will be cutting his own throat with the very weapon with which he has to guard himself against the attacks of Brahmin oligarchy. The result of this will be discontentment of the agricultural population who hitherto have been docile and loyal.

Further, the authors said that "the fraction of the people who are town dwellers contribute only a very small proportion to the revenues of the State," and that "the rural classes have the greatest stake in the country, because they contribute most to its revenues." This is the important plank on which the Non-Brahmins urge special representation. It is we that are the tillers of the soil and producers of wealth; it is we that pay the revenues of the State; it is we that contributed largely to the war loan, and it is we that mostly keep the internal peace and defend the country from external invasion; but, yet, we will be nowhere in the Councils. Perhaps, the political theory "no taxation, no representation" has become obsolete. If this political maxim is to be applied in the case of India, special representation should also be granted to the Non-Brahmins in the Madras Province.

On account of the various influences and factors mentioned above and admitted to a certain extent by the distinguished authors in the Joint Report, it is clear that general electorates will return only Brahmins. How can an orthodox Brahmin, with his caste exclusiveness and his supposed Divine origin really and effectually represent the Non-Brahmins? As long as caste system remains with all its present day concommitants, as long as the Brahmin remains on the holy citadel of aloofness from, and superiority to other communities, a general election on territorial basis will further perpetuate the class divisions, giving room for more latent antipathy, resentment and indignation between the two communities in the electoral campaigns. Therefore, it is idle to expect any spirit of citizenship or nationality to be developed in the people when the Non-Brahmins acutely feel that they are not sufficiently represented in the Council. They will be mere empty phrases when they give scope only for the formation of a close Brahmin oligarchy. We will have in the Madras Province a foreign but yet sympathetic bureaucracy replaced by a Brahmin oligarchy, which will be more rigid, exclusive, stereotyped and conservative. If the British Parliament really wants to train the peoples of India on the road to responsible government, the only effective way for the early realisation of the ideal is to grant communal electorates to backward communities. If they are not granted, it will result in discontentment of the vast masses of rural population. The very fact that, when all other minority communities are demanding for communal electorates, this minority community of the Brahmins, instead of demanding for separate electorates, oppose the same, because they are sure that most of the general seats can be very easily secured for them under the present conditions in Madras.

RESERVED SEATS.

Having made out a case that special safeguards should be provided for the effective representation of the Non-Brahmin communities of Madras Province, it is necessary to examine the method of reservation of seats in plural member constituencies suggested in lieu of communal electorates, and show how they do not satisfy the needs of the communities, for which special representation is considered necessary. In my memorandum submitted to the Franchise committee, I stated that reservation of a number of seats in plural-member constituencies is a half measure of very doubtful utility, for Non-Brahmin members returned from General Electoral Rolls through plural member constituencies cannot be real representatives of the Non-Brahmins, and they cannot be in a position to safeguard their interests adequately when they have to depend upon the sufferance of the mixed electorates in which the predominating influence will be exercised by what has been called the "politically minded community," consisting, as it does, at present mainly of the Brahmins.

OBJECTIONS TO RESERVED SEATS.

They are threefold :—

(a) Reservation of seats is opposed to the principles underlying responsible Government. A member returned through General Electoral Roll is not responsible to the community to which he belongs. In para. 189 of the Joint Report, the authors, in explaining this cardinal feature of Responsible Government, say that "Our objective is the realisation of Responsible Government. We understand this to mean, first, that the members of the Executive Government should be responsible to—because capable of being changed by—their constituents; and, secondly, that these constituents should exercise their power through the agency of their representatives in the Assembly." They further explain in para. 131 that "the electors send men to the Councils with power to act in their name, and the Councils commit power to Ministers, over whom they reserve control in the form of the power of removing them from office. The elector controls his Government, because, if his representative in Council supports Ministers of whom he disapproves he can at the next election change his representative." If a member of a certain community is elected by the mixed electorate, he is not the representative of that community alone, but the representative of all the communities that are included in the General Electoral Rolls. He is rather the general representative, but not a special representative of a certain community. Such representation cannot, by any stretch of imagination, be Communal Representation. So it is clear that that representative does not act in the name of the electors of that community, but acts in the name of all the electors in the General Electoral Roll. Further, the communal elector cannot change his communal representative returned through General Electoral Roll in the next election if the representative supports Ministers of whom he disapproves. If a communal representative desires to seek re-election, he naturally tries to satisfy, in the first instance, both the communal voters and the remaining general voters; and, in the second instance, only the general voters as against the communal voters, for he has to seek the sufferance once more of not only the communal electors, but also the general electors. It is also clear that in the case of a backward majority community like the Non-Brahmins, it is the "politically-minded" Brahmin community that decides its candidate. So, in the natural course of things, a communal representative cannot be responsible to the communal electors, but to the Brahmin electors who decide his fate in the next election. It is anomalous and illogical to call such a representative a communal representative. Therefore, a communal member returned through mixed constituencies may justify his name of a reserved member (seater)—i.e., he may be very reserved without openly expressing his views on the controversial questions of the day. It is extremely difficult for any self-respecting member of the Non-Brahmins to undertake this inconsistent responsibility, for he is responsible to his community, not because he is elected by the communal constituents, but because he is a member of the community, and he is responsible to the general constituents, for he has to seek their sufferance and their votes decide his fate. Thus a communal member has to discharge two conflicting responsibilities, and his position becomes inconvenient.

(b) Reserved seats may hamper the political education of politically and educationally backward communities like the Non-Brahmins. In Chapter VI, the conditions of the problem, the authors express their anxiety for the ryot and peasant, realising that they are very poorly equipped for politics, and it is highly necessary to impart political education to the ryot (paras. 136 and 146). In the Madras

Province, while the Brahmin is for advanced politics, the Non-Brahmins have yet to learn the alphabet of politics. A mixed electorate is not at all the best school to give political education to the Non-Brahmins or agricultural classes, because they will have no scope to receive political education when they are dragged behind the wheels of a more advanced community like the Brahmins, who always dabble in politics for more reasons than one. The South Indian Liberal Federation of Madras, in their memorandum to the Madras Government, stated that "communal electorate is a school of political education in which a comparatively slow and ill-organised community can best study its interests in relation to the interests of the country, and bring itself into line with other communities, so as to march side by side with them, and not be dragged on by any of them. A mixed electorate, even with provision for a certain number of a particular community being returned, gives no scope for a less assertive community to think and act for itself. It has to be content with allowing itself to be dragged behind the wheels of a more aggressive, but by no means a more patriotic, community." The result of the mixed electorates will be that they will not create any political consciousness in the less advanced Non-Brahmins, for they will not be induced to interest themselves in politics, as their attempts to gain political training will be frustrated by being dragged by more assertive and politically advanced Brahmins.

(c) Reserved seats do not return real representatives who can completely and effectively safeguard the interests of the Non Brahmins. The influences and circumstances that operate in returning Brahmin members in general electorates also work in equal degree in returning a Brahminised Non-Brahmin Member or a nominal Non-Brahmin representative for a reserved seat with a General Electoral Roll. On account of the Brahmin influence and power mentioned above, the provision of reserved seats with mixed electorates will lead to the following results also :—

(1) It may give rise to pacts or compacts between a Brahmin candidate and a Non-Brahmin candidate. A Non-Brahmin candidate, who is not liked by the majority of Non-Brahmin voters, may, with the help of a Brahmin candidate, by mutual exchange of support, be returned to the Council. Further these pacts will result in always returning a Brahmin candidate to the remaining seat or seats in plural-member constituences—i.e., these do not give room for a Non-Brahmin candidate to be returned to the general seat or seats.

(2) The Brahmins, being a well organised community, may en bloc vote for a Brahminised Non-Brahmin candidate, and thus turn the scale between two or more rival Non-Brahmin candidates. The packed voters may influence the elections in three ways :—

(i.) When there are more than two Non-Brahmin candidates for the same seat, the packed voting of the Brahmin electors alone may decide in favour of their own candidate without a single Non-Brahmin vote, for the Non-Brahmin votes are apt to be divided between the other rival candidates.

(ii.) Sometimes it may so happen that a few Brahmin votes may turn the scale in favour of a Non-Brahmin candidate upheld by the Brahmins, for the packed Brahmin vote with a few Non-Brahmin votes may form a majority.

(iii.) The Non-Brahmin voters, seeing that the Brahmin voters are en bloc voting to a certain candidate may be easily influenced to vote for that candidate—i.e., the packed voting of Brahmins may lure the Non-Brahmin voter to vote to that candidate alone.

In this connection I may meet one of the arguments advanced very often by the opponents of communal electorates. It is often stated that as long as the predominating influence of the Brahmins over the other communities exists they would exercise that influence to the same extent both in the communal electorates and mixed electorates to return Brahminised Non-Brahmins to the Councils. This argument does not hold good for a moment for two reasons :—

(a) In a communal electorate, the task of the Brahmin is an uphill one, for he has to rely upon only Non-Brahmin votes, and he has no Brahmin votes to start with. On the other hand, in a mixed electorate, the Brahmin can have a good start with the packed Brahmin votes, and his task is an easy one. It is this difference which actuates the Brahmin community to meddle in mixed electorates, so as to return Non-Brahmin puppets who can be danced to their tunes, and it is this that makes them abstain from interfering with the elections in communal electorates.

(b) In communal electorates the influence of the Brahmin is very much lessened on account of four considerations of factors—namely, Natural, Physical, Personal and Communal.

(i.) Natural.—In a communal electorate, the Brahmins have no votes and they have no concern. Human nature abhors meddling in the affairs of others in which he has no direct concern or interest.

(ii.) Physical.—It is difficult to constitute a polling booth for every village. A number of villages grouped together may have a polling booth which may be at a distant place. On the day of election, the Brahmin who is expected to influence certain voters may have some other business elsewhere. A Brahmin, having no vote, may not much care to go to the Non-Brahmin polling booth and influence the Non-Brahmin voter. On the other hand, in a mixed electorate the Brahmin who happens to go to the polling booth to exercise his vote does not like to keep quiet, but tries to influence others.

(iii.) Personal.—A Brahmin, who has a right to vote, in the natural course of things, exercises his vote to his best interests. He not only exercises his vote for his own interests, but influences Non-Brahmin voters to exercise their votes to his interests. It is natural for a voter to think that because he has the right to vote, he is called upon not only to exercise his vote, but also to influence others to vote in a certain manner.

(iv.) Communal.—In a mixed electorate, a Brahmin voter likes to exert his influence on others to the best interests of his community, because he has a right to vote, and because his community or communal members have the right to vote and a Brahmin non-voter tries to influence the Non-Brahmin voters, as his community exercises votes in the electorate. In a communal electorate the Brahmins have no place in voting and communally they feel that because their community has no vote, they should not bother themselves.

From the above observations it is clear that those who have no vote in the electorate altogether do not have the same zeal and earnestness, inclinations and opportunities for influencing the elections.

Further, the Pro-Brahmin Non-Brahmin representatives cannot effectively and completely safeguard the interests of the Non-Brahmins. Whenever the interests of the Brahmins and Non-Brahmins conflict they are sure to safeguard the interests of the former, or at least adopt a policy of non-interference or rather of benevolent neutrality. As long as caste reigns supreme in the Hindu social polity, and as long as socio-religious differences between various communities continue acutely, it is futile to expect the interests of all communities in India to be identical. When the interests conflict, how can a communal member returned through mixed electorates safeguard the interests of his community ? I may briefly mention here a few questions on which the interests of the Brahmins and Non-Brahmins are not identical :—.

(i.) Education.—They differ at the outset with regard to the policy to be adopted. While the Non-Brahmins demand for more attention to Primary and Secondary education, the Brahmins demand for more Universities and colleges. While the latter advocate more grants and subsidies to Sanskrit pathasalas and scholarships to Sanskrit students and Brahmin widows, the former advocate for more agricultural and technical schools and scholarships to agricultural and backward classes. It is very likely that there will be considerable divergence of opinion between the two communities on the question of female education, for a Brahmin girl is called upon to discharge the duties of a mother at a very early age. Questions relating to the admission of the untouchables into schools and colleges, recognition of Christian Missionary Schools and Colleges, introduction of religious education in the curricula of studies, and many others will arise in course of time, and there is no unanimity of opinion in these matters between the various communities. In this connection it may be stated that the education of Non-Brahmin youths has been much affected by the control of Brahmin principals and headmasters over hostels attached to colleges and schools, for they provide only vegetarian diet suited to the Brahmin students but not to the Non-Brahmin students, who are bred up from their infancy on non-vegetarian diet.

(ii.) Hereditary Village Karnams.—In the interests of the Non-Brahmin communities, it is highly necessary to do away with the hereditary inheritance of the village karnams, whose influence and power I have already described. They are, as a class, mostly found amongst Brahmins, and they are naturally anxious to preserve this important hereditary office in their community. A recent resolution in the Madras Legislative Council with regard to the travelling allowances to village officers, moved by a Brahmin member, is a step in that direction, for it is the Brahmin karnam that often visits the taluq centre.

(iii.) Public Services.—The attempts of Brahmin politicians to get cancelled Board Standing Order No. 128, clause (2), providing for the representation of all communities in the public services, and indirectly condemning the preponderance of a single community like the Brahmin in any branch of administration, the resolutions of Mr. T. Rangachari and other Brahmin members to get the Civil Courts Act so amended as to vest the power of appointing the Sub-judges in the High Court in which the Indian element is Brahminical, the advocacy of the Brahmins for open competition by mere literary test in all grades of services—all these are detrimental to the Non Brahmins, and are strongly opposed by them. There are also differences between the two communities with regard to the standard and tests required for different departments of public services.

(iv.) Religious Endowments.—It is a bare truth that the religious endowments, Chathram funds and other benefactions were mostly endowed by the Non Brahmins, but now utilised for the Brahmins, in the name of religion. In India religion plays a wonderful part. To stifle any attempt at reformation of the society the people are made to cry out that the religion is in danger. To direct the utilisation of certain endowments or funds they invoke the help of religion. The attempts of the Brahmin lawyers, politicians and officials have always been to direct these large endowments for the betterment of their own class in the name of religion and national culture.

(v.) In questions relating to occupancy rights in minor inams, allocation of village and town sites to the Untouchables or Depressed classes, Christians and Brahmins, homes exclusively for Brahmin widows and other subjects, there are differences of opinion.

A QUALIFIED DEMAND.

Our demand for communal electorates is a limited one, for we demand it for a short period, say, 25 or 30 years, as a "temporary expedient in a transitory stage" in which all communities and all classes, the humble ryot, the rural peasant and the ignorant cultivator may be trained to start on the road to the attainment of self-government. The Bill provides in Clause 28 for the appointment of a Periodic Statutory Commission for the purpose of inquiring into the development of representative institutions and other connected matters. So there will be scope for the said Commission to consider periodically the necessity for the retention of communal electorates

I understand Messrs. Chandiah, Chakkarai Chetty and Wadia were examined on behalf of the Madras Presidency Association, and deposed that the South Indian Liberal Federation was exaggerating the Brahmin influence. The Madras Presidency Association was brought into existence by the Brahmin politicians to counteract the work of our Federation. It is not a really representative body. Of the gentlemen examined by the Committee, Mr. Chandiah is a Brahmin convert to Christianity. Mr. Chakkarai Chetty is also a Christian and a brother-in-law of Mr. Chandiah. Mr. Wadia is a Parsee and Theosophist of Bombay. None of them can represent the Non-Brahmin Hindus of Madras.

THE URIYAS.

The Uriyas form a Minority Community in the Madras Province, their population being 1,604,321 They differ from their neighbouring Andhras in language, race, customs and manners. Not even a single Uriya was returned to the Madras Legislative Council through election from the time of the establishment of the elected Councils in India. Even in the Municipality of Berhampur they could not secure a single elected seat although they are in a majority. Considering their importance as a separate community and considering their vested interests, the Madras Government usually nominated an Uriya Zenimdar to represent them in the Councils. Under the present scheme the number of nominated seats will be so few that it is difficult to nominate an Uriya always. Further the Uriyas demand two elected representatives in the Councils. In para. 18 of the Franchise Report the Committee stated that claims for separate electorates were placed before them by the Uriyas of Madras, and they dispense with their demand by simply saying that they did not feel justified in admitting their claim, without assigning their reasons. The Uriyas of Madras will not be content with such a summary disposal of their claim for separate representation. The Anglo-Indians, numbering about 25,965, the Europeans, numbering about 12,692, were given each a separate seat, and Indian Christians, numbering 1,137,208 given three separate seats. So, it is just and reasonable that the Uriyas differing in language and race, and forming a minority community, should be protected by the grant of two separate seats.

CONCLUSION.

The question of Communal Electorates to the Non-Brahmins is a living one. It has stirred both the Communities in Madras. Non-Brahmin officials, traders, landed gentry and peasants are undergoing innumerable sufferings on account of this open demand of their Non-Brahmin leaders for their proper share of representation in the Councils and Public Services. They are enduring the harsh treatment meted out to them with patience, confiding in the even handed justice of the British Parliament, the Mother of all Parliaments and free Institutions.

If this provision of Communal Electorates is not inserted in the Bill by amending the Schedule, there will be transfer of power without adequate representation of the Non-Brahmins, resulting in oppression and tyranny of a majority by a minority, and the establishment of a Brahmin and exclusive oligarchy which is liable to crystallise itself into an adamantine rock on social, spiritual and esoteric foundations. The Non-Brahmins will be thoroughly dissatisfied with the Bill, and I am afraid that discord betweed the two Communities and discontentment will grow day by day. If this great Reform Scheme is to work smoothly for the betterment of the people at large, grant of Communal Electorates is the only means to attain that end.

APPENDIX V.

LETTER AND MEMORANDUM received from M. Ramachandra Rao and M. Chenchenyzer, representing Audhra Conference, on 25th August, 1919.

Sir,—Referring to your letter, dated 15th August, 1919, expressing the inability of the Joint Select Committee to give a hearing to us and desiring us to submit a memorandum on the subject for the consideration of the Committee, we have the honour to append hereto a memorandum containing the views of the Committee which we represent. The memorandum was presented to the Secretary of State and the Viceroy by an influential deputation from the 11 Telugu Districts of Madras Presidency, and contains the views of Telugu speaking people in that Presidency on the subject of the constitution of a separate Province for them. We have been asked to bring to the notice of the Joint Select Committee that in any Scheme of self-government a rearrangement of the Provinces on a linguistic basis is an essential reform for securing national solidarity. It is hardly necessary to point out that no Province in India, with the exception of Burma, represents a natural unit, and that the existing administrative divisions are so heterogenous as to prove a hindrance to good government. In fact, the authors of the joint report have in para. 246 dealt with this matter, and have expressed a clear opinion that a redistribution of provincial areas is necessary and should be effected by a process of consent of the people concerned. They also expressed the opinion that one of the earliest duties incumbent on the reformed provincial governments should be to test provincial opinion in regard to schemes directed to secure the redistribution.

2. In this connection we venture to invite attention of the Committee to Clause 12 of the Government of India Bill relating to the constitution of new provinces. The clause as drafted does not provide for the ascertainment of public opinion before a new province or a sub-province is constituted, nor does it contain any safeguards that the same form of administration as prevailing in the Province from which it is separated would be guaranteed to the new Province. We feel that the proposal for the appointment of a Deputy-Governor and the creation of Sub-Province is beset with difficulties. In the first place the clause does not define the relation between the executive of a major province and the executive of a minor province. We presume that a legislature will also be created for the minor province with subordinate powers of legislation. If this is the intention, various questions such as the powers of the two legislatures, the powers of representation of the minor province on the legislature of major province, the question whether the administration of the minor province will be entrusted to min sters, these and other questions arise for consideration. If it is the intention of the framers of the Bill that all these questions should be left to the decision of the Governor-General in Council, we see very strong objection to the clause as it stands. We therefore suggest that that portion of the clause as relates to the creation of sub-provinces under a deputy Governor should be deleted and that a new province should only be created when a Governor's province can be constituted with a local legislature such as that indicated in the Bill and with a Governor of the same status as that provided for in the Bill. Our Committee believe that the time is come for the constitution of a separate province for the Telugu Districts of the Madras Presidency and that the public feeling in the Districts concerned is ripe for such a change.

We request that the Joint Select Committee will be so good as to consider the views herein set out and those contained in Memorandum and to place them on the records of the proceedings of the Joint Committee so that the views of the Conference which we represent may be placed before Parliament.

We have the honour to remain,
Sir,
Your obedient servants,
M. RAMACHANDRA RAO,
pp. M. CHENCHENYZER.

To the Clerk to the Joint Committee, Government of India Bill.

MEMORANDUM.

The history of Indian administration under British rule reveals a steady growth in the number of provinces in the country, due alike to the gradual expansion of British territory and the need of its rearrangement for administrative purposes. The growth has, therefore, been chronological and was not based on any logical, linguistic or ethnic considerations. Warren Hastings' Regulation Provinces of Bombay, Bengal and Madras have now grown into 15 provinces differing from one another in area, population and importance, and in language, manners and customs. In the present arrangement of provinces, the Mahrattas are divided between Bombay, the Central Provinces and the Nizam's Dominions; the Telugus, between the Central Provinces, Nizam's Dominions, Mysore State and Madras Presidency; the Canarese, between Madras Presidency, Mysore State and Bombay; the Uriyas, between Madras and Behar Provinces and till recently, Central Provinces. Such an arrangement clearly indicates that the grouping was haphazard and that neither ideals of administrative efficiency, nor those of national upbuilding have ever operated in its determination.

2. Nevertheless, there have arisen individual administrators, from time to time, who have had the perspicacity to discover the error in the existing territorial divisions and sketched a correct plan of distribution. Sir John Strachey pointed out that "the political limits of the provinces have little connection with any physical characteristics." Sir Thomas Holderness, observes that "with the exception of Burma, no province represents a natural unit; that is to say, the provinces do not stand for differences of race or language or geographical distribution. They are purely administrative divisions of territory." Sir Bampfylde Fuller wrote, "It would have been well for the country, had its divisions into provinces for purposes of government followed the lines marked by race and language, so as to re-inforce the sympathy which arises from similarity, by feelings of pride in the local government. The existing administrative divisions are so heterogeneous as to have a directly contrary effect." In 1870, Sir George Chesney advocated the constitution of Orissa into a separate province, and in 1900 Sir Francis Younghusband urged the necessity of giving to Sindh a distinct Provincial administration.

3. The object of such a re-organisation would, in the first place, be to develop that sub-national spirit which, in a properly constituted province, as pointed out by Sir Thomas Holderness, is not far removed from the beginning of national life. The upbuilding of the Indian nation is only possible on a plan of federation in which each provincial factor shall occupy a sub-national position. To secure this end, the Provinces should be homogeneous and be devoid of elements that lead to inequality of progress, so that, various subordinate centres of self consciousness may come into existence, around which, national life groups itself into distinct units. A clear stretch of contiguous territory, a common language and literature, common traditions and deep down a strong similarity of temper and character—these would constitute an adequate title for the different language—bound communities to be outlined each into a single entity and accorded all those communal and political institutions which illustrate and feed that unity. The existing conglomeration of peoples and provinces has not permitted the creation of such Provincial entities. Pride in local government has not been developed in adequate measure. Local patriotism which, in proper relationship to the larger national consciousness, ought to be "the only safe and sure incentive to right political execution," has not been duly fostered. Again, the present arrangement has manifestly resulted in impairing efficiency of administration by entrusting the administration of the province to men who have had to learn more than one language in the same province. The location, too, of the seat of authority and the centre of influence in one part of the province as against another, has resulted in markedly diminishing the influence of some communities and even denying them certain opportunities for self-development.

4. Some of the evils, notably those which have made administration cumbersome and inefficient, have been recognised by the authorities. The British administrator, however, has not so far paused to consider schemes of constructive re-organisation put forward by the nation-builder. Such events, as the Partition of Bengal, the addition of Assam to East Bengal at one time, and the coupling of Orissa with Behar are instances which prove the absence of true political insight in him in working out changes of real moment and magnitude. On 3rd December, 1902, Lord Curzon's Government wrote:— "The question of territorial and administrative redistribution of India is indeed, in our judgment, one of the most urgent and vital of the many problems for which we are at present endeavouring to find a solution." For the first time, however, a right solution was attempted by the Government of Lord Hardinge when they re-united the five Bengali speaking divisions into one province and integrated the Hindi speaking population of Behar and Chota Nagpur into another. But Orissa was tacked on to Behar, only because the Government of the day had not the imagination to take on hand a comprehensive scheme of reform affecting the whole country.

5. The fault did not lie with the Government alone. Popular ideals had not taken shape, and no constructive plan of Indian Nationality or of Indian Self-Government had been evolved, till the need for this emphasis upon the place and function of language was recognised as of paramount importance. Even the foremost men of the country advocated a re-union of Bengal as a remedy for the evils of Partition; and beneath all the persistent protests against this enforced dismemberment, one looks in vain for any large-eyed policy of territorial reorganisation. Likewise Behar's plea for separation was more for its advancement in education and influence than for integration as a part of a comprehensive scheme. More in tune, indeed, with the idealism of the present day, was the public opinion that faintly expressed itself when the Berars wished to be added to the Maharashtra, though any larger scheme of reorganization was not then enunciated. Latterly the Uriyas, the Sindhis and the Canarese have also put forward claims to separate provincial integration. The Andhra movement however, aiming at the construction of the whole country on linguistic lines, is the first organised effort, working as a true reflex of the larger national ideal.

6. Lord Hardinge's despatch (25–8–1911) laid down that a settlement of boundaries, in order to be satisfactory and conclusive, should provide convenient administrative units. These are at once furnished by contiguous tracts of country, where the people speak a common language. That is why Lord Hardinge had begun the annulment of the partition with a decision to "reunite the five Bengali speaking divisions, and form them into a presidency to be administered by a Governor-in-Council." Again, in paragraph 19, he proceeds to say, "We are satisfied that it is in the highest degree desirable to give the Hindi speaking people, now included within the Province of Bengal, a separate administration. These people have hitherto been unequally yoked with the Bengalees and have never, therefore, had a fair opportunity for development."

As a second principle, His Lordship also declared that "The settlement should satisfy the legitimate aspirations of the people." During the last few years, a new consciousness had dawned upon the people that opportunities for self development, scope for civic discipline, chances for the cultivation of one's own language and literature, and above all conditions for effectual provincial autonomy, could exist only when each language-area has a scheme of administration wholly unto itself. Recognising this, Lord Hardinge writes in para. 19, as follows: "There has, moreover, been a very marked awakening in Behar in recent years and a strong belief has grown up among the Beharees that Behar will never develop until it is disassociated from Bengal." And Lord Hardinge recognises another factor, when he writes in paragraph 12, "No doubt, sentiment has played a considerable part in the opposition offered by the Bengalees and in saying this, we, by no means under the importance which would be attached to sentiment, even if it be exaggerated.

"The settlement should be clearly based upon broad grounds of political and administrative expediency." What Lord Hardinge's Government intended by it is made clear from paragraph 12:—"As matters now stand, the Bengalees can never exercise in either province that influence to which they consider themselves entitled by reason of their numbers, wealth and culture. This is a substantial grievance which will be felt all the more keenly in course of time as the representative character of the Legislative Council increases, and with it, the influence which these assemblies exercise upon the conduct of public affairs. There is, therefore, only too much reason to believe that this bitterness of feeling will become more and more acute." Another sentence in the despatch emphasises the same idea, where it is said, "that belief among the Beharees (that Behar will never develop until it is disassociated from Bengal) will, unless a remedy be found, give rise to agitation in the near future and the present is an admirable opportunity to carry out, on our own initiative, a thoroughly sound and much deserved change." A comprehensive scheme of reform is now advocated to bring about similar changes all over on the lines indicated in annexure II.

7. The advantages of such a rearrangement are obvious. The removal of the evils already out-lined brings, in its train, results of great value to the progress of the country. The ideal of provincial autonomy would have the surest chance of fulfilment only in homogeneous provinces. In them alone would solidarity of feeling and pride in Local Government develop, and the people thereof having a common language and literature, and inspired by common traditions, would be best able to examine their civic laws and social institution from a common standpoint and judge of their common need for reform and legislation. Lord Hardinge's scheme of Provincial autonomy would bring into existence separate, stable self contained and self-reliant States, in which no one community could retard another in its progress. It is only thus that "All the nationalities in India would be simultaneously started on the road to self-development and ultimate self-government. Those, which advance rapidly, would be given greater facilities and would necessarily be more independent than those that lagged. No greater facilities could be given to the peoples of India than the fostering of local patriotism by the construction of a new map of India on an ethnological and linguistic basis and the consequent friendly inter-racial competition for civilised progress and ultimate autonomy."

8. The organisation of Indian provinces, on natural and linguistic lines, forms but the first step in the achievement of that provincial unity, which is essential to the perfect flowering of Indian nationalism. For the singleness of political administration would prove of no farther significance, if it did not avail itself of those vital forces which sustain and develop communal life among a people. And any Government to be fruitful of those benefits which all Goverments exist, must, in the daily business of administration, relate itself intimately to the life and habits of the people, whom it seeks to govern. Administration is really no more mechanical than education depending for its success in a very vital measure, on the inner psychology of relations between the governing and the governed. One great defect of British administration in India would appear to be the lack of correspondence between the mind of the English rulers and of the Indian people between the demand for organisation and the impulse to respond. Thus, though essentially democratic in temper, the British scheme of Government has lain on its Indian subject races with the weight of arbitrary bureaucracy, while on the other hand, it has found its task of administration peculiarly hard and unsatisfactory, even with a people who have been for ages accustomed to democratic forms and institutions of self-government.

9. One important reason for such small measure of success is doubtless the fact that the daily administration is carried on in a language not understood by the people. The increasing employment of English educated Indian interpreters has never proved any real palliative to the evil of government in a foreign language. For, where the fountain of authority is foreign in personnel, the more faithfully and efficiently the task of interpretation is discharged, the more completely does the administration retain its impress of an alien character. So that, government by the English educated Indian has often-times proved itself as an un-Indian in tone and temper, as that by European officers uninformed of the ways of Indian life. Things seem to have been somewhat better, if not radically different, in the days when European administrators learnt the language of the land and were more intimately in touch with the habits and characteristics of the people.

10. But with the universal acceptance of English as the language of administration has come into being a body of English officials with set notions of how to govern India, and a great army of English educated Indians, who function only as passive media for the transference of ideas from the really governing to the vast mass of the governed. These Indian officials, without any power of initiative, have had only the result of putting further away from the vision of the rulers the real people of the land, so shutting off that natural exchange of influences which ought to exist between the governing and the governed. The few Indians in the higher ranks of service have had absolutely no influence in altering the tone and temper of the administration. While Indian opinion in the Legislative Councils has perhaps helped to moderate the rigour of English ideas, it has failed in its essential purpose, because it did not clearly enough realise or interpret the needs of Indian life. If this explanation be right, the one and only remedy must be in the complete adoption of the vernacular as the language of administration in the land, and in the necessary modification of the personnel of government at least to the limit of the District administration in accordance therewith. But this does not mean that, in th sphere of the hightest government the use of English would not prove essential both in the interest of the uniform evolution of national administration in the land and for the dominance of the finer tradition of the British Raj. But allowing for the inevitable supremacy of both language and personnel in the highest sphere of executive government the fountain sources of legislation and administration must be laid entirely in the realm of the vernacular, rendering possible the freest and fullest discussion of all vital problems of public interest, and their publication, as deep and wide, as would be necessary to reach the millions toiling in the Indian villages.

11. Such dominance of the vernacular in administration is bound to make it infinitely easier, more satisfactory, and more efficient, by enlisting on the side of good government the whole force of popular will, where it is substantially in agreement with the will of the executive, by facilitating a full and clear understanding by the people of the purpose and value of the various reforms to be introduced, and by ensuring natural and substantial justice, effecting incalculable saving in time and money, and ultimately by simplifying law and procedure in harmony with the social instincts of an essentially agricultural race. Thus, in many known and unknown ways, the introduction of this reform would make the British Government the nearest approach to a truly national institution springing from the heart of the people and deriving in strength, not from an objective fountain of power, but from the moral and emotional relation of its fundamental unity with the highest interests of national life.

12. Then, again, there is the general proposition, which has found acceptance with all classes of thinkers, that the children of a race would be best educated in and through their own mother tongue; but the full significance of the fact would be realised only when, in a rightly constituted province, the full vigour of national life expresses itself in a rich and varied glorification of the vernacular. The evil of forcing an alien language on the people has served to dry up, at their sources, the very fountain-springs of national power. A century of European education has left the Indian mind richer by a new language but seriously impoverished on the side of initiative and originality. The very extent of apparent success which has attended this tremendous educational experiment may really be accounted as the measure of its failure from the point of view of the evolution of a true national culture. And if it be true that the individuality of a people's culture is their greatest treasure in the eye of humanity, that nothing may weaken or destroy, then surely the primary duty of Government would lie in the restoration, to each vernacular, of that dominance which English now holds over all. For, if a culture is to be constantly replenished and kept alive as a growing entity, the language, which is its vehicle, must be accepted as the one medium of self-expression. Provinces so reorganised, become at once distinctive and potent states, federated together to constitute the mighty Indian Nationality of the future. As separate, self-governing states, acknowledging a suzerian power over themselves, they prepare the vast continent for that ultimate autonomy, which has been acknowledged as the ideal. The demand for self-government, safeguarded and exalted by the high ideal underlying the scheme of reorganisation, would not be exposed to the cavil that it emanates from the self-seeking classes; for, on the plan on which it is designed, it develops a policy beaten out into harmony with the needs of the nation, and serves primarily and for ever the requirements of the millions that toil. Again, provinces thus organised and strengthened would enjoy legitimate opportunities for independent self-development and foster distinctive tributary cultures, whose commingling enriches the central stream of national life; and while there is no antagonism between the consciousness of a separate sub-nationality and national pride and patriotism, modern thought and experience agree in the conclusion that nationalism would surely be counted highest which is compounded of the finest contrasts within the unity of one culture type. From whatever view-point the problem of India's future may be examined, the conclusion is irresistible that for a solution to be final and satisfactory the statesmen in India should display great imagination and courage and carve out natural self-contained provinces, each sustained by a thought of internal unity and organised on a self-governing basis, and all held together and uplifted by a common ambition to realise the individual soul in a life larger and diviner than its own.

ANNEXURE IV.

RESOLUTIONS ON THE QUESTION OF THE ANDHRA PROVINCE.

FIRST CONFERENCE.

Resolution :—

That as some of the Andhras are of opinion

(1) That to ensure efficient administration and the promotion of the best interests of the people of India, the Government will, sooner or later, have to make language areas the territorial basis of provincial administration ;

(2) And that provincial administration on such a basis is necessary in order that both the Self-Government on colonial lines pleaded for by the Indian National Congress and the provincial autonomy approved of by the Government of India may develop on healthy and natural lines, this Conference requests the Andhra Conference Committee, now appointed, to ascertain public opinion on the question whether the Government should be asked to constitute the Telugu Districts into a separate province.

(Sd.) B. N. SARMA,
President.

SECOND CONFERENCE.

Resolution :—

(i) That to ensure the efficient administration and the promotion of the best interests of the people of India, language areas have to be made the territorial basis of provincial administration as far as possible ;

(ii) That provincial administration on such a basis is essential to the fulfilment of the ideals of self-government enunciated by the Congress and of provincial autonomy foreshadowed by the Government of India ;

(iii) That this Conference is of opinion that it is desirable to constitute the Telugu speaking areas of the Madras Presidency into a province : and

(iv) That this Conference urges that public opinion be focussed on this matter by the formation of leagues and other means.

(Sd.) N. SUBBA RAO,
President.

THIRD CONFERENCE.

Resolution :—

(a) That to ensure efficient administration and the promotion of the best interests of the people of India, language areas have to be made the territorial basis of provincial administration as far as possible ;

(b) That provincial administration on such a basis is essential to the fulfilment of the ideals of self government enunciated by the Congress, and of provincial autonomy foreshadowed by the Government of India ; and

(c) That it is proper and necessary to constitute the Telugu districts in the Presidency into a separate province.

(Sd.) P. RAMARAYAN,
President.

FOURTH CONFERENCE.

Resolution :—

This Conference is of opinion

That in order to ensure efficient administration, to promote the best interests of the people, and for the fulfilment of the ideals of self-government in India and as a practical measure for realisation of these ideals, the division of provinces should be based as far as possible on the principle of language ;

That provincial administration on such basis is essential to the fulfilment of the ideals of self government enunciated by the Indian National Congress and of Provincial Autonomy fore-shadowed by Lord Hardinge in his Despatch dated the 25th of August, 1911 ;

That it is proper and necessary to constitute all the Telugu districts into a separate province ;

And this Conference, therefore, resolves that the Government be requested to create such a province as early as possible after the termination of the war.

(Sd.) M. RAMACHANDRA RAO,
President.

FIFTH CONFERENCE.

Resolution :—

This Conference is of opinion

That in order to ensure efficient administration, to promote the best interests of the people, and for the fulfilment of the ideals of self-government in India and as a practical measure for realisation of these ideals, the division of provinces should be based, as far as possible, on the principle of language ;

That Provincial administration of such basis is essential to the fulfilment of the ideals of self-government enunciated by the Indian National Congress and of Provincial Autonomy foreshadowed by Lord Hardinge in his Despatch dated the 25th of August, 1911 ;

That it is proper and necessary to constitute all the Telugu districts into a separate province;

And this Conference, therefore, resolves that the Government be requested to create such a province as early as possible after the termination of the war.

(Sd.) K. VENKATAPPAYYA,
President.

SPECIAL CONFERENCE.

Resolution :—

This Conference is of opinion

(1) That in order to ensure efficient administration, to promote the best interests of the people, and for the fulfilment of the ideals of self-government in India and as a practical measure for the realisation of these ideals, the division of the provinces should be based, as far as possible, on the principle of language;

(2) That Provincial administration on such a basis is essential to the fulfilment of the ideals of self-government enunciated by the Indian National Congress and of Provincial Autonomy foreshadowed by Lord Hardinge in his Despatch dated 25th of August, 1911;

(3) That it is proper and necessary to constitute all the Telugu districts into a separate province;

(4) And therefore this Conference prays the Secretary of State for India and the Government of India to create such province as soon as possible.

APPENDIX W.

MEMORANDUM Handed in by Mr. Sapru on 26th August, 1919 (See Question 7243).

I am in favour of the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India, and I generally accept the proposition contained in the preamble of the Bill introduced into Parliament. I have, however, one doubt. It seems to me that the second clause of the preamble is not sufficiently wide to provide for the extension of responsible government in the Central Government. The preamble as it is worded restricts the introduction of responsible government to the Provinces only. Even if it be finally decided to try the experiment for the time being in the Provinces, I should widen the scope of the Bill so as to provide for responsibility in the Central Government, in due course, without fresh legislation. In my opinion, however, it is necessary and desirable to introduce some element or form of responsibility into the Central Government simultaneously with responsible government in the Provinces. I would suggest that subjects such as salt, income-tax, railways, posts and telegraphs might be made transferred subjects, subject, of course, to certain reservations in regard to the last three, so far as they affect military considerations. It also seems to me that it would be possible to place a Minister in charge of those subjects, which, in the Provinces, would be transferred subjects.

With regard to the Central Government, I would also urge that the number of Indian members of the Executive Council should be equal to that of the European members.

With regard to the Provinces, I would, in particular, refer to two questions, viz., (a) the transfer of certain subjects, and (b) the subject of the divided purse.

As to (a), I think that the transfer of subjects to popular control in the Provinces should be on a liberal scale, but whatever other subjects may or may not be transferred, I strongly urge that Education as a whole should be immediately transferred. On this subject I stand firmly by the recommendations of the Feetham Committee, of which I was a member, and I regret that I am wholly unable to accept the views of the Government of India in regard to this matter. I think that it would be a fatal mistake to divide Education into water-tight compartments. It should be treated as a whole. I do not wish to say anything as to the transfer of primary education, as the Government of India are agreed that it should be a transferred subject. It is particularly with regard to secondary, technical, and higher education (including medical education) that I wish to emphasise that they should be transferred. The Government of India have had the control of these branches of education for over sixty years, and although I am prepared to recognise what they have done in regard to them, I am bound to say that from the national point of view the result has been very unsatisfactory. In my opinion, these branches of education have suffered, first, because funds adequate to the growing needs of the country have not been found; secondly, because the whole system has been too mechanical and lifeless, and ill-adapted to the social and economic development of the people; thirdly, because of the poor quality of the teaching agency in schools and colleges; and fourthly, because during the last 15 or 20 years educational questions in India have not been decided on purely educational grounds but upon ultimate considerations of political expediency. I strongly object to education being mixed up with politics, official or non-official. Under the present system of control, it is impossible to hope that the educational expert will come into his own. As it is, the final decision on educational policy rests with the Secretariats. I am not prepared to admit that the present system is efficient, and that the transfer to popular control will make it less efficient. At present, the whole controversy between the official and the non-official view centres round the question of expansion versus improvement. At the back of the Indian mind lies the feeling that expansion has been disfavoured by the Government because of political considerations, and that is what is largely responsible for the suspicious attitude of the general public towards the educational policy of the Government. Whilst I am strongly in favour of quality being improved, I do not think it is impossible to increase the quantity pari passu. This will, however, involve considerable financial outlay, and it may be necessary to continue to be a reserved subject, there will be considerable difficulty in financing it. I may add that it is beyond doubt that Indians are prepared to find more money for education when and if they feel that they have the power to control educational policy. I need only refer to the large donations that have been made by the general public and the Princes in India for the establishment of the Benares Hindu University, and also by the Mahomedans for that of a Muslim University. Apart from this, large donations have been made in the past in almost every Province by private individuals for the advancement of secular education. I do not think that there is any force in the contention that the transfer of the subject will lead to the lowering of the standards. The Feetham Committee have provided what I submit are ample safeguards against any such danger. The question of education is pre-eminently a national one, and vitally affects the life of the people in every aspect. If we are to qualify ourselves for full responsible government, the training of the younger generation should be left in our hands. In any case, applying to it the tests laid down in para. 238 of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, it seems to me that education in all its branches is a fit subject for transfer, and that, if this does involve risks, they are well worth taking. I would add that most of the educational experts who appeared before the Feetham Committee supported the transfer of education as a whole. Speaking with special reference to the United Provinces, from which I come, I would say that the present head of the Government, Sir Harcourt Butler, who was formerly the Education Member of the Government of India, supported such transfer. In the United Provinces the record of the Government in regard even to primary education has not been good, and in regard to technical education we have had a series of disappointments. The question of a Technological Institute at Cawnpore was taken up so far back as the time of Sir John Hewitt, and it has not yet been solved.

I now come to the subject of the divided purse. In my opinion, the divided purse is undesirable for the following reasons:—(i) It will leave no point of contact between the two divisions of the Government. (ii.) It will leave the Legislature without effective control over either section of the Budget. (iii.) Instead of fosterin a spirit of give-and-take between the two divisions of the Government it will promote friction. (iv.) From the taxpayer's point of view, it is desirable that there should be a single authority who should raise the taxes for provincial purposes. (v.) The system of diarchy is only a temporary expedient, and ultimately all subjects must be transferred. It is therefore desirable that the two divisions of the Government should, during the transitional period, understand each other's difficulties and point of view.

With reference to the transfer of the subject of industrial development and the position of the Minister in relation to the Government and the Governor, I have nothing to add to the recommendations of the Feetham Committee, save that, in my opinion, the status of the Governors of the United Provinces, the Punjab, and Behar and Orissa and the method of their appointment should not differ in any respect from that of those of Bengal, Madras and Bombay.

APPENDIX X.

MEMORANDUM submitted to the Joint Select Committee on the GOVERNMENT OF INDIA BILL (1919) and connected matters by the Deputation of the All-India Conference of the Moderate Party, on 28th July, 1919 (See Question 1039).

1. INTRODUCTION.—The signatories to this Memorandum are members of a deputation appointed under the authority of an All-India Conference of the moderate Party held in Bombay on the 1st and 2nd November, 1918, "to urge on British statesmen, members of both Houses of Parliament, political associations, the Press, and the British Public generally, the wisdom and necessity of supporting the Montagu-Chelmsford Reform Scheme and giving legislative effect to it at an early date, with such modifications and improvements as have been formulated or suggested" in the Resolutions of the Conference.

2. GENERAL ATTITUDE.—We have supported in the main the Joint Report of the Secretary of State and the Viceroy, and we would regard it as a substantial first step towards the progressive realisation of responsible government in India if its proposals be adopted without curtailment. At the same time we advocate certain modifications and improvements in the scheme which seem to us desirable and in certain cases necessary to make it yield the utmost results of which it is capable.

3. DIARCHY.—We are aware of the objections advanced againt diarchy or dual government by its critics. But we have not come across any alternate proposals which, while avoiding dual government, at the same time fulfil the terms of the deblaration of policy made by His Majesty's Government on 20th August, 1917. We have accepted the decision reached in the Joint Report that the progressive realisation of responsible government could be attained only by dividing the fuuctions of Provincial Governments into two parts, one to be administered by a Minister or Ministers responsible to a legislature with a substantial majority of elected members, the other by the Executive somewhat on the present footing. We have accepted the decision as satisfactory because the Secretary of State and the Viceroy have proposed several safeguards expressly for the purpose of minimising the inconveniences of dual government during the transition period. According to the scheme the two parts of the Government are to meet together frequently. All subjects that overlap and all subjects of capital importance should be decided at meetings of the whole Government. In the legislature and before the public the Government is to present a united front. All orders of either half of the Administration are to issue in the name of the whole Government. In particular the Budget is to be a common subject. The resources of the Province and all its revenues, whether derived from taxation or executive measures like revision of land assessment or increased licence fees, are to be the common possession of the Executive Council and the Ministers, subject, no doubt, to certain fixed charges like the contribution to the Central Government. Taxation is to be a transferred subject, and must be approved by the Minister in charge, but every proposal under this head is to be made under the authority of the whole Government. We are convinced that, tempered in these ways, diarchy is a practicable plan, and when it is remembered that it is intended only for the transitional period the objections to it cease to be in any way formidable.

4. THE ALTERNATIVE SCHEME.—The scheme propounded by five heads of Local Governments as a substitute for that of the Joint Report is open to the objection that it lacks the element of responsibility. Further, it does not make any provision for future stages of progress towards responsible government and vests too great a discretionary power in the Governor over the entire field of administration.

5. THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA'S RECOMMENDATIONS.—In their letter of 5th March, 1919, the Government of India have made many proposals in modification of the original scheme. We will first summarise the more important of these proposals before making any comment thereon.

1. The heads of the five Provinces which have had Civilian Governors should continue to be chosen from the Indian Services.

2. Where the Governor is a non-Civilian, there should be two European members of the Executive Council, not one as proposed in the Joint Report.

3. A thorough division of finances should be effected between the Executive Council and the Ministry. The balances, the yearly surplus, the sources of income or taxation should all be apportioned between the two halves. Both must have powers of taxation and borrowing. One half may make good the deficiency in the Budget of the other half, according to a scale agreed upon. The Budgets should also be separate. For instance, no resolution may be moved cutting down the provision for a reserved subject in order to increase the provision for a transferred subject.

4. The resolutions of the Legislative Council on the reserved Budget or on the transferred Budget are not to be binding on the Government.

5. Taxation proposals made by the Executive Council may be removed to the Grand Committee.

6. In the interval between the dismissal of a Minister and the appointment of his successor the Governor may take over the administration of the transferred departments.

7. In case a Council is dissolved by the Governor and the succeeding Council does not agree with him, he may resume the transferred subjects with the sanction of the Secretary of State and have them administered by the Executive Council.

8. Joint deliberation of the two parts of the Government should not be ordinarily resorted to.

Every Government order should be issued in a form which will show clearly from which part it emanates.

9. No fresh transfer of subjects should be made at the end of five years.

10. The composition of the Grand Committee should reflect that of the present Legislative Councils. (The proposals on this point have since been modified by the Government of India by the reduction of the Grand Committee to 33⅓ per cent. of the total strength of the Provincial Legislatures.—Vide Letter No. 5 of the Government of India, dated 28th May, 1919.)

11. The Governor should have power to certify any Bill on a reserved subject, not merely a Bill on a reserved subject falling within certain categories mentioned in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report.

12. The Legislative Council should not be allowed to appeal against the Governor's certificate to the Governor-General in Council.

13. The Governor should decide which departments are to have Standing Committees, and which matters are to be placed before them.

14. The appointment of Under-Secretaries should be optional. They may be chosen from the nominated or elected section, and they are to draw no salaries.

15. In the Government of India there should be no Standing Committees and no Under-Secretaries.

6. THE EFFECT OF THE RECOMMENDATIONS.—A perusal of the above list is sufficient, in our judgment, to show that, even if only a part of the recommendations be adopted, the effect will be such a great curtailment of the scope and value of the Scheme originally proposed as to make it unacceptable even to its supporters, and also to make it almost unworkable. In fact the publication of the letter of the Government of India of the 5th March and of their letters reviewing the reports of the Southborough Committees has already had a depressing effect on the public mind of India, which has recently been much agitated by other causes. In paragraph 7 of the letter of the 5th March the Government of India say: "It has been no purpose of ours either to whittle down the scheme or to expand it. We take the scheme in the report as one which, in all its essentials, has our full adherence; and our sole aim has been to translate it into a working plan which while free from obvious defects, will be in accord with the policy of His Majesty's Government." We confess we fail to see how this claim can be seriously made for these proposals. Among other things, they make the position of the Minister virtually impossible by, on the one hand, making him responsible to the Legislature, and, on the other, reducing him to the level of an agent of the Governor; and secondly, by denying to the Legislature even a modicum of financial control which lies at the root of all constitutional power, they leave nothing but the name of responsible government in a scheme designed to "realise" it in redemption of the promise of His Majesty's Government.

7. IMMEDIATE MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILTY.—The original scheme allowed a period of six years (the life-time of two Councils) during which the Minister would not be removable by the Legislature. The Government of India have recommended that the responsibility should be there from the very start, and the Secretary of State has embodied the change in the Bill. We should gladly accept this modification as being in advance of the proposal in the Scheme provided it were accompanied by its logical corollary, namely, endowing the Minister with the power requisite for the fulfilment of his responsibility. In the Scheme itself it was explicitly stated (para. 239): "We do not contemplate that from the outset the Governor should occupy the position of a purely constitutional Governor who is bound to accept the decisions of his Ministers." The position is made worse by the proposals of the Government of India and clause 3 of the Bill. As the Bill provides that from the start the Minister is to be responsible to the Legislature in the sense that he is removable by its adverse vote, it should logically follow that the position of the Governor should be that "of a purely constitutional Governor who is bound to accept the decisions of his Minister," and we urge that the provisions of the Bill be amended accordingly.

8. THE POSITION OF THE MINISTER.—Neither the Joint Report nor the letter of the 5th March enable us to understand with the Minister's salary should be left, as it is in clause 3 (1) of the Bill, to be determined by the Governor with the sanction of the Secretary of State. It is important that the clause should declare that the salary of the Minister shall be the same as that of a member of the Executive Council.

The Minister's responsibility is rendered difficult for two reasons. First, he has to work with officers not of his choice, nor under his complete control, but who have access to the Governor and may invoke his intercession. Secondly, the Governor is held responsible in the last resort for the welfare of his Province, and has power to direct the Minister to take action against his judgment in certain circumstances specified in the Instrument of Instructions. These limitations, we trust, are to last only for a short period, and the Governor will soon assume the constitutional position of having to accept the advice of his Minister. In the event of his dismissing a Minister and being unable to find a successor, he may dissolve the Legislature. But, if the new House take the same view of the matter in dispute as the old, the Governor must have a clear instruction to yield. The recommendation made by the Government of India that even then the Governor should be empowered to carry out his will by resuming the transferred subjects, if need be, is likely to lead to disastrous results, and will not, we trust, receive any countenance. A general election in the circumstances assumed is in reality an appeal to the judgment of the constituencies on a more or less clearly defined issue, and that judgment must be loyally accepted by the Govenor.

The fact that the Governor is a member of his Executive Council and is intimately associated with its members in the administration of the reserved subjects should make him extremely careful how he interferes with the work of the Minister. As a resolution of the Moderates Conference has it:

"Whatever power may be given to the Governor in Council to interfere with the decisions of the Governor and Ministers on the ground of their possible effects on the administration of the reserved subjects, corresponding power should be given to the Governor and Ministers in respects of the decisions of the Governor in Council affecting, directly or indirectly, the administration of the transferred subjects."

We are aware that, since this resolution was passed, the idea of interference with the Minister by the Governor in Council has been replaced by the idea of interference by the Governor acting singly. But this is an improvement in form only, and does not remove the occasion for our pointing out the essential disadvantages of the Minister's position when compared with that of the Executive Councillor.

9. PROVINCIAL EXECUTIVE COUNCILS.—The Bill, following the advice of the Government of India, keeps the numbers of members of the Executive Councils at four. We note that the Secretary of State says in his explanatory memorandum that ordinarily there will be one European and one Indian, but that, if a second European be in any case appointed, a second Indian will be likewise appointed. We would, however, press the original idea of reducing the number to two, one to be a European and one to be an Indian, and this should be embodied in the Bill. Briefly stated, our grounds are these:—

(1) It has never been found necessary in any Province to appoint four members.

(2) After the appointment of a Minister or Ministers, even three members of the Executive Council will be too many.

(3) As more subjects are transferred, the need for more members will be even less.

(4) The retention of the provision for the appointment of four members of the Executive Council may be urged as a serious ground for resisting the transfer of subjects in the future and increasing the number of Ministers.

10. JOINT PURSE versus SEPARATE PURSE.—The arguments against the Joint Purse as propounded in paras. 65 et seq. of the Government of India's letter of 5th March, 1919, might appear cogent if applied to a scheme under which there would be a permanent separation between reserved and transferred subjects. But this distinction between the official and the popular part of the Government is only a temporary makeshift, leading up to eventual absorption of the reserved subjects to be controlled by a common machinery. That being so, it is desirable during the transition period to associate the two wings as far as possible as contemplated in para. 256 of the Reform Scheme. We would also refer to para. 246 in which it is stated that "wisdom lies not in equipping each of the different elements with a complete and separate paraphernalia of its own and trusting to their orbits lying sufficiently apart for collisions to be avoided, but in taking every opportunity of bringing the two elements into contact so as to induce the habits of joint action." And in para. 256 of the Report a "financial settlement" as between reserved and transferred heads was condemned as unduly rigid and provocative of friction. The fact that each settlement was made binding for a series of years would not prevent its being constantly attacked if it was thought to lead to the undue endowment of reserved subjects at the necessary cost of the transferred.

The Joint Purse arrangement as explained in para. 257 of the Report is decidedly preferable. Its main advantages are that:—

(1) It closely associates the two wings of the Government and permits Ministers to put forward objections to any proposed increased allotment, for reserved heads in view of the claims of the transferred while, on the other hand, Ministers get an opportunity for appreciating the necessities of the reserved subjects.

(2) The members of the Executive Council, and above all the Governor, with whom the decision must rest in the event of the two wings of his Government being at issue, are not likely to belittle popular demand for expansion of outlay on transferred heads, pressed as this is bound to be in the Legislative Councils, and there is therefore less likelihood of friction occuring under the Joint Purse system than under a system of Separate Purse, which would at the very start give rise to acute opposition to the proposals of Government on the part of the Legislature.

(3) The interests of the reserved subjects will not suffer by the whole Budget being submitted to the vote of the Legislative Council. They will be further safeguarded by the Governor being able, if he thinks it necessary, to restore any allotment which may have been cut down by the Legislative Council, while the fact that additional taxation must be proposed by a responsible Minister makes it certain that this will not be undertaken till no other legitimate method is open for financing the transferred heads.

(4) It will be to the interest of both wings of the Government to avoid undue friction in view of the future Commission to consider further developments.

We would therefore adhere to the plan in the Report, subject, however, to the suggestion which Sir Sankaran Nair has made, namely, that, instead of stating, as in the Report, that the supply of the reserved subjects will have priority over that of the transferred subjects, it should be simply stated that the Executive Government as a whole will apportion the revenue between the transferred and the reserved subjects, and the Budget so framed will be placed before the Legislature.

11. BUDGET RESOLUTIONS.—We note with satisfaction that the proposals of the Government of India on this subject have not found favour with His Majesty's Government in the Bill now before Parliament. The clauses of the Bill on this point, however, are defective and require to be amended in several respects.

CLAUSE 9.—Proviso (b) under sub-clause (2) authorises an encroachment on the power of the Legislature to regulate the Budget of transferred subjects. The Governor is to have power in cases of emergency to authorise such expenditure as may in his opinion be "necessary for the safety or tranquility of the Province or for the carrying on of any department." In the first place the Governor must be under an obligation, when he takes such extraordinary action, to certify in specific terms the nature of the emergency that compels it. In the second place the Bill should mention expressly the contingency of the Legislative Council refusing supplies for a department, for that we understand to be the justification for giving the Governor power to sanction expenditure "for the carrying on of any department." In the third place we consider that in such a case the Governor should sanction only such expenditure as was incurred on the department during the preceding year, neither more nor less. In the fourth place, the Instrument of Instructions must contain an express injunction to the Governor that he must not frequently resort to this extraordinary action. Otherwise he might refuse altogether to come to terms with his Legislature.

The expenditure exempted from the yearly vote of the Council by proviso (c) should include only the contribution to the Imperial Exchequer, the interest on the public debt, and the salaries of certain high officers appointed by the Crown. We would urge that the dignity and financial control of the Legislative Council would be impaired by the inclusion of the salaries of any considerable portion of the Services under the category. The principle on which the discrimination rests is elucidated by the following passage from the report dated 1849 of a Committee appointed to recommend a constitution for the Australian Colonies:—

"It appears to us hardly consistent with the full adoption of the principles of Representative Government that as to a large part of the public expenditure of the Colony the Legislature should be deprived of all authority; nor does there appear to us any real occasion for imposing a restriction upon the powers of that body which manifests so much jealousy as to the manner in which those powers may be exercised. The expenditure thus provided for is all incurred for services in which the Colonists alone are interested. The Colonists themselves are mainly concerned in the proper and efficient performance of those services; and it appears to us that they ought to possess, through their representatives, the power of making such changes from time to time in the public establishments as circumstances may require. . . . We conceive that it might be advisable by such instructions to restrain the Governors from assenting to Acts making any alterations in the salaries of their own officers, or of those of the Judges, and some others of the public servants, unless these Acts contained clauses suspending their operation until they should be confirmed by Your Majesty's immediate authority. It appears to us that this course ought to be adopted, because we consider that the salaries of the principal officers of the Colonial Governments ought not to be changed without Your Majesty's direct concurrence. . . . We doubt not that such claims would be respected by the local Legislatures, whatever reductions they might see fit to make in other cases; but we think that Your Majesty ought to secure them even from the risk of a hasty and ill-considered decision to their prejudice, occasioned by some temporary excitement. Subject to these qualifications, we are of opinion that complete control over the Colonial expenditure ought to be given to the respective Colonial Legislatures."

Proviso (d) to clause 9 (2) is intended, we recognise, to reproduce a practice which has been found necessary in the Parliament of the United Kingdom. Seeing that at present it is open to members of the Legislative Council to propose any financial measures in the form of resolutions or Bills, subject to previous leave of the Governor in particular cases, it is eminently desirable to allow them in the future to propose increase of expenditure under one head, provided it is balanced by decrease under another, so that the total of the budgeted expenditure is not exceeded. This change we understand to be recommended by the Government of India in the closing sentences of para. 73 of their letter of 5th March. But we do not agree to the limitation laid down by them that the proposed reduction and increase should both relate either to the reserved or to the transferred Budget. Such a limitation would be necessary in their system of a divided Provincial purse; but as we are decidedly against it, and in favour of the original proposal of a Joint Purse, we are opposed to the limitation.

12. GRAND COMMITTEES.—Strong exception is taken by many friendly critics of the Reform Scheme to the device of Grand Committees, but they have become reconciled to it because these bodies were to consist of 40 or 50 per cent. of the Legislative Council, with a bare majority of nominated over elected members. The Government of India now suggest that the Grand Committees should consist of reduced percentages varying from 28 to 37 of the strength of the Council. We strongly object to this suggestion, for thus all vital legislation will be in the hands of a body even smaller than the present Legislative Council.

13. APPEAL AGAINST THE GOVERNOR'S CERTIFICATE.—We are of opinion that the proposal contained in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report (paras. 252 and 254), giving to the Legislative Council the right, by a majority vote, to request the Governor to refer to the Government of India, whose decision on the point will be final, the question whether the certified Bill deals with a reserved subject, should be embodied in the Bill. We think it is not right to abandon it. The objection taken by the Government of India, in para. 82 of their letter of 5th March, 1919, that such a reference by the Legislative Council to the Goverment of India "would impair the Governor's authority and increase the difficulties of his position," presupposes that occasions for such certificate would be frequent and appeals also would always be insisted upon by the Council. It is, on the contrary, more likely that occasions on which the Governor's certificate would be open to the objection that it has been given in reference to a Bill or clause of a Bill or amendment thereof, which does not in reality deal with a "reserved" subject, would be few and far between. The existence of a right of appeal in favour of the Legislature against the Governor's certificate is intended to serve as a check against capricious or perverse use of discretion by a Governor. If the Governor is right in giving the certificate, an appeal to the Government of India will only vindicate his position. But if he is unwise or indiscreet in the exercise of the enormous power and discretion with which he is going to be, under the new arrangements, invested, and if the Legislature has no remedy against it, its temper is more likely to be inflamed than conciliated. The Government of India say further that in these matters the question will only be a question of fact "about which in most cases no doubt can reasonably arise." If no doubt can reasonably arise, it may be reasonably assumed that the Legislative Council will not, by a majority vote, refer the matter to the Government of India. It will do so only when the certificate has been given by the Governor with reference to a Bill which cannot reasonably be said to deal with a reserved subject. We, therefore, press for the proposal to be given effect to in the Bill and not abandoned, as has been done in the Bill as drafted. In this connection we may point out that the Crewe Committee on Home Administration of Indian affairs recommended that the Governor-General should not certify legislation for enactment by the Council of State without previous approval by the Secretary of State (vide para 14, page 6, of the Report). By a parity of reasoning, the Governor should not have absolute power of certification given to him without providing for an appeal to a higher authority against such certification.

14. STANDING COMMITEES AND UNDER-SECRETARIES.—Provision should be made in the Bill for the appointment of Standing Committees and Under-Secretaries as recommended in the Joint Report, not only in Provincial Governments, but also in the Government of India.

15. GOVERNORS OF PROVINCES.—We cannot but view with misgiving the recommendation of the Government of India that for a time the Governors of the United Provinces, the Punjab, the Central Provinces, Behar and Orissa, and Assam should be chosen from the Indian Services—that is in effect from the Indian Civil Service. The Government of India's letter mentions an "understanding" to this effect. If there be one, we must express our disapproval. The office of Governor in future will be one of extraordinary difficulty and delicacy, and requires a combination of qualities which could ordinarily be expected only among persons trained in the public life of a free country and the practice of parliamentary institutions. While we would not shut out the best talent of the public services of India, we think the rule should be to choose the future Governors, as far as possible, from the public life of Great Britain.

16. THE INSTRUMENT OF INSTRUCTIONS.—This document, as drafted by the Government of India, calls for a few remarks. As has been stated already, it should include an instruction that the Governor should yield to the verdict of the constituencies when he has dissolved the Council and appealed to them. Instruction VIII. mentions the legitimate interests of the European and Anglo-Indian community. "Legitimate" ought not to be construed to mean "existing" or "recognised at present." The Criminal Law and the Arms Act and the practice as regards recruitment and conditions of certain services allow these communities certain privileges which it should be open to the Legislatures to modify. If the Governor considered them legitimate, he could maintain them in disregard of the wishes of the Legislature. No. XI safeguards the interests of schools and colleges maintained by religious bodies. If they now have any undue advantage, and the Legislature desires to do away with it, it should not be left to the Governor to set aside the decision of the Legislature. In general, expressions like "legitimate," "recognised," "unfair discrimination," must not be so interpreted as to bar the removal of existing inequalities and injustices.

17. CHANGES AFTER FIVE YEARS.—Paragraph 260 of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report held out the expectation that five years after the first meeting of the reformed Councils the Government of India should consider applications from the Provincial Governments or Legislatures for the modification of the lists of reserved and transferred subjects and make recommendations to the Secretary of State; and also that they should be able to direct that Ministers' salaries should be voted annually by the Legislature, and that, failing any such direction by the Government of India, the Legislative Councils should have power to demand by resolution that Ministers' salaries should be so voted. On account of the proposal of the Government of India to make the Ministers responsible to the House from the start having been embodied in the Bill, the latter object of para. 260 does not survive. But the importance of the first part of that paragraph not only remains unaffected, but becomes all the greater, on account of the Function Committee's Report having been framed presumably on the understanding that, whatever grievances there may be in any Province as to its recommendations to transfer certain departments and reserve others falling short of public expectations, the people of the Province through their Legislative Council will have an opportunity, five years after the new Councils come into existence, to have their grievances redressed by claiming, and, if a case is made out to that effect, getting some "reserved" department or departments "transferred" to Ministers—a claim which may conceivably receive even the support of the Provincial Government. For instance, in Bombay, the Governor's Executive Council, we believe, was equally divided on the question of making "land revenue" a "reserved" subject. The three Indian members of the Functions Committee strenuously urged that "land revenue" be made a "transferred" subject in Bombay. They were defeated by a majority of only one in the Functions Committee, and they gave in presumably on the understanding that it was only a question of a short period of five years more, at the end of which the reformed Legislative Council, backed up, it may be, not by an equally divided but by a majority vote, possibly even a unanimous vote of the Governor's Executive Council, will be able to secure the removal of "land revenue" from the "reserved" list and its inclusion in the "transferred" one. If this legitimate expectation is now going to be frustrated on account of the opposition of the Government of India to this proposal for a survey after five years, the Report of the Functions Committee as to the "reserved" and "transferred" subjects in the various Provinces will have to be immediately modified by adding to the latter some of the subjects which the Committee have deemed it right to "reserve" at the start. The opposition of the Government of India (vide para. 111 of their letter of 5th March, 1919) is based on the ground that it is desirable that the changes now to be made should continue "for a prolonged period" and should not be disturbed until the proposed statutory Commission came after ten years and reported, and that no expectation of intermediate advance should be held out to the people. Apart from the unfairness of this proposal to block progress and prevent the fulfilment of legitimate expectations even in the case of advanced Provinces, while starting them on a career of responsible government on the express understanding that they may legitimately expect a further advance after five years of successful administration of the limited number of departments at present proposed to be "transferred," the Government of India fail to see that "a prolonged period" of no change would intensify and increase inordinately the demand which accumulated grievances would impel the elect of the people to make at the end of the "prolonged period." Timely advance checks extravagant demands. "A prolonged period" of no progress places a premium on them. We are strongly of an opinion, therefore, that the Government of India's opposition to the first part of the proposal contained in para. 260 of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report should be over-ruled and the provision in question be embodied in the Bill in clear terms. Omission to do so would not reconcile thoughtful opinion in India to the report of the Functions Committee as to "reserved" and transferred" departments in the various Provinces.

18. THE FRANCHISE COMMITTEE'S RECOMMENDATIONS.—(a) These have our support generally, and we do not approve of the changes suggested by the Government of India, but we strongly advocate a system of direct election to the Legislative Assembly from the very start. (Messrs. Surendra Nath Banerjea and Sastri dissent from this view.) In particular we uphold the decisions of the Committee as regards the mode of election to the Council of State, the number and composition of the Legislative Assembly, the grant of representation to the Universities, the relative proportions of urban and rural representation, and the proportion of seats assigned to the Mahomedans of Bengal. On this last point we wish to make one observation. In the Lucknow compact the Bengal proportion and the United Provinces proportion were considered mutually dependant, and in a less degree all the proportions must be considered as one whole, so much so that to disturb any one them is inevitably to disturb all, and so reopen a dispute happily settled by mutual agreement.

(b) NON-BRAHMIN HINDU COMMUNITIES.—On this vexed question the All-India Conference of Moderates passed the subjoined resolution unanimously as a compromise:—

"The franchise should be so broad and the electorates so devised as to secure all classes of taxpayers their due representatives by election, and the interests of those communities or groups of communities in Madras and the Bombay Deccan and elsewhere who at present demand special electoral protection should be adequately safeguarded by introducing a system of plural constituencies in which a reasonable number of seats should be reserved for those communities till the first Parliamentary Commission of Enquiry."

(c) WOMEN'S FRANCHISE.—We wish to recommend that women should be admitted to the franchise on the same qualifications as men, differing in this respect both from the Franchise Committee and from the Government of India. Messrs. Surendra Nath Banerjea and Sastri do not accept this view for the reasons stated in the report of the Franchise Committee.

(d) DISQUALIFICATIONS OF CANDIDATES.—We dissent emphatically from the Government of India's opinion in favour of the retention of the present list of disqualifications. The Committee's revised list is on sound lines, but we wish they had removed the bar on account of dismissal from Government service. We would press the view of the minority of the Committee (consisting of Lord Southborough and Messrs. Banerjea and Sastri) that it is wrong on principle to maintain a disqualification which arises from and may be cured by Executive action.

(e) RESIDENTIAL QUALIFICATION FOR CANDIDATES.—The Committee recommend that candidates should have a residential qualification in Bombay, the Punjab, and the Central Provinces, but not in the other Provinces. It appears to us, however, that there is no justification for this discrimination, and we would abolish it throughout.

19. THE FUNCTIONS COMMITTEE'S RECOMMENDATIONS.—(a) We are strongly of opinion that, if education and industries be not wholly transferred, the reforms will be robbed of half their value. They are two of the subjects with whose proper administration the future of the Indian people is intimately bound up, and should be entrusted to their elected representatives.

(b) LAND REVENUE should be a transferred subject in Ryotwari Provinces.

(c) PROVINCIAL TAXATION has been already mentioned as a subject that should be transferred.

20. DIARCHY IN THE CENTRAL GOVERNMENT.—We urge strongly that an element of responsibility should be introduced into the Government of India by placing some departments under a Minister who will be amenable to the control of the Legislature. Salt, Income Tax, and "General Stamps" suggest themselves readily to the mind in this connection. Subject to conditions imposed by military considerations, Railways and Posts and Telegraphs may also be dealt with in the same way. These are essentially departments which render services to the public, and there cannot be any political considerations operating against their transfer to popular control, subject to the conditions above mentioned. Again the power of the Government of India to supervise the administration of transferred subjects in the Provinces is obviously one which should be exercised by a Minister responsible to the Legislative Assembly. In this connection we invite attention to para. 18 of the statement by Sir James Brunyate appended to the Crewe Committee Report, p. 24, in which he outlines a grouping of all-India subjects into the categories of "controlled" and "popular," though with a more limited object.

The third formula enunciated in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report lays down that the authority of the Government of India shall not be impaired in any way. In other words, whatever means might be adopted to make it increasingly amenable to popular influence, it shall remain independent of popular control. The elected representatives of the people are to have greater opportunities of criticising and embarrassing the Government without the check, as in the case of the members of the Provincial Legislative Councils, imposed by a sense of responsibility. It is the absence of this element of responsibility which forcibly strikes the authors of the Joint Report as the fundamental defect that vitiates the existing system of government and the Congress-League Scheme. And it is the introduction of this element into the Provincial Legislatures that constitutes the chief value of the declaration of August, 1917. Such being the importance of this principle, which is to be the keystone of the new fabric, how can its application be withheld from the most important sphere, viz., the Government of India, where it is needed at least as much as anywhere else? The Report does not contemplate, nor is it compatible with the line of argument adopted therein, that at any particular time when the people may be supposed to be ripe for it the entire Government of India should at one stroke be brought under the control of the popular representatives. The scheme propounded in the Report is based on the principle of "successful stages" and "progressive realisation," which applies to the Government of India as much as to the Provincial Governments. Those who are capable of managing education, local self-government, and industries in the Provinces will surely be able to administer the Salt and Income Tax departments. The mere extension of the range of jurisdiction can create no new problems, and should, therefore, give rise to no feeling of hesitation or anxiety.

One of the main objects of the scheme is to provide a machinery for securing future advance which will obviate the need for agitation. To a certain extent this object will be attained by the proposal to appoint Commissions periodically under the authority of Parliament with the express purpose of recommending suitable stages of progress in the Provincial sphere, but so far as the Government of India is concerned neither initial nor subsequent advance is explicitly provided for. The result is that agitation will be inevitable, and from that point of view the scheme stands self-condemmed. It is plain that the people of India will not rest content with authority in Provincial matters. Her destinies are largely in the hands of the Government of India. To take no steps to bring some part of it under the authority of the people, argues an inability to appreciate the dominating factor in the Indian political situation, viz., the desire of the people to have a hand in the shaping of their destinies. This idea is referred to here and there with approval in the Report, but no definite provision has been made for carrying it out, nor is there any attempt to define the stages by which the goal of full responsibility is to be reached. "The inevitable result of education in the history and thought of Europe," say the authors of the Joint Report, "is the desire for self-determination; and the demand that now meets us from the educated classes of India is no more than the right and natural outcome of the work of a hundred years." But the Report provides no method in the Central Government of satisfying this natural and legitimate demand.

It cannot be contended that the transfer of a few provincial services to popular control constitutes a serious step towards this end. Some comfort may be derived from the language of paragraph 288, which says that one of the duties of the periodic Commissions will be to examine and report upon the new Constitution of the Government of India, but the hope is rendered almost illusory by the words "with particular reference to the working of the machinery for representation, the procedure by certificate, and the results of joint sessions." It appears, thus, that the Commissions will have power to recommend not constitutional changes with a view to the establishment of popular government, but small improvements in the constitutional machinery which experience may render necessary or desirable. We are left in no doubt in regard to this matter. The Report itself states that the object of the proposals set forth in it is to make a beginning in responsible government in the Provinces, which must be completed before a similar process is begun in the Government of India. We are unable to understand the necessity of waiting for the completion of responsible government in the Provinces. Hanoz Delhi dur ast fails to convince us. In the world there is no such sharp demarcation. The affairs of life are inextricably intertwined, and progress in any one direction means increased capacity in all other directions. Apart from this, we have to guard against the inevitable danger that if the bureaucracy is taught to regard any part of the Government as specially its own, it will bitterly resist all attempts to transfer it into other hands. The Cabinet must bear in mind that the bureaucracy has to be taught at least as much the virtue of subordinating its self-interest to the good of the country as the people of India the art of governing themselves. Moreover, the progress of responsible government in the Provinces will be injuriously affected by the limited vision of an unreformed Government of India, which is to have not only overriding and concurrent power of legislation, but also the power of acting as an arbiter between the Governor and his Council and of sanctioning the removal of services from the reserved to the transferred group.

The only justification urged for this glaring omission to provide for the popularisation of the Government of India is found in paragraph 190: "For such hybrid arrangements precedents are wanting; their working must be experimental, and will depend on factors that are yet largely unknown. We are not prepared, without experience of their results, to effect like changes in the Government of India." The excessive caution displayed here is utterly inconsistent with the spirit which animates the Report. It anticipates confidently that within five years of the beginning of the experiment sufficient progress will have been made to justify making Ministers responsible to the Legislature and to admit of an increase in the number of transferred services, and bids the first Commission enquire whether full responsible government may not be conceded at least in some Provinces. The Report no doubt also contemplates the withdrawal of a subject from the control of Ministers, but the exercise of this power has obviously been provided for more to give an air of logical completeness to the scheme than for any practical purpose. We are unable to understand, therefore, why the Secretary of State and the Viceroy, who are so hopeful of the success of the experiment in the provincial sphere, should lose courage and be filled with apprehension when it is proposed that popular control should be extended to the national sphere also. Unless this is done, the scheme will be inconsistent with itself, the spirit of the declaration of 1917 will not have been fully carried out, and England will not be able to claim justly that she has set India firmly on the road to self-government.

The Report says that progress in every domain cannot go on at the same pace. There need be no correspondence in the steps which are taken to enable the Indian and the Provincial Governments to march to their appointed goal. The Minister or Ministers in charge of the transferred subjects in the Government of India will be responsible to the Legislative Assembly and not to the Council of State. The relations between the two Houses may be revised in other respects also, though prima facie there does not seem to be any need for it. The critics of the Council of State may become somewhat reconciled to it if certain departments are placed under the control of the Legislative Assembly.

21. FISCAL AUTONOMY.—Fiscal independence is the next important thing that we earnestly press for. England imposes free trade on India, and in the opinion of most Indians this policy stands in the way of the development of indigenous industries and manufactures. We are aware that some inter-Imperial arrangements are contemplated by which a system of preferential tariffs may be established. We trust that they will be equitable in their incidence on India, not merely in name, but also in fact. Subject to such limitations the Government of India and the Legislative Assembly should be given the same power of regulating their tariffs that the Dominion Governments and Legislatures enjoy. This would mean in practice that the Government of India should no longer be under an obligation to refer tariff proposals to the Secretary of State for his previous sanction, and that when the Legislative Assembly, agreeing with Government, has passed those proposals the Secretary of State will as a rule refrain from refusing sanction to them. This will be an act of bare justice to the people of India, and is based on a principle the adoption of which has been unanimously recommended by the Committee appointed under Lord Crewe to consider among other things the future relations between the Secretary of State and the Government of India.

22. THE VICEROY'S EXECUTIVE COUNCIL.—The Joint Report and the letter of the 5th March agree in recommending a second Indian member in the Executive Council of the Viceroy. We do not consider this adequate. Seeing that the numerical limit of the Council is now to be taken away, the rule for the future should be that one half of the Executive Government should be composed of Indians, including the Minister, if one should be appointed.

23. PRESIDENTS OF POPULAR HOUSES TO BE ELECTED.—The official scheme of reforms, seeking to train the people of India in the exercise of responsible government, proposes to create for the purpose a legislative assembly in the Government of India and legislative councils in that of the Provinces. These bodies are intended to afford the elected representatives of the people a constitutional means of expressing their will. In the provincial sphere this will, being, of course, the will of the majority of elected representatives, is to be carried out, as regards certain functions of government, by Ministers dependent for the tenure of their office on the pleasure of the majority of the Legislature and, as regards the other functions, by Executive Councillors, except in certain cases removed from such control by the certificate of the Governor. In the sphere of the Central Government the will of the majority of the Assembly can never prevail by itself: it must be concurred in by the majority of another House, called the Council of State, or by a majority of a joint session of the two Houses. The Governor-General likewise has it in his power by issuing a certificate in a specific form to remove a subject altogether from the jurisdiction of the Assembly. In both spheres, therefore, the Executive has the means of overriding the decision of the popular Houses whenever it deems such a course absolutely necessary. This safeguard being provided, it becomes possible, and to make the training of the people in responsible government effective it becomes necessary, to make the popular Houses fully popular. This view does not seem to have been vividly present to the minds of the distinguished authors of the official scheme.

The popular character of these houses is likely to be seriously impaired by one of their proposals—that the President should be the head of the Government and the Vice-President an official nominated by him. We take strong exception to this provision, and hope the public will do the same. So far as we know, there is no constitution where a popular House is presided over by the head of the Executive. Even the Reichstag of Germany is no exception. When the scope and functions of the popular Houses in India are subject to strict limitations, why they should be further constrained by the presence and authority of the Viceroy or the Governor it is difficult to understand. Barring a few persons of eminence and courage, the other members must feel more or less oppressed under the eye of one who is the fountain of honour and patronage, and the freedom of speech which is the very breath of a popular House cannot but be prejudicially affected. If these exalted officials were to be invariably chosen from the public life of Great Britain, there might be the surety of the high traditions of the Mother of Parliaments being made familiar and maintained in India. Even then our objection would only be weakened, not altogether obviated. But the official scheme makes governorships open to the services in India. This would greatly reduce the chances of impartial administration of the standing orders, the maintenance of the privileges of the House, and that broad-minded tolerance of full-dress debates, piquant personalties and fearless criticism of Government measures which give to the proceedings of Parliament their peculiar value and character. We know that it will take time for the extraordinary impartiality and solicitude for the honour of the House which characterise the office of the Speaker of the House of Commons to grow up in India. It is precisely for this reason that we would lose no time in training non-official Indians to such high responsibility, and it is not clear to us how or in what respects a member of the Indian Civil Service, for example, however distinguished and efficient he may be, would be better fitted than an eminent lawyer, let us say, to interpret the rules of the House, to give prompt and correct decisions on points of order, and to hold the scales even between the parties or between the Government and the private member. Long exercise of executive authority would tend rather to unfit a man for the duties of President of a popular House.

24. THE PUBLIC SERVICE IN INDIA.—Clause 24 of the Bill gives to the Executive rule-making power in relation to the Public Service in India, and Clause 26 provides for the appointment of a Public Service Commission. It is stated in the Secretary of State's Memorandum regarding the Bill (p. 11): "This Part deals with questions affecting the public Service on the lines recommended by the Government of India in the Despatch of 5th March (paras. 43 to 55)." The whole tendency of these paragraphs of the Despatch is to buttress the position of the various Services—it may be in varying degrees—against possible interference by Ministers or Legislatures in India. The acceptance of the Government of India's proposals will increase the by no means small difficulties of Ministers and prevent, more or less effectually, the Legislatures from reforming the conditions of the Services as they may deem it right to do in the public interest. Scarcely any other administrative question has aroused so much interest among Indians during long years as the subject of the Public Services, and naturally they do not view with equanimity the prospect that even when they are endowed with a modicum of political power they will be deterred from dealing with the Services. The Governments of the United Provinces and Behar and Orissa proposed that "appointments, etc., of Provincial Services" should be a transferred subject, but their proposal has not been accepted. Our views on the subject are those stated by Prof. A. B. Keith in para. 29 of his Minority Report (Report of the Crewe Committee, p. 47), but we do not approve of his suggestion that the legislation of the subject should be passed before the coming into operation of the Reform Scheme. We urge that the clauses of the Bill be amended accordingly.

25. SECRETARY OF STATE IN COUNCIL AND INDIA OFFICE.—We are glad that the Bill provides that the salary of the Secretary of State shall in future be paid out of moneys provided by Parliament. For the rest it was decided to await the publication of the Report of Lord Crewe's Committee before definite proposals were made. "It was then intended," says the Memorandum of the Secretary of State, "to lay that Report before the proposed Joint Committee proposals as to provisions to be included in the Bill."

The Crewe Committee's Report has since been published, and we shall state in brief our views on the proposed reforms in the "Home Administration of Indian Affairs." The Report was not unanimous, three members, Sir James Brunyate, Mr. B. N. Basu, and Prof. A. B. Keith, having put in separate minutes or reports. We regret the Committee have not made any recommendations upon the question, which statutory functions now vested in the Secretary of State should be discharged in the United Kingdom, and which should be discharged in India. We would accept generally the views of Sir James Brunyate in regard to the classification of the functions into those which should form the subject of statutory devolution, those that should be delegated to the authorities in India, and those that should form the subject of convention or conditional devolution (paras. 6 to 17 of the Statement, pages 21 to 24 of the Report). The present stringent financial control of the Secretary of State has arisen from the statutory declaration in section 21 of the principal Act in regard to the Revenues of India. We are also in favour of the grouping of subjects as proposed by Sir James Brunyate in para. 27 of his statement. We agree with the five recommendations of the majority of the Committee under the head "Relations between the Home and Indian Administrations," subject to the qualification as regards recommendation (iii.) (para. 35 of Report),* that in our opinion the guiding principle should be "that the administrative control of Parliament over the Government of India exercised through the Secretary of State should continue, except in so far as the control of the Legislature on the spot is substituted for the present Parliamentary control." (Resolution X (a) of the All-India Conference of the Moderate Party.) The reason for this is obvious—that there should be responsibility either to the people of India or to the people of England.

As regards the Secretary of State's Council, our position is that "until the India Council can be abolished by substituting Indian control for the control of Parliament over the affairs of India, it should be a mere advisory body with its strength reduced to eight members, four of whom should be Indians." (Resolution X (d) of the All-India Conference of the Moderate Party.) Three out of the four Indian members should be appointed in the manner recommended in para. 24 of the Committee's Report, and the fourth direct by the Secretary of State as recommended in Mr. Basu's Note (para. 15, p. 34). Of the remainder one-half may be persons who have served the Government of India and not left India more than three years earlier, and the remainder may be appointed at the absolute discretion of the Secretary of State. The term of office of members should be fixed at not more than five years; they may even be given the option to retire at the end of three years. We agree with Sir James Brunyate "that the present Bill should re-establish the Council of India for a named period only, say, twelve years, so as to enable the whole matter to be re-examined at the next decennial inquest. Then, if the Council be still required, its life can be extended, but the onus of proof will lie on its defenders. If it is found not to be wanted, its term of life will run out automatically." (Para. 28 (3) of Statement, p. 29 of Report). If it is worth while keeping up the Council at all, it is of no utility in our opinion to strip off its title and status and call it by another name as the majority of the Committee recommend in para. 24 of their Report. We agree on this point with Sir James Brunyate and Mr. Basu. But we do not think it necessary to maintain it at its present strength, and have suggested that it may be composed of eight members for the reason that with the transfer of a number of departments to popular control and the larger delegation or devolution of power to the Provincial or Central Governments in India itself it should be possible to abolish several departments of the India Office and to reduce the quantity of work in others. We cannot think that the volume of work will remain anything like what it has been. The Committee have recommended (para. 29) "the tranfer of the agency work of the India Office to a High Commissioner for India or some similar Indian governmental representative in London." We hope that suitable Indians will be appointed to this new office at least as freely as the British, and we would suggest that the High Commissioner should be assisted by an Advisory Board or Committee, of which not less than one-half of the members should be Indians. The existence of such an advisory body will produce confidence among Indians that their interests are safe.

We would press the proposal made in the joint scheme of the Indian National Congress and the All-India Moslem League, and repeated in Mr. Basu's Note (para. 17, p. 35 of Report), "that there should always be an additional Indian permanent Under-Secretary of State." We would further urge that a fair proportion of the higher officials of the India Office should be selected from among Indian officers of the Governments in India. Competent men with the requisite knowledge and experience are available, and they may be brought here on deputation for, say, three years. We endorse Mr. Basu's strong plea on this point. We are glad that the Committee have not recommended any "formal system of interchange of appointments between members of the India Office and the Indian Services." We do not think it necessary, and are not persuaded that it will even be expedient, to depute officials from here for periods of service in India.

On the question of the apportionment of the charges of the India Office between British and Indian Revenues, we approve of the Committee's recommendations embodied in para. 32 of their Report (p. 12).

We strongly differ from the Committee's recommendation that a Select Committee of the House of Commons on Indian affairs as proposed in para. 295 of the Montagu Chelmsford Report should not be appointed. Parliamentary control over Indian affairs will cease when a system of complete responsible government has been established in that country, but during the period of transition Parliament will remain responsible for a substantial and very important part of the governance of India, and we are convinced that the proposed Committee will exert a wholesome influence on administration. We do not share the Crewe Committee's fear that there will be interference in details. This is improbable in the last degree. The report of the Select Committee, published a little time before the annual Indian debate, is more likely to increase the interest of other members in Indian affairs than, as Lord Crewe and his colleagues apprehend (para. 33 of Report), to confine it "within even n rrower limits than at present." Nor is there any reason to make it a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament. The annual Indian debate refers primarily to finance, and takes place only in the House of Commons. We may mention that as far back as 1894 the Indian National Congress urged that there should be such a Select Committee of the House of Commons.

26. We urge that the views put forward and suggestions made in this Memoranda be given effect to in the Bill now before Parliament and in the rules made thereunder

APPENDIX Y.

EXTRACTS from Note on Report on Indian Constitutional Reforms sent to the Bengal Chamber of Commerce by Messrs Graha & Co., Calcutta, on 6th September 1918, handed in by Sir James Meston, K.C.S.I., on 26th August 1919. (See Question 6997.)

"Budget Procedure, paragraphs 255–7.—It is proposed that the first charge on the revenues shall be the contribution to the Government of India, the second charge the allocations to the reserved subject, and the balance whatever it may be, will be handed over to the Ministers who, if they have not got enough funds for their needs, may propose new taxation.

"All matters regarding the budget may be discussed in Council, and presumably transfers may be proposed as between the reserved and transferred subjects, or as between items in the transferred subjects. The Governor may refuse to accept resolutions regarding the reserved subjects, but as regards transferred subjects the budget would be altered according to the resolutions.

"The whole subject bristles with difficulties, but we can scarcely imagine a scheme less calculated to avoid endless discussion and friction, both between the members of Government, and in the Legislative Council, than the scheme proposed.

"Even at present there are endless resolutions and discussions on the budget, proposing transfers from the unpopular to the popular heads, and it is certain that if the scheme as proposed is carried into effect discussions and friction will be interminable, and the Governor's veto will be exercised in an innumerable number of cases.

"It is certain that the legislature responsible for the transferred subjects, left with the balance of the revenue after other interests have been satisfied, will harbour a grievance which will be expressed by their manner of treating the budget.

"The inadvisability of the proposed system has been argued from different standpoints

"It has been argued by one side that it is grossly unfair on the Ministers to leave them with the entire onus and odium of taxation when the reason for the taxation may be the extravagance of the Executive Council; on the other hand it has been argued that since the taxation is imposed and collected by Government as a whole, the onus and odium must fall on them whether the reserved or transferred subjects are responsible for the taxation.

"Further we are strongly of the opinion that the responsibilities to be transferred should be real, and unless the Indian politician is made to understand that combined with the pleasure of spending money there is the disagreeable duty of extracting it from others, no lesson in self-government will be learnt.

"It has been pointed out that it is proposed to transfer all the popular subjects such as education, sanitation and public works, and to reserve the unpopular subjects such as police and law courts; if to these is added taxation, for we maintain that unless taxation for transferred subjects is in some way labelled it will be regarded as Sircari taxation, whoever may be responsible for its inception, then the Governor and his Executive Council will be cursed for all the evil doings of Government, and the Ministers will be blessed for all the benefits conferred.

"In our opinion an attempt must be made to allocate certain sources of revenue to the Executive Council, and other sources to the Ministers, just as is done between the Government of India and the Provinces, and to earmark these sources of revenue, and if either the Executive Council or the Ministers want more money they must raise it themselves by taxation.

"It is argued that since the Executive Council under the Governor is responsible for the essential items of Government they must not be allowed to run the risk of shortage of funds owing to famine, especially because their principal source of revenue is the Land Revenue; this contingency is however safeguarded by the Famine Relief Fund (paragraph 204). It is also argued that the large heads of provincial revenue are small in number; this is true but should not present an insuperable difficulty. Land Revenue, Excise Judicial Stamps, Forests and Registration are all large heads.

"It is not in our province to work out a scheme providing for separate heads of revenue to be allotted to reserved and transferred subjects, but we are satisfied that it can be done.

"We therefore recommend that the Provincial Revenues should be carefully examined and an attempt, should be made to allocate them to reserved and transferred subjects in proportion to probable initial expenditure on the lines of the allocations to the Government of India and the Provinces, and that the parts of Government in charge of the reserved and transferred subjects should in the future be separately responsible for increasad or new taxation necessary for their own subjects.

"We object to the alteration of any part of the budget if by this is meant the right to transfer from one subject to another.

"In the British Parliament the House of Commons cannot vote money for any purpose whatsoever, except at the demand and upon the responsibility of Ministers of the Crown; it cannot of itself insist on the raising of money by taxation or otherwise, or on spending it on a particular object; it can only agree to or refuse the proposals of the Ministers.

"We therefore recommend that resolutions on the reserved subjects, if carried, shall not be binding on the Governor, and the resolutions on the transferred subjects shall only be binding in so far as they follow the procedure laid down for the British Parliament and that no resolutions shall be allowed to be discussed which propose transfers from one subject to another."

MEMORANDUM handed in by Chandranath Sarma for the Assam Association.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

During the stay of the Secretary of State at Calcutta, in the cold weather of 1917, the Assam Association was allowed to send its representatives to wait upon him and His Excellency the Viceroy and to present an address defining the claims of the Province of Assam to constitutional reforms.

At the sitting of the Southborough Committees at Calcutta last cold weather, the Assam Association again had the privilege of sending its representative to submit before the two committees its views on Franchise and Division of functions for the Province. It was about that time that the note published by the Honourable the Chief Commissioner of Assam became public and the whole country viewed with alarm the one-sidedness of the proposals contained therein.

The note would look like an advocacy on behalf of the Britons residing in Assam and an effort to reduce the effects of the privileges promised to the people in the proposed Reform scheme. The public of Assam as well as this Association and its branch associations held several meetings to protest against the views of the Honourable the Chief Commissioner of Assam and many of those proceedings were published in the local as well as in the Calcutta newspapers.

Recommendations in para. 35 of the Government of India Despatch dated March 5th last.—This Association now views with alarm, and respectively begs to protest against, the recommendations of the Government of India contained in para. 35 of the Despatch dated the 5th March last, wherein it is proposed not to grant to Assam the same type of government as is proposed for the other major Provinces of India, including even the Central Provinces, which obtained a legislative council of its own after Assam, and the percentage of educated people wherein is much below that of Assam. The reason assigned for this differential treatment is that two-thirds of the whole Province are composed of Hill tracts which will be excluded from the operation of the Reform scheme. The red colour in the map attached to the Despatch shows the insignificance of the area where reforms are proposed to be granted compared to the portion sought to be excluded. Consequently the administration of the Hill Districts has been made the centre of many suggestions against the full introduction of the measures of reform in Assam; nay, even those matters which have been favourably considered in respect of other Provinces have been ignored in the case of Assam on account of those Hill Districts. There seems to be no other reasons for treating Assam in this manner except what is stated above. In point of education Assam is only behind the three Presidencies and in matters of representative institutions from time immemorial it perhaps stands the first in India. It is, therefore, of utmost importance to consider why or how the Hill Districts will suffer by the introduction of the proposed reforms into the plains and how far will the plains be hampered by the exclusion of the Hill Districts.

Hill Districts.—It has been very vividly described by the Honourable the Chief Commissioner of Assam in his note that the Hill tracts cover 50,500 square miles out of 77,500 square miles, "the Division of Function Committee" states at page 33 of its report that two-thirds of the whole province are included in the Hill and Frontier Tracts.

Population of Hill tracts insignificant.—Now on a comparison of population and income of the two divisions it would seem that the vastness of the Hill tracts does not mean anything and would not affect any question connected with the proposed reforms. The Hill tracts contain only 7,13,635 people, whereas the smaller area of the plains contain 60,00,000 people approximately bringing the total to 67,13,635 (vide page 75 Franchise Committees' Report).

Income of Hill Districts insignificant and they are dependent upon the plains.—In point of expenditure also this vast tract is mainly dependent upon the one-third tract. The following table will clearly show how much money the plains are to furnish to the Hills:—

Names of Districts.	Receipts.	Net expenditure.
1. Gora Hills	2,25,094	2,46,723
2. Khasi and Jaintia	3,53,858	10,23,543
3. Lushai Hills	1,05,494	2,54,878
4. Naga Hill	1,19,689	3,10,848
5. North East Frontier	58,369	4,84,030
Total	8,62,504	23,20,022

The above figures show that instead of the plains districts being in any way indebted to the Hills, the latter depend upon the plains to the extent of Rs 14,67,518 for their administration. The Honourable the Chief Commissioner of Assam does not wish the Legislative Council to have anything to do with these Hill tracts—they being recommended to be directly under him—but at the same time suggest that "as the Legislative Council has power to pass laws which may be applied to the Hill Districts, the administration of the Hills must be financed from the plains." The above argument does not seem to be quite sound and fair towards the plains. The Committee for the Division of Functions in their report recommends that the tracts in question should be excluded from the jurisdiction of the reformed Provincial Government. Taking that as the correct point of view, the question that naturally arises is "who is to finance the administration of the Hills?"

Political Importance of the Hills make it an Imperial concern.—The political importance of the Hill Districts makes it a matter of Imperial concern. The North East Frontier, the Lushai Hills, the Naga Hills and the Garo Hills have all more or less of frontier importance, and should therefore be made an all India concern, not only on account of their frontier importance but also for general civilising influence, the entire cost of this mission being proper to be borne by the Central Government, and governed under the agency system by the Provincial Governor.

Plains are made to pay for the Hills, and that is again urged as the reason to withdraw privileges.—It would be a grievous wrong done to the people of the Valleys if under the above circumstances the existence of the hills be made a reason (1) to refuse them an advanced type of Government along with the other provinces of India, (2) to saddle them with the cost of administering some districts with which they are not very much concerned, (3) to withdraw the paying Departments allowed to be "transferred" in other parts of India from the list of tranferred subjects in Assam.

Regarding the recommendations of the Southborough Committee. } DIVISION OF FUNCTIONS.

The opinion all over India is that all Departments should be in the hands of the people, and that there can be no responsible Government without the control of finance. But in the case of Assam, even the subjects transferred in other Provinces have been recommended to be "reserved." The Departments of "Forests," "Excise," "Public Works," "Fisheries" and "Education" are very important ones so far as the Assamese people are concerned. While the people fought earnestly for their inclusion among the "transferred" subjects, the official element opposed it as strenuously. It is therefore necessary to examine each of these subjects somewhat in detail.

Forest.—It is said that where the greater part of the work of the Forest Department lies in the excluded areas the question of transfer of Forests hardly arises. It is evidently doubtful. A good deal of work of the Forest Department is carried on in the plains as well, otherwise there would have been no necessity for the huge expenses on establishments and pay of high officers in the Valleys much more than in the hills. We are not sure yet whether the hills show more profit in the Forest Department or the plains; but it is sure that the bulk of the Department's works is carried on in the plains. However it would give entire satisfaction to the people if the Forest Department of the Hills be separated from that of the plains, and the latter be put under a minister.

Excise.—The reasons adduced for not recommending the Excise Department to be administered by the ministers are quite untenable. It is regrettable that the members of the Committee could so far misunderstand matters. The reasons given at page 33 of the report clearly tend to indicate that the opium habit being strong in the population of the Assam Valley, there is some chance that the effort to check the spread of the habit to the hills will weaken if it be administered by a popular minister. If the Committee has obtained this information from officials, it can only be said that it would have been better for it to rely on this point on the evidence of the representatives of the people, who stated that a popular minister would try his utmost to discourage the opium habit, as he would be aware of the havoc which this pernicious habit has been creating among his own people. Some officers who are better informed entertain a fear exactly the other way (vide Mr. Botham's note and evidence before the Committee). The recent affair in the Assam Council between Rai Phanidhar Chaliha Bahadur and the Honourable Sir N. D. Beatson Bell is clearly illustrative of the real state of affairs. One cannot do better than quote the Rai Bahadur's speech representing the Assam Public opinion in the matter, and refer to the Honourable the Chief Commissioner's reply thereto:—

Thus said the Rai Bahadur, who is the elected representative of the Municipal bodies in the Assam Valley:—

"The Excise Department contributes the largest amount to the Provincial receipts. They have been increasing by leaps and bounds. In 1917–18 they were Rs. 53,74,000, in 1918–19 (revised) Rs. 58,61,000. The opium revenue (opium and its preparation and sale proceeds) alone comes to Rs. 33,50,000. This Department is an eyesore to the educated Indian commnnity, and to all who have the welfare of the country at heart. The sooner the opium habit is stopped the better it is for the people and the Government. The traffic has been encouraging immorality, and indolence has deteriorated the Assamese race, and it is feared that if the opium trade is retained, the Assamese race will be almost extinct within about two hundred years hence. Experience shows that the closing of some shops, and the raising of the treasury price do not help the people a jot. They bring an increased amount of revenue, but do not reduce the number of opium eaters who are steadily increasing."

The reply of the Honourable the Chief Commissioner need not be stated in extenso. He did not controvert or try to controvert any of the facts enumerated in the Rai Bahadur's speech, but found fault with him for having eaten the salt of Government, and wearing the honour conferred upon him with pride, and at the same time making an embittered attack on the whole excise department throwing mud at the Government (vide Assam Gazette, April 23rd, 1919, p. 87, Part VI). This clearly shows that the educated section of the community is against the spread of the opium habit. In this matter — especially in Assam — the beareaucracy has failed, and a popular minister alone will be able to check the spread of this habit, and thus save his people from the chance of extinction. There can be no truth in the observation that a minister's administration of the plains Districts in this matter will weaken the effort to check the spread of this habit to the hills. There being no other ground on which this subject has been recommended to be reserved, it is earnestly hoped that you will kindly include it among the "transferred" subjects.

Public Works Department.—In discussing the Public Works Department the Government of India seems to be prepared to transfer buildings connected with "transferred" subjects, roads, etc., not of military importance and municipal tramways. The Southborough Committee however did not see its way to recommend this subject to be transferred in Assam, because among the most important duties of this department are the construction of the hill and frontier roads. The argument of the Committee does not at all hold in the light of the Government of India despatch, and this Association therefore humbly prays that no differential treatment be meted out to Assam in this respect.

Fisheries.—The only other Department transferred in other parts of India but reserved in Assam is the Fisheries. Assam and Bengal are the most fish eating Provinces in India It has been recommended to be reserved in Assam on the ground—it seems—that in Assam restrictive measures taken to protect fish have been unpopular, and the administration of fisheries is closely connected with Land Revenue Department. Both the above reasons are untenable and it is evident that all the earning departments are recommended to be reserved in Assam by assigning even the most far fetched reasons for doing so. The restrictive measures alluded to were the award of Rs. 10/- as reward for the killing of a crocodile in the Brahmaputra river. The Brahmaputra river extends from Tibet to Bay of Bengal. The crocodiles also breed in large numbers. Under these circumstances it became very easy for a class of professional crocodile killers to kill the animals in those portions of the Brahmaputra which are near to the towns and take the rewards daily or weekly. In this way thousands of rupees were drawn annually by these fishermen without any appreciable reduction in their number as this operation is carried on only during a few months and only in a few miles of the Brahmaputra river, without devising any means to stop the crocodiles from going upstream or down or to find out the places where they lay their eggs and breed. It is impossible to see how this weighs against the people or, why objection to such a measure should be made the bases of reserving the subject The Government also considered the objection reasonable and accepted the resolution moved in the council in the matter. In any case it would seem to be hard reasoning to reserve any subject, until the people learn to swallow an unpopular measure. The better course seems to be to make them feel and learn for themselves, especially in petty matters like these.

Fisheries not connected with Land Revenue Department—It is also not understood how the administration of the fisheries is closely connected with Land Revenue Department either, being under different laws administered under different principles. The Committee itself considers the subject to be allied to industries and Co-operative Credit and the Government of India thinks it more allied to Agriculture.

Education.—Education in all its branches ought to be given in the hands of the popular Minister. It is frequently urged by the Anglo-Indian Press and also by Government officials that higher education is responsible for the agitation for all sorts of political rights and privileges, and there is a strong popular belief that the average Government official is no friend of high education; it is already in the air that the present ruler of this province also does not view the extension of higher education very favourably in spite of the pronounced policy of a benign Government that "India must rise by Education, and that educational advancement must have a predominant claim on the resources of the Empire," the question of opening one additional class in the local college to avoid 150 to 200 boys from being deprived of collegiate education has remained unheeded. Under the circumstances this Association respectfully urges that it would be a mistake to take any risk in respect of the educational policy. People have learnt to value education, and any retrograde policy cannot but make the people disappointed and discontented.

No Saving Department transferred in Assam.—The most noteworthy fact in the whole Report is that not a single earning department of any importance is proposed to be "transferred" in Assam. The members of the Committee put more weight on the official evidence in this matter than to the claims of the popular representatives. That the Honourable the Chief Commissioner of Assam has not shown much solicitude towards the popular advanced demands regarding Reforms, will be evidenced by his note, which is throughout illiberal and unsympathetic (advocates mainly the cause of the Britons), and by the note of the five Provincial Governors, of which he is a signatory. This Association respectfully begs to submit that the reforms have become necessary only on account of the inability of the Civil Service to properly appreciate the popular feelings and ideas and its reluctance to part with power. The Association feels that official objections to transference of subjects in Assam are mainly due to such reluctance more than anything else. In this unfortunate Province there will be no chance of unsophisticated statesmen from England coming to rule over it if the recommendation of the Government of India be adopted. The result will be that the "administration" of the "transferred" subjects which are only spending departments but at the same time most important subjects for the welfare and advancement of the people, by a popular Minister, under a civilian ruler may end in failure, and the failure would be explained as due to the incapacity of the people to govern themselves.

FRANCHISE.

While in para. 229 and 230 the joint M.C. report very strong reasons are given for not perpetuating divisions and stereotyping existing relations between the existing classes by giving them special representations, the Honourable the Chief Commissioner of Assam strongly advocated the opposite views. The Southborough Committee has now recommended class representations in Assam on a very lavish scale and without giving due consideration either to the importance of the communities who are refused communal representation or to the unimportance of the classes, who, it is recommended, must have seats assigned to them either by election or by nomination. In Assam the Europeans do not form even one three-hundredth of the total population, but the proposal of the Honourable the Chief Commissioner to reserve ten seats for them out of a total of forty elected seats has been substantially complied with by the Franchise Committee. The Indian National Congress during the last session protested against this view by a resolution and the Assam Association as well as the public of Assam in many meetings protested against this view. The Southborough Committee has recommended at page 78 of its report that there should be an urban seat (meaning a member to be elected for the Schillong Municipality." It has been urged by the Honourable the Chief Commissioner of Assam because thereby he hopes to get an European to be returned to the Council.

Planting Seats.—Five seats have been recommended for the planters. These five will be perforce Europeans.

Commerce and Industry Seats.—Unless the qualifications to this seat be not so defined as to include all traders, merchants and shopkeepers who pay an income of Rs. 25/– or above per annum, the seat will also go to the Europeans. The great bulk of commercial concerns in this province are not registered companies, and it will be a gross injustice to the real trading community in the province to define the franchise qualifications for this seat as proposed by the Committee. The Association humbly prays that the definition may be altered as suggested above.

Seat for Europeans and Anglo-Indians.—There are no Anglo-Indians in Assam as a distinct class except a few telegraph signallers and such others. There is neither a distinct class of Europeans in Assam except planters, Government officials and miners. It is inconceivable why then there should be a seat reserved specially for Europeans or Anglo-Indians, whose interests will be amply represented by the official and non-official seats they have been given.

Seat for Indian Christians.—In the same page the committee recommends that a seat should be reserved for Indian Christians. The Indian Christian Community in Assam is neither numerous nor so politically important as the Ahom Community. Why then is a seat reserved for the Indian Christians when there would be so many European Christian members officials and non-officials to protect their interests as Christians and so many Indian members to protect their interests as Indians.

Labour Seat.—The seat meant for labour is also unnecessary at present unless employers of labour are excluded from the category.

Nomination of a Member from the Excluded Tracts.—There seems to be no necessity for a seat for a member from the excluded tracts. If the tracts be directly under the Governor it is not seen how a member from those tracts would help the Governor by merely sitting in the Legislative Council. If, however, that seat is retained, the Assam Association urges that the member must be a native of the Hills.

Regarding Distribution of Seats.—It will be seen at page 75 of the report that there are altogether 3,637,400 Hindus in the Province and 1,868,528 Mahomedans. The number of seats at present recommended are Hindu seats 18 and Mahomedan seats 12, while agreeing to the 12 seats for Mahomedans, my Association claims more seats for Hindus and a proportionate enlargement of the Legislative council if necessary. The only community which can claim a special treatment in Assam is the Ahom Community who ruled in Assam till only a hundred years ago if special treatment be accorded at all. My Association notices with sorrow also the fact that in some cases the accepted calculations and principles are disregarded in the distribution of the seats. At page 79 the committee evidently distributed the seats on calculation of the population by thousands. Among non-Mahomedan seats Kamrup has been recommended to have two seats with its 306 thousands while others are recommended just their dues according to the calculation by thousands. Among Mahomedan seats Goalpara has been given two seats with a Mahomedan population of only one hundred and twelve thousands It looks like robbing Kamrup of one seat to give it to the Mahomedans of Goalpara. This Association would not grudge the extra seat granted to the Mahomedans, but it certainly objects to the lessening of a Hindu seat from Kamrup and thereby from the total.

RE: THE GENERAL RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

The recommendations of the Government of India in their despatch, dated March 5th, are inconstant with original report and declaration of the 20th August. The Assam Association endorses the views of Sir Sankaran Nair generally and take special exception of the following proposals in the despatch :—

1. I. C. S. Governors of all provinces except Madras, Bombay and Bengal.
2. Composition of the Executive Council.
3. The difference in the status and salary of an Executive Councillor and Minister.
4. The proposal that secretaries and permanent heads of departments should have direct access to the Governor.
5. A definite allocation to each half of Government of receipts from transferred and reserved subjects. In Assam it is significant that not a single earning department worth the name has been recommended to be transferred.
6. Giving no voice to the Legislative Council in matters of taxation regarding reserved subjects.
7. Proposal that no appeal is to be allowed from the certificate of the Governor, nor is any reference to be made in such a matter to the Government of India or the Secretary of State, before certifying a bill.

8.. Proposal to appoint under-secretaries by members of council or ministers, which are to be honorary and informal.

9. Joint deliberation of the whole Council not being the ordinary rule.

10. Regarding treatment of finance by the Executive Council independently of the ministers and the Legislative Assembly.

11. Authority of Parliament and the Governor-General of India on the transferred subjects.

The Assam Association humbly places the above facts for your consideration, and prays that they may have the systematic treatment that their importance demands.

I have the honour to be,
My Lords and Gentlemen,
Your most obedient servant,
Chandranath Sarma,
General Secretary, Assam Association.

APPENDIX AA.

STATEMENT supplied by Messrs. Bardaloi and Baruah at the direction of the Committee and received on 6th October, 1919. (See Question 6974.)

TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE JOINT COMMITTEE ON INDIAN REFORMS.

My LORD,

We thankfully avail ourselves of this opportunity offered to us for filing an additional written statement and beg to state as follows:—

The last statement that we made before the Committee was that the original proposal of the Honourable the Chief Commissioner of Assam was much in advance of the proposal made by the Government of India. Of course, we do not agree with the Chief Commissioner that the people of the two Valleys are irreconcilably different from each other, and therefore two different centres should be the headquarters of the two portions of the divided council. The people of the two Valleys are no more different from each other than the people of 24 Pergannas in Bengal are different from the people of Chittagong or Serajgunj in the same Province.

We have already submitted in our previous memorandum—while discussing the unreasonableness of the Southborough Committee's recommendations regarding functions—that "all departments in the Provincial Administration should be in the hands of the people." At the same time we submit that the scheme submitted by the Honourable the Chief Commissioner conclusively and authoritatively supports our contention that Assam is fit for a more advanced system of popular administration than what the Government of India has proposed even for what are called "Advanced Provinces."

The Honourable the Chief Commissioner of Assam found his scheme feasible, and never doubted that he would be able to meet the expenses of such an administration. But the Government of India object to it, because more advanced Provinces would not get it, and they therefore propose for Assam a system of government which is only a makeshift and no council government at all. We beg to submit that no advantages under the Reform Scheme finally adopted should be denied to Assam because of the vague term "backward" applied to it by the Government of India.

We respectfully place the above before the Committee and pray that due consideration may be given to the unanimous public opinion of the unhappy Province.

The main objections of the Government of India are two-fold, viz.:—

1.—The administration would be topheavy because the area left after the exclusion of the Hill Districts would not be able to pay the increased expenses, and that people would not like to spend the 3 laks surplus for this purpose.

2.—The people are politically and socially backward.

1st OBJECTION.

I. The Hill Districts may be large in area but they do not contribute much. The exclusion of the Hill Districts from Assam would make Assam richer by 14 laks of rupees, an amount which would be more than sufficient to meet any ambitious scheme of Reforms in that Province.

II. Even if the Hill Districts are not excluded and the money raised from the ryots of the Plains are spent on the Hills without any justification whatever, Assam would be able to pay for an advanced system of administration.

The two Commissionerships shall be abolished in any case, and their average salaries of Rs. 3,000 each per month, their office expenses (they have two big offices with about 20 to 25 officers), the salaries of the personal assistants, the costs of their steam yachts, etc., would be more than sufficient to pay the increased expense.

The revenue of the Province is yearly increasing from permanent causes, namely, the influx of large numbers of settlers from Bengal, and the acquiring of lands for special cultivation by monied individuals and Companies. When the authors of the Montague-Chelmsford Report found the gross revenue of the Province to be Rs. 171 laks only and expenses Rs. 150 laks, leaving a surplus of Rs. 21 laks only; the year after that, viz., in 1916-17 the gross receipts was Rs. 184 laks and the gross expenditure only Rs. 148 laks, leaving a surplus of about Rs. 36 laks. The surplus in the year 1917–18, might be about the same if not more.

The Southborough Committee recommended the exclusion of Hills from the operation of the Reforms. But though the Hill people are as much non-Assamese as Bhutyas are non-Bengalese, the ryot of the Plains are made to pay 14 laks of rupees for the Hills, and then they are called poor and backward, and advanced popular administration is proposed to be denied to them. If in years past Assam had been made to pay for these Hills on account of their contiguity we state that it is now about time to rectify that wrong. Almost all the Hill Districts are Frontier Districts of more or less Political importance, and if the people there are to be civilised they ought to be All-India concerns instead of being a burden to Assam financially and a bar to Assam in its political progress.

2nd OBJECTION.

Socially, Assam is not a bit more backward that any other Province in India, and we need only refer to the evidence of Sir Archdale Earle in support of that fact. In higher education it has been rapidly rising, and to quote the remarks of the Director of Public Instruction in his educational report of the year 1917–18, "Assam continued to hold its place at the head of the Provinces with reference to the success of its students in the various university examinations from the matriculation to the degree."

Politically, we believe nowhere else in India a political institution like the Assam Association has steadily advanced in the style of a miniature national congress collecting the representatives of the people of different districts every year in pre-arranged places, whereto the ryots are invited in large numbers. The institution has now lived for more than twelve years and is a recognised institution, having active branches all over the Assam Valley districts. Similarly, the Surma Valley People's Association is also working in the same manner. It is true that Assam did not evince any tendency towards violent political activities as it showed during the serious agrarian riots of 1894, or like Bengal of recent years. But it is a matter to be considered that hopes have been raised in the minds of a cultured and intelligent people, inheritors of a very ancient civilisation, and the meting out of differential treatment converting the scheme into nothing, might produce extremely harmful results.

As regards Franchise the proposals made by the Southborough Committee as well as by the Government of India are not quite fair, and we have already discussed that question in our first written statement, and as the Committee has kindly promised to treat that as a part of our evidence, we refrain from making any further statements under that head.

In matters of distribution a strict policy has not been followed, e.g., it has been proposed that the most advanced District in the Province, viz., Kamrup District, should obtain two seats with a population of 300,000, whereas other districts and communities are allowed to have a seat for every 100,000 or less.

We have the Honour to be

Your Lordship's most obedient servants,
N. C. BARDALOI,
P. K. BARUAH
Representatives of the Assam Association.

Dated London the 30th September, 1919.
